

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. MESSAGE

OF THE

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,

TOGETHER WITH THE

REPORTS OF THE HEADS OF DEPARTMENTS,

TO THE

TWO HOUSES OF CONGRESS

AT THE

COMMENCEMENT OF THE SECOND SESSION OF THE FORTY-SECOND CONGRESS.

WASHINGTON: GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.
1871.

MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives :

In addressing my third annual message to the law-making branch of the Government, it is gratifying to be able to state that during the past year success has generally attended the effort to execute all laws found upon the statute-books. The policy has been, not to inquire into the wisdom of laws already enacted, but to learn their spirit and intent, and to enforce them accordingly.

The past year has, under a wise Providence, been one of general prosperity to the nation. It has, however, been attended with more than usual chastisements in the loss of life and property, by storm and fire. These disasters have served to call forth the best elements of human nature in our country, and to develop a friendship for us on the part of foreign nations which goes far toward alleviating the distresses occasioned by these calamities. The benevolent, who have so generously shared their means with the victims of these misfortunes, will reap their reward in the consciousness of having performed a noble act, and in receiving the grateful thanks of men, women, and children whose sufferings they have relieved.

The relations of the United States with foreign powers continue to be friendly. The year has been an eventful one in witnessing two great nations, speaking one language and having one lineage, settling, by peaceful arbitration, disputes of long standing, and liable at any time to bring those nations into bloody and costly conflict. An example has thus been set which, if successful in its final issue, may be followed by other civilized nations, and finally be the means of returning to productive industry millions of men now maintained to settle the disputes of nations by the bayonet and the broadside.

I transmit herewith a copy of the treaty alluded to, which has been concluded, since the adjournment of Congress, with Her Britannic Majesty, and a copy of the protocols of the conferences of the commissioners by whom it was negotiated. This treaty provides methods for adjusting the questions pending between the two nations.

Various questions are to be adjusted by arbitration. I recommend Congress at an early day to make the necessary provision for the tribunal at Geneva, and for the several commissioners, on the part of the United States, called for by the treaty.

His Majesty the King of Italy, the President of the Swiss Confederation, and His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, have each consented, on the joint request of the two powers, to name an arbitrator for the tribunal at Geneva. I have caused my thanks to be suitably expressed for the readiness with which the joint request has been complied with, by the appointment of gentlemen of eminence and learning to these important positions.

His Majesty the Emperor of Germany has been pleased to comply with the joint request of the two governments, and has consented to act as the arbitrator of the disputed water boundary between the United States and Great Britain.

The contracting parties in the treaty have undertaken to regard as between themselves certain principles of public law, for which the United States have contended from the commencement of their history. They have also agreed to bring those principles to the knowledge of the other maritime powers and to invite them to accede to them. Negotiations are going on as to the form of the note by which the invitation is to be extended to the other powers.

I recommend the legislation necessary on the part of the United States to bring into operation the articles of the treaty relating to the fisheries, and to the other matters touching the relations of the United States toward the British North American possessions, to become operative so soon as the proper legislation shall be had on the part of Great Britain and its possessions. It is much to be desired that this legislation may become operative before the fishermen of the United States begin to make their arrangements for the coming season.

I have addressed a communication, of which a copy is transmitted herewith, to the governors of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin, urging upon the governments of those States, respectively, the necessary action on their part to carry into effect the object of the article of the treaty which contemplates the use of the canals, on either side, connected with the navigation of the lakes and rivers forming the boundary, on terms of equality by the inhabitants of both countries. It is hoped that the importance of the object and the benefits to flow therefrom will secure the speedy approval and legislative sanction of the States concerned.

I renew the recommendation for an appropriation for determining the true position of the forty-ninth parallel of latitude where it forms the boundary between the United States and the British North American possessions, between the Lake of the Woods and the summit of the Rocky Mountains. The early action of Congress on this recommendation would put it in the power of the War Department to place a force in the field during the next summer.

The resumption of diplomatic relations between France and Germany have enabled me to give directions for the withdrawal of the protection extended to Germans in France by the diplomatic and consular representatives of the United States in that country. It is just to add that the delicate duty of this protection has been performed by the minister and the consul general at Paris, and the various consuls in France under the supervision of the latter, with great kindness as well as with prudence and tact. Their course has received the commendation of the German government, and has wounded no susceptibility of the French.

The government of the Emperor of Germany continues to manifest a friendly feeling toward the United States, and a desire to harmonize with the moderate and just policy which this Government maintains in its relations with Asiatic powers, as well as with the South American republics. I have given assurances that the friendly feelings of that government are fully shared by the United States.

The ratifications of the consular and naturalization conventions with the Austro-Hungarian Empire have been exchanged.

I have been officially informed of the annexation of the States of the Church to the Kingdom of Italy, and the removal of the capital of that kingdom to Rome. In conformity with the established policy of the United States, I have recognized this change. The ratifications of the new treaty of commerce between the United States and Italy have been exchanged. The two powers have agreed in this treaty that private property at sea shall be exempt from capture in case of war between the two powers. The United States have spared no opportunity of incorporating this rule into the obligation of nations.

The Forty-first Congress at its third session made an appropriation for the organization of a mixed commission for adjudicating upon the claims of citizens of the United States against Spain growing out of the insurrection in Cuba. That commission has since been organized. I transmit herewith the correspondence relating to its formation and its jurisdiction. It is to be hoped that this commission will afford the claimants a complete remedy for their injuries.

It has been made the agreeable duty of the United States to preside over a conference at Washington between the plenipotentiaries of Spain and the allied South American republics, which has resulted in an armistice, with the reasonable assurance of a permanent peace.

The intimate friendly relations which have so long existed between the United States and Russia continue undisturbed. The visit of the third son of the Emperor is a proof that there is no desire on the part of his government to diminish the cordiality of those relations. The hospitable reception which has been given to the Grand Duke is a proof that on our side we share the wishes of that government. The inexcusable course of the Russian minister at Washington rendered it necessary to ask his recall, and to decline to longer receive that functionary as a diplomatic representative. It was impossible with self-respect, or with a just regard to the dignity of the country, to permit Mr. Catacazy to continue to hold intercourse with this Government after his personal abuse of Government officials, and during his persistent interference, through various means, with the relations between the United States and other powers. In accordance with my wishes, this Government has been relieved of further intercourse with Mr. Catacazy, and the management of the affairs of the imperial legation has passed into the hands of a gentleman entirely unobjectionable.

With Japan we continue to maintain intimate relations. The cabinet of the Mikado has, since the close of the last session of Congress, selected citizens of the United States to serve in offices of importance in several departments of government. I have reason to think that this selection is due to an appreciation of the disinterestedness of the policy which the United States have pursued toward Japan. It is our desire to continue to maintain this disinterested and just policy with China as well as Japan. The correspondence transmitted herewith shows that there is no disposition on the part of this Government to swerve from its established course.

Prompted by a desire to put an end to the barbarous treatment of our shipwrecked sailors on the Corean coast, I instructed our minister at Peking to endeavor to conclude a convention with Corea for securing the safety and humane treatment of such mariners.

Admiral Rodgers was instructed to accompany him, with a sufficient force to protect him in case of need.

A small surveying party sent out, on reaching the coast, was treacherously attacked at a disadvantage. Ample opportunity was given for explanation and apology for the insult. Neither came. A force was then landed. After an arduous march over a rugged and difficult country, the forts from which the outrages had been committed were reduced by a gallant assault and were destroyed. Having thus punished the criminals, and having vindicated the honor of the flag, the expedition returned, finding it impracticable, under the circumstances, to conclude the desired convention. I respectfully refer to the correspondence relating thereto, herewith submitted, and leave the subject for such action as Congress may see fit to take.

The republic of Mexico has not yet repealed the very objectionable laws establishing what is known as the "Free Zone," on the frontier of the United States. It is hoped that this may yet be done, and also that more stringent measures may be taken by that republic for restraining lawless persons on its frontiers. I hope that Mexico, by its own action, will soon relieve this Government of the difficulties experienced from these causes. Our relations with the various republics of Central and South America continue, with one exception, to be cordial and friendly.

I recommend some action by Congress regarding the overdue installments under the award of the Venezuelan claims commission of 1866. The internal dissensions of this government present no justification for the absence of effort to meet their solemn treaty obligations.

The ratification of an extradition treaty with Nicaragua has been exchanged.

It is a subject for congratulation that the great empire of Brazil has taken the initiatory step toward the abolition of slavery. Our relations with that empire, always cordial, will naturally be made more so by this act. It is not too much to hope that the government of Brazil may hereafter find it for its interest as well as intrinsically right to advance toward entire emancipation more rapidly than the present act contemplates.

The true prosperity and greatness of a nation is to be found in the elevation and education of its laborers.

It is a subject for regret that the reforms in this direction, which were voluntarily promised by the statesmen of Spain, have not been carried out in its West India colonies. The laws and regulations for the apparent abolition of slavery in Cuba and Porto Rico leave most of the laborers in bondage, with no hope of release until their lives become a burden to their employers.

I desire to direct your attention to the fact that citizens of the United States, or persons claiming to be citizens of the United States, are large holders, in foreign lands, of this species of property, forbidden by the fundamental law of their alleged country. I recommend to Congress to provide, by stringent legislation, a suitable remedy against the holding, owning, or dealing in slaves, or being interested in slave property in foreign lands, either as owners, hirers, or mortgagers, by citizens of the United States.

It is to be regretted that the disturbed condition of the island of Cuba continues to be a source of annoyance and of anxiety. The existence of a protracted struggle in such close proximity to our own territory, without apparent prospect of an early termination, cannot be other than an object of concern to a people who, while abstaining from interference in the affairs of other powers, naturally desire to see every country in the undisturbed enjoyment of peace, liberty, and the blessings of free institutions.

Our naval commanders in Cuban waters have been instructed, in case it should become necessary, to spare no effort to protect the lives and property of bona-fide American citizens, and to maintain the dignity of the flag.

It is hoped that all pending questions with Spain growing out of the affairs in Cuba may be adjusted in the spirit of peace and conciliation which has hitherto guided the two powers in their treatment of such questions.

To give importance, and to add to the efficiency of our diplomatic relations with Japan and China, and to further aid in retaining the good opinion of those peoples, and to secure to the United States its share of the commerce destined to flow between those nations and the balance of the commercial world, I earnestly recommend that an appropriation be made to support at least four American youths in each of those countries, to serve as a part of the official family of our ministers there. Our representatives would not even then be placed upon an equality with the representatives of Great Britain and of some other powers. As now situated, our representatives in Japan and China have to depend, for interpreters and translators, upon natives of those countries who know our language imperfectly, or procure for the occasion the services of employ  s in foreign business houses, or the interpreters to other foreign ministers.

I would also recommend liberal measures for the purpose of supporting the American lines of steamers now plying between San Francisco and Japan and China, and the Australian line—almost our only remaining lines of ocean steamers—and of increasing their services.

The national debt has been reduced to the extent of eighty-six million fifty-seven thousand one hundred and twenty-six dollars and eighty cents during the year, and by the negotiation of national bonds at a lower rate of interest, the interest on the public debt has been so far diminished that now the sum to be raised for the interest account is nearly seventeen million dollars less than on the 1st of March, 1869. It was highly desirable that this rapid diminution should take place, both to strengthen the credit of the country, and to convince its citizens of their entire ability to meet every dollar of liability without bankrupting them. But in view of the accomplishment of these desirable ends; of the rapid development of the resources of the country; its increasing ability to meet large demands, and the amount already paid, it is not desirable that the present resources of the country should continue to be taxed in order to continue this rapid payment. I therefore recommend a modification of both the tariff and internal tax laws. I recommend that all taxes from internal sources be abolished, except those collected from spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, tobacco in its various forms, and from stamps.

In re-adjusting the tariff, I suggest that a careful estimate be made of the amount of surplus revenue collected under the present laws, after providing for the current expenses of the Government, the interest account, and a sinking fund, and that this surplus be reduced in such a manner as to afford the greatest relief to the greatest number. There are many articles not produced at home, but which enter largely into general consumption through articles which are manufactured at home, such as medicines compounded, &c., &c., from which very little revenue is derived, but which enter into general use. All such articles I recommend to be placed on the “free list.” Should a further reduction prove advisable, I would then recommend that it be made upon those articles which can best bear it without disturbing home-production, or reducing the wages of American labor.

I have not entered into figures, because to do so would be to repeat what will be laid before you in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The present laws for collecting revenue pay collectors of customs small salaries, but provide for moieties (shares in all seizures) which, at principal ports of entry particularly, raise the compensation of those officials to a large sum. It has always seemed to me as if this system must, at times, work perniciously. It holds out an inducement to dishonest men, should such get possession of those offices, to be lax in their scrutiny of goods entered to enable them finally to make large seizures. Your attention is respectfully invited to this subject.

Continued fluctuations in the value of gold, as compared with the national currency, has a most damaging effect upon the increase and development of the country in keeping up prices of all articles necessary in every-day life. It fosters a spirit of gambling prejudicial alike to national morals and the national finances. If the question can be met, as to how to give a fixed value to our currency, that value constantly and uniformly approaching par with specie, a very desirable object will be gained.

For the operations of the Army in the past year, the expense of maintaining it, the estimate for the ensuing year, and for continuing sea-coast and other improvements conducted under the supervision of the War Department, I refer you to the accompanying report of the Secretary of War.

I call your attention to the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1869, which discontinues promotions in the staff corps of the Army until provided for by law. I recommend that the number of officers in each grade in the staff corps be fixed, and that whenever the number in any one grade falls below the number so fixed, that the vacancy may be filled by promotion from the grade below. I also recommend that, when the office of chief of a corps becomes vacant, the place may be filled by selection from the corps in which the vacancy exists.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy shows an improvement in the number and efficiency of the naval force, without material increase in the expense of supporting it. This is due to the policy which has been adopted, and is being extended, as fast as our material will admit, of using smaller vessels as cruisers on the several stations. By this means we have been enabled to occupy at once a larger extent of cruising-ground, to visit more frequently the ports where the presence of our flag is desirable, and generally to discharge more efficiently the appropriate duties of the Navy in time of peace, without exceeding the number of men or the expenditure authorized by law.

During the past year the Navy has, in addition to its regular service, supplied the men and officers for the vessels of the Coast Survey, and has completed the surveys authorized by Congress of the Isthmus of Darien and Tehuantepec, and under like authority has sent out an expedition completely furnished and equipped to explore the unknown ocean of the north.

The suggestions of the report as to the necessity for increasing and improving the materiel of the Navy, and the plan recommended for reducing the personnel of the service to a peace standard, by the gradual abolition of certain grades of officers, the reduction of others, and the employment of some in the service of the commercial marine, are well considered and deserve the thoughtful attention of Congress.

I also recommend that all promotions in the Navy above the rank of captain be by selection instead of by seniority. This course will secure in the higher grades greater efficiency and hold out an incentive to young officers to improve themselves in the knowledge of their profession.

The present cost of maintaining the Navy, its cost compared with that of the preceding year, and the estimates for the ensuing year, are contained in the accompanying report of the Secretary of the Navy.

The enlarged receipts of the Post-Office Department, as shown by the accompanying report of the Postmaster General, exhibits a gratifying increase in that branch of the public service. It is the index of the growth of education and of the prosperity of the people, two elements highly conducive to the vigor and stability of republics. With a vast territory like ours, much of it sparsely populated, but all requiring the services of the mail, it is not at present to be expected that this Department can be made self-sustaining. But a gradual approach to this end, from year to year, is confidently relied on, and the day is not far distant when the Post-Office Department of the Government will prove a much greater blessing to the whole people than it is now.

The suggestions of the Postmaster General for improvements in the Department presided over by him are earnestly recommended to your special attention. Especially do I recommend favorable consideration of the plan for uniting the telegraphic system of the United States with the postal system. It is believed that by such a course the cost of telegraphing could be much reduced, and the service as well, if not better, rendered. It would secure the further advantage of extending the telegraph through portions of the country where private enterprise will not construct it. Commerce, trade, and, above all, the efforts to bring a people widely separated into a community of interest, are always benefited by a rapid intercommunication. Education, the ground-work of republican institutions, is encouraged by increasing the facilities to gather speedy news from all parts of the country. The desire to reap the benefit of such improvements will stimulate education. I refer you to the report of the Postmaster General for full details of the operations of last year, and for comparative statements of results with former years.

There has been imposed upon the Executive branch of the Government the execution of the act of Congress approved April 20, 1871, and commonly known as the Ku-Klux law, in a portion of the State of South Carolina. The necessity of the course pursued will be demonstrated by the report of the Committee to Investigate Southern Outrages. Under the provisions of the above act, I issued a proclamation calling the attention of the people of the United States to the same, and declaring my reluctance to exercise any of the extraordinary powers thereby conferred upon me, except in case of imperative necessity, but making known my purpose to exercise such powers whenever it should become necessary to do so for the purpose of securing to all citizens of the United States the peaceful enjoyment of the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution and the laws.

After the passage of this law, information was received from time to time that combinations of the character referred to in this law existed, and were powerful in many parts of the Southern States, particularly in certain counties in the State of South Carolina.

Careful investigation was made, and it was ascertained that, in nine counties of that State, such combinations were active and powerful, embracing a sufficient portion of the citizens to control the local authority, and having, among other things, the object of depriving the emancipated class of the substantial benefits of freedom, and of preventing the free political action of those citizens who did not sympathize with their own views. Among their operations were frequent scourgings and occasional assassinations, generally perpetrated at night by disguised persons, the victims in almost all cases being citizens of different political sentiments from their own, or freed persons who had shown a disposition to claim equal rights with other citizens. Thousands of inoffensive and well-disposed citizens were the sufferers by this lawless violence.

Thereupon, on the 12th of October, 1871, a proclamation was issued, in terms of the law, calling upon the members of those combinations to disperse within five days, and to deliver to the marshal or military officers of the United States all arms, ammunition, uniforms, disguises, and other means and implements used by them for carrying out their unlawful purposes.

This warning not having been heeded, on the 17th of October another proclamation was issued, suspending the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus in nine counties in that State.

Direction was given that, within the counties so designated, persons supposed, upon creditable information, to be members of such unlawful combinations should be arrested by the military forces of the United States, and delivered to the marshal, to be dealt with according to law. In two of said counties, York and Spartanburgh, many arrests have been made. At the last account, the number of persons thus arrested was one hundred and sixty-eight. Several hundred, whose criminality was ascertained to be of an inferior degree, were released for the present. These have generally made confessions of their guilt.

Great caution has been exercised in making these arrests, and, notwithstanding the large number, it is believed that no innocent person is now in custody. The prisoners will be held for regular trial in the judicial tribunals of the United States.

As soon as it appeared that the authorities of the United States were about to take vigorous measures to enforce the law, many persons absconded, and there is good ground for supposing that all of such persons have violated the law. A full report of what has been done under this law will be submitted to Congress by the Attorney General.

In Utah there still remains a remnant of barbarism, repugnant to civilization, to decency, and to the laws of the United States. Territorial officers, however, have been found who are willing to perform their duty in a spirit of equity and with a due sense of the necessity of sustaining the majesty of the law. Neither polygamy nor any other violation of existing statutes will be permitted within the territory of the United States. It is not with the religion of the self-styled Saints that we are now dealing, but with their practices. They will be protected in the worship of God according to the dictates of their consciences, but they will not be permitted to violate the laws under the cloak of religion.

It may be advisable for Congress to consider what, in the execution of the laws against polygamy, is to be the status of plural wives and their offspring. The propriety of Congress passing an enabling act authorizing the territorial legislature of Utah to legitimize all children born prior to a time fixed in the act might be justified by its humanity to these innocent children. This is a suggestion only, and not a recommendation.

The policy pursued toward the Indians has resulted favorably, so far as can be judged from the limited time during which it has been in operation. Through the exertions of the various societies of Christians to whom has been intrusted the execution of the policy, and the board of commissioners authorized by the law of April 10, 1869, many tribes of Indians have been induced to settle upon reservations, to cultivate the soil, to perform productive labor of various kinds, and to partially accept civilization. They are being cared for in such a way, it is hoped, as to induce those still pursuing their old habits of life to embrace the only opportunity which is left them to avoid extermination.

I recommend liberal appropriations to carry out the Indian peace policy, not only because it is humane, Christian-like, and economical, but because it is right.

I recommend to your favorable consideration also the policy of granting a territorial government to the Indians in the Indian Territory west of Arkansas and Missouri and south of Kansas. In doing so, every right guaranteed to the Indian by treaty should be secured. Such a course might in time be the means of collecting most of the Indians now between the Missouri and the Pacific and south of the British possessions into one Territory or one State. The Secretary of the Interior has treated upon this subject at length, and I commend to you his suggestions.

I renew my recommendation that the public lands be regarded as a heritage to our children, to be disposed of only as required for occupation and to actual settlers. Those already granted have been in great part disposed of in such a way as to secure access to the balance by the hardy settler who may wish to avail himself of them, but caution should be exercised even in attaining so desirable an object.

Educational interest may well be served by the grant of the proceeds of the sale of public lands to settlers. I do not wish to be understood as recommending, in the least degree, a curtailment of what is being done by the General Government for the encouragement of education.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior, submitted with this, will give you all the information collected and prepared for publication in regard to the census taken during the year 1870; the operations of the Bureau of Education for the year; the Patent Office; the Pension Office; the Land Office; and the Indian Bureau.

The report of the Commissioner of Agriculture gives the operations of his Department for the year. As agriculture is the ground-work of our prosperity, too much importance cannot be attached to the labors of this Department. It is in the hands of an able head, with able assistants, all zealously devoted to introduce into the agricultural productions of the nation all useful products adapted to any of the various climates and soils of our vast territory, and to giving all useful information as to the method of cultivation, the plants, cereals, and other products adapted to particular localities. Quietly, but surely, the Agricultural Bureau is working a great national good, and if liberally supported, the more widely its influence will be extended and the less dependent we shall be upon the products of foreign countries.

The subject of compensation to the heads of Bureaus and officials holding positions of responsibility, and requiring ability and character to fill properly, is one to which your attention is invited. But few of the officials receive a compensation equal to the respectable support of a family, while their duties are such as to involve millions of interest. In private life services demand compensation equal to the services rendered. A wise economy would dictate the same rule in the Government service.

I have not given the estimates for the support of Government for the ensuing year, nor the comparative statement between the expenditures for the year just passed and the one just preceding, because all these figures are contained in the accompanying reports, or in those presented directly to Congress. These estimates have my approval.

More than six years having elapsed since the last hostile gun was fired between the armies then arrayed against each other—one for the perpetuation, the other for the destruction of the Union—it may well be considered whether it is not now time that the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment should be removed. That amendment does not exclude the ballot, but only imposes the disability to hold offices upon certain classes. When the purity of the ballot is secure, majorities are sure to elect officers reflecting the views of the majority. I do not see the advantage or propriety of excluding men from office merely because they were, before the rebellion, of standing and character sufficient to be elected to positions requiring them to take oaths to support the Constitution, and admitting to eligibility those entertaining precisely the same views, but of less standing in their communities. It may be said that the former violated an oath, while the latter did not. The latter did not have it in their power to do so. If they had taken this oath it cannot be doubted they would have broken it as did the former class. If there are any great criminals, distinguished above all others for the part they took in opposition to the Government, they might, in the judgment of Congress, be excluded from such an amnesty.

This subject is submitted for your careful consideration.

The condition of the Southern States is, unhappily, not such as all true patriotic citizens would like to see. Social ostracism for opinion's sake, personal violence or threats toward persons entertaining political views opposed to those entertained by the majority of the old citizens, prevents immigration and the flow of much-needed capital into the States lately in rebellion. It will be a happy condition of the country when the old citizens of these States will take an interest in public affairs, promulgate ideas honestly entertained, vote for men representing their views, and tolerate the same freedom of expression and ballot in those entertaining different political convictions.

Under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 21, 1871, a territorial government was organized in the District of Columbia. Its results have thus far fully realized the expectations of its advocates. Under the direction of the territorial officers, a system of improvements has been inaugurated, by means of which Washington is rapidly becoming a city worthy of the nation's capital. The citizens of the District having voluntarily taxed themselves to a large amount for the purpose of contributing to the adornment of the seat of Government, I recommend liberal appropriations on the part of Congress in order that the Government may bear its just share of the expense of carrying out a judicious system of improvements.

By the great fire in Chicago, the most important of the Government buildings in that city were consumed. Those burned had already become inadequate to the wants of the Government in that growing city, and, looking to the near future, were totally inadequate. I recommend therefore that an appropriation be made immediately to purchase the remainder of the square on which the burned buildings stood, provided it can be purchased at a fair valuation, or provided that the legislature of Illinois will pass a law authorizing its condemnation for Government purposes; and also an appropriation of as much money as can properly be expended toward the erection of new buildings during this fiscal year.

The number of immigrants ignorant of our laws, habits, &c., coming into our country annually has become so great, and the impositions practiced upon them so numerous and flagrant, that I suggest congressional action for their protection. It seems to me a fair subject of legislation by Congress. I cannot now state as fully as I desire the nature of the complaints made by immigrants of the treatment they receive, but will endeavor to do so during the session of Congress, particularly if the subject should receive your attention.

It has been the aim of the Administration to enforce honesty and efficiency in all public offices. Every public servant who has violated the trust placed in him has been proceeded against with all the rigor of the law. If bad men have secured places it has been the fault of the system established by law and custom for making appointments, or the fault of those who recommend for Government positions persons not sufficiently well known to them personally, or who give letters indorsing the characters of office-seekers without a proper sense of the grave responsibility which such a course devolves upon them. A civil service reform which can correct this abuse is much desired. In mercantile pursuit, the business-man who gives a letter of recommendation to a friend, to enable him to obtain credit from a stranger, is regarded as morally responsible for the integrity of his friend, and his ability to meet his obligations. A reformatory law which would enforce this principle against all indorsers of persons for public place would insure great caution in making recommendations. A salutary lesson has been taught the careless and the dishonest public servant in the great number of prosecutions and convictions of the last two years.

It is gratifying to notice the favorable change which is taking place throughout the country in bringing to punishment those who have proven recreant to the trusts confided to them, and in elevating to public office none but those who possess the confidence of the honest and the virtuous, who, it will always be found, comprise the majority of the community in which they live.

In my message to Congress one year ago, I urgently recommended a reform in the civil service of the country. In conformity with that recommendation, Congress, in the ninth section of "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, gave the necessary authority to the Executive to inaugurate a civil service reform, and placed upon him the responsibility of doing so. Under the authority of said act I convened a board of gentlemen, eminently qualified for the work, to devise rules and regulations to effect the needed reform. Their labors are not yet complete, but it is believed that they will succeed in devising a plan that can be adopted to the great relief of the Executive, the heads of Departments, and members of Congress, and which will redound to the true interest of the public service. At all events, the experiment shall have a fair trial.

I have thus hastily summed up the operations of the Government during the last year, and made such suggestions as occur to me to be proper for your consideration. I submit them with a confidence that your combined action will be wise, statesmanlike, and in the best interests of the whole country.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 4, 1871.

R E P O R T
OF THE
SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

2 M

REPORT

OF THE

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 4, 1871.

SIR: The country has been prosperous during the year now closing, and the public finances have shared in the general prosperity.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, the reduction of the public debt was $94,327,764 84. The total decrease in the public debt from March 1, 1869, to December 1, 1871, was $277,211,892 16; and during the same period the annual interest charge has been reduced $16, 741, 436 04.

The revenues for the year 1871, and the receipts since the first of July last, show that the time has arrived when a considerable further reduction in taxes can be made, and yet leave the Government in a position to pay at least fifty millions of dollars annually of the principal of the public debt, including the amount pledged through the sinking fund. In my annual report to Congress for 1870, I expressed the opinion that the settled policy of the country should contemplate a revenue sufficient to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government, pay the interest on the public debt, and from twenty-five to fifty millions of dollars of the principal annually. To that opinion I adhere, with even a stronger conviction that the payment annually upon the principal of the public debt should not be less than fifty millions of dollars.

Large as the revenues of the country have been during the last three years, our system of taxation has not been oppressive to individuals, nor has it in any sensible degree embarrassed the business of the country; and while relief from taxation is desirable it is yet more desirable to maintain the public credit in its present elevated position, not only as an example to other nations, but for its historical value in enabling the Government to make loans for large amounts upon favorable terms if, unhappily, in the future an exigency should require such loans to be made.

The power to negotiate a large loan at five per cent. interest, and to enter upon negotiations for the sale of bonds bearing five, four-and-a-half, and four per cent. interest, is derived entirely from the exhibition of an honest purpose on the part of the people to maintain the public faith, and the consequent ability on the part of the Government to answer that expectation by large and frequent payments upon the public debt.

The revenue from customs for the fiscal year 1871 was greatly in excess of the estimates, amounting to $206,270,408 05, against $194,538,374 44, for the preceding year. The cost of collecting this revenue was $6,560,672 61, for 1871, being three and eleven hundredths per cent., while the cost for the year 1870 was $6,237,137 25, or three and twenty hundredths per cent.

The appropriation for the collection of the customs, with the additions derived from fines, penalties, and forfeitures, exceeded the expenditures by the sum of more than eight hundred thousand dollars, and there is no doubt that the permanent appropriation will be ample for the present year, and for the next fiscal year.

The reduction of the rates of duty on the 1st of January, 1871, under the act of July 14, 1870, diminished the importation of many articles during the last six months of the year 1870, but there was consequently a large addition to the revenues for the first six months of the year 1871.

A comparison of the first six months of the calendar year 1871 with the first six months of the calendar year 1870, shows an increase of fifty-five per cent. in the quantity of tea imported, twenty per cent. in the quantity of coffee, fifty-three per cent. in the quantity of brown sugar, one hundred and twenty per cent. in the quantity of pig iron, one hundred and eighty-six per cent. in the quantity of melado, one hundred and thirty-nine per cent. in the quantity of spices, and a large increase in many other articles.

The probability is that the customs revenue for the current year will exceed that for the year 1870-71.

The receipts from internal revenue were $143,098,153 63, being $4,048,984 29 less than the estimates presented to Congress in December last for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871. The estimates for the current fiscal year were $126,418,000, and it is probable that the receipts will be equal to the estimates.

The net receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, were as follows:

From customs.....	$206, 270, 408 05
From internal revenue.....	143, 098, 153 63

These estimates show a balance of $57,294,963 01 applicable to the payment of the principal of the debt, in addition to the sum of $28,679,263 due on account of the sinking fund, or the sum of $85,974,226 01 in all.

In the estimates for the next fiscal year I have not included in the receipts the premium on gold which may be sold, nor in the expenditures the premium which may be paid on bonds to be purchased in currency.

In the suggestions I have the honor to make in reference to the reduction of taxes, I keep in view two important facts: first, that the ability of the nation to pay at least fifty millions annually of the principal of the public debt shall not be impaired; and, secondly, that in the change of the revenue system no violence shall be done to the business interests of the country. While I do not undertake to state precisely the causes which have contributed to the public prosperity, there is no substantial reason for questioning the truth of the statement that the last few years have been the most prosperous in the history of the country; years without example in our own affairs, and without parallel in the affairs of any other Government.

It is practicable to dispense with all revenue from internal sources except that derived from stamps, spirits, tobacco, and malt liquors. These sources should furnish for the year 1872-'73 a revenue of about one hundred and ten millions of dollars, making a reduction of taxes of sixteen millions of dollars. The revenue from customs under existing laws, and from lands and miscellaneous sources, would amount to about two hundred and thirty-three millions more, making a total revenue for that year of three hundred and forty-three millions of dollars.

The expenses of the Government, not including the amount payable on account of the sinking fund, are estimated at $273,025,773 99.

If to this sum be added fifty millions of dollars for payments on account of the public debt, including the amount due on the sinking fund, there remains a balance of about twenty millions, within which reductions may be made in the revenue from customs. This amount, added to the reductions proposed under the internal revenue laws, gives a total reduction of thirty-six millions.

In this view, I respectfully recommend to the consideration of Congress the reduction of the duties on salt to the extent of fifty per cent.; the duty on bituminous coal to fifty cents per ton; the reduction of the duty on raw hides and skins; and the removal of all duties from a large class of articles produced in other countries, which enter into the arts and manufactures of this country, and which are not produced in the United States, and the revenue from which is inconsiderable. Such a list, with the revenue derived from each article, is in course of preparation, and will be submitted to Congress.

The removal of duties from a large class of articles used in manufactures, and the reduction of the duties upon coal, furnish an opportunity for a moderate decrease in the rates of duties upon those products whose cost will be diminished by these changes.

While nothing, as the consequence of legislation, could be more disastrous to the public prosperity than a policy which should destroy or seriously disturb the manufacturing interest of the country, it is still possible, by wise and moderate changes adapted to the condition of business and labor, to reduce the rates of duties with benefit to every class of people.

The average premium on gold for the year 1868 was 39.54 per cent.; for the year 1869 it was 32.56 per cent. premium; for the year 1870 it was 14.83 per cent. premium; and for the first eleven months of the year 1871 it was 12.1 per cent. premium. The value of the paper currency of the country during the years 1869 and 1870 was apparently appreciated by the increased use of paper money in the South, but chiefly by the establishment of the credit of the United States upon a firm basis. On the first of January, 1871, the last-named fact was fully accomplished, and since that time the appreciation of the paper currency has been due wholly to the increased demand for it in the business affairs of the country. The difference between the value of paper money at the present moment and its value on the first of December, 1870, may be attributed to the latter cause, and furnishes the best means which the country has yet had for ascertaining the quantity of paper currency which can be used and its value kept at par with gold.

The result of this test concurs with what seems to me to be the best opinion upon the subject, that the amount of paper money in circulation is still so great that it cannot be maintained in value at par with coin. There are two modes of relief: One is to reduce the volume of currency, as was recommended by me in my annual report submitted to Congress in December, 1869; the other mode is to await the growth of the country, and the increasing demands of business, which in time will produce the desired result.

The chief means of securing the end sought, without a reduction in the volume of currency, would be the use of paper money upon the Pacific coast. With this object in view, steps have already been taken by this Department for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is practicable to substitute paper for coin, and I have reason to anticipate that a change may be made in the laws relating to National Banks tending to that result, which will not affect unfavorably the general character of the system.

It is my duty to call the attention of Congress to the importance of abolishing the system of shares in moieties, as far as the benefits inure to revenue officers, and other persons officially connected with the Government. This measure was recommended in my last annual report, and a statement was submitted to Congress showing the amount received by officers of customs, together with a bill increasing their salaries without any increase of appropriations from the Treasury; the sum now paid from moieties being quite sufficient to place the entire force upon a satisfactory footing in regard to pay.

During the last fiscal year the office of collector and surveyor of the port of New York each received from moieties the sum of $49,215 69, and the naval office the sum of $48,195 59.

In most of the cases the officers do not perform special services entitling them to the amounts granted, and importers and others whose acts are made the subject of investigation, complain, and, I think, with just reason, that the agents of the Government have a pecuniary interest in pursuing those charged with violations of the law. The Government ought to pay fair salaries, and rely upon the good faith of its officers for the performance of their duty. One of the difficulties which the Department has to meet, frequently is, that customs officers have an interest in proceedings for the discovery of fraud, the settlement of cases, or the prosecution of them, which is different from the real interest of the Government; and, as a necessary result, the conduct of such officers is open to suspicion, both on the part of those who are pursued by them, and the Government that they ostensibly represent.

It may be deemed expedient to leave the law as it now stands in regard to informers who are not officers, making it a penal offense for any officer to enter into an arrangement with an informer for any share of the proceeds of the information, and giving to the informer perpetual right of action for the recovery of any money or other valuable thing paid or given to an officer engaged in the discovery or prosecution of a fraud or legal wrong against the Government.

The report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that one hundred and forty-five banks have been organized under the act approved July 12, 1871, providing for the issue of fifty-four millions of dollars of additional bank circulation, and that the sum of $22,333,900 has been issued.

By virtue of the same act, the Treasury has redeemed $22,230,000 of the three per cent. certificates then in circulation, leaving the sum of $23,490,000 now outstanding. I take the liberty of suggesting, that it appears to me to be wise to leave the distribution of the circulation authorized by said act as it now stands.

Should the States that have already received their proportion of circulation be authorized to take what may remain, only a brief period will elapse before a demand will be made from States with limited circulation for an increase. It seems prudent, therefore, to retain the balance of the fifty-four millions for distribution in those States now having a claim to it, on the basis of equality of apportionment.

The details of the subscription to the Loan show that the National Banks, have, upon the whole, acted liberally—more than a hundred millions of dollars having been subscribed for by them on their own account.

It is not unreasonable to tender to these institutions the opportunity to subscribe for bonds under the act of July 14, 1870, to an amount equal to the deposits required of them as security for circulation, and to couple that offer with a provision that, after ninety days, to the extent that the offer may be declined, other banking associations may be formed in the several States where the existing banks shall have failed to make the required subscription, and the circulation transferred from such banks to the new associations.

The banks now organized cannot justly complain, if, having an opportunity to pursue the business upon the new bonds, and declining it, other associations shall succeed to their franchises and rights.

The business of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has been carried on with diligence during the year, and with satisfactory results.

Although some efforts have been made at counterfeiting the special papers used by the Department, they have not been successful, and the specimens captured are so crude as not to excite serious apprehensions as to ultimate success.

Since the first of July, 1869, seventy million sheets of paper have been manufactured, all of which have been accounted for on the books of the Department.

I respectfully recommend that an appropriation be made for a new issue of national bank notes. Those now in use are much worn and very successful counterfeits of several denominations have appeared.

The public building used as a custom-house, court-house, and post office, at Chicago, was destroyed by the great fire on the 8th of October last. The exterior walls remain, and the building could be repaired, but, anticipating the growth of Chicago and the magnitude of its public business, I advise the erection of a building suited to the wants of a first-class city.

It is important that a much larger piece of land should be obtained, either by addition to the present lot or by the purchase of another site. On the 18th of October last, I wrote a letter to Governor Palmer, asking him to recommend to the Legislature the passage of an act granting authority to the courts of the State of Illinois to condemn such land as might be required, in case the Government should be unable to obtain it by purchase at a reasonable price, payment to be made upon an appraisal. In every case, the site for a building erected by the Government for public uses should be large enough to separate it from all other structures, thus furnishing sufficient light for the prosecution of business, and adequate security also against fire and the depredations of lawless persons. It is hardly necessary to say, that in the existing condition of affairs at Chicago, it is important that an appropriation, available during the present fiscal year, should be made without unnecessary delay.

Since my last annual report, the Supervising Architect has completed the custom-house, court-house, and post office, at Portland, Maine; the court-house and post office at Des Moines, Iowa; the court-house and post office at Madison, Wisconsin; the appraisers' stores at Philadelphia; and the assay office at Boise City, Idaho.

It is now expected that the custom-house and post office at St. Paul, Minnesota; the marine hospital at Chicago, Illinois; the court-house and post office at Astoria, Oregon; the custom-house at Machias, Maine; the branch mint at San Francisco, California; and the custom-house at Cairo, Illinois, will be finished and ready for use by the first day of July next. At that time there will remain, in an unfinished condition, the court-house and post office at Columbia, South Carolina; the custom-house at New Orleans, Louisiana; the custom-house at Charleston, South Carolina; the court-house and post office at Knoxville, Tennessee; the custom-house and post office at Portland, Oregon; the court-house and post office at New York; the post office and independent treasury at Boston, and the custom-house and post office at Omaha, Nebraska.

The prosecution of these works—four of which are of great importance—in connection with public buildings to be erected at Chicago, and the erection of marine hospitals at Pittsburg, San Francisco, and New York, will, in my opinion, sufficiently occupy the Supervising Architect of the Treasury and the force at his command. I cannot, therefore, advise appropriations for other public buildings until some of those in process of construction shall have been completed. The points at which the erection or repair of public buildings is most needed are Hartford, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, and St. Louis.

Under an act passed at the last session of Congress, appropriating two hundred thousand dollars for the purpose of more effectually securing life and property on the coasts of New Jersey and Long Island, a careful examination of the coast and of the life-saving stations has been made by experienced officers of the revenue service. In accordance with their report, proposals were invited and accepted for the erection of fourteen new houses on the coast of New Jersey and six upon the coast of Long Island. Repairs are also making upon the old houses on the Long Island coast.

The operations of the coast survey, which are under the administrative direction of this Department, have been prosecuted with the usual energy, as will be seen from the brief report of progress made by the Superintendent, in advance of the usual detailed report, with maps, annually submitted to Congress.

The survey of the Atlantic coast is now rapidly approaching completion, that of the Gulf coast is more than half finished, and the work on the Pacific coast is being pressed forward vigorously.

The estimates submitted substantially conform to the appropriations for the present year. An increase is asked for the item of extending the triangulation across the country to the Pacific ocean, great interest having been manifested by the authorities of the States traversed in the prosecution of the work.

The business entrusted to the Light-House Board is one of the most important branches of the public service in the control of this Department, and I am able to state that it is conducted with fidelity and with reference solely to the maritime interests of the country.

The estimates made by the Light-House Board exceed the appropriations for the present year but they appear to be necessary, and I respectfully recommend them to the consideration of Congress.

Under an act of Congress, approved July 30, 1870, Dr. John M. Woodworth has been appointed Supervising Surgeon of the Marine Hospital Service. His administration is satisfactory to the Department.

The average number of hospital patients for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, was one thousand and sixteen, and for the year ending June 30, 1871, one thousand one hundred and ninety-eight. The total cost of the service for the first-named year was $405,624, being an average, for each patient, of $1 09 per day; and for the latter year $453,082 42, or an average of $1 04 per day.

In the first-named year the hospital tax was $168,153 70, and in the latter year it amounted to $293,592 14.

The Supervising Surgeon is of opinion that pavilion hospitals are better adapted to the successful treatment of the sick than the ordinary buildings of brick and stone, while the expenses are only one-fourth as great.

In accordance with his suggestion, I recommend an appropriation of fifty thousand dollars for the purchase of land and the construction of a pavilion hospital at Pittsburg, Pennsylvania. The present hospital is situated in the vicinity of iron mills and railways, and as it can be sold for about seventy thousand dollars, the Government will be fully reimbursed for the cost of a new hospital, while the comfort of the patients will be promoted.

An estimate has been made that the sum of fifty thousand dollars will be sufficient for the construction of a pavilion hospital on Angel Island, in the Bay of San Francisco, sufficient to accommodate one hundred and fifty patients, and I also recommend an appropriation of that amount for that purpose.

I also respectfully renew the recommendation, made heretofore, for a pavilion hospital near the city of New York sufficient for the accommodation of two hundred patients.

The Revenue Marine Service employs twenty-five steam-vessels and eight sailing vessels. In addition to these, there are two large steamers upon the Lakes, not in commission, and two schooners upon the coast condemned as not fit for duty.

Of the six large steamers upon the Lakes, four only are in commission, and as the others are not needed, I have the honor to recommend that authority be given for their sale.

During the last year four iron steamers have been built—three of two hundred and fifty, and one of three hundred and fifty tons burden. Under the existing appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars, the Department is about to issue proposals for four small iron propellers, two for the Pacific and two for the Atlantic coast.

A further appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars is needed to enable the Department to carry into effect the recommendation of the Commission, whose report was approved by the Department and submitted to Congress May 26, 1870.

The plan recommended by the Commission, when fully adopted, will effect a reduction in the expenses of this branch of the service of about five hundred thousand dollars, or about thirty-four per cent. of the whole cost. The changes proposed contemplate the use of vessels of less tonnage, and a consequent reduction in the number of men employed.

The expenses of the Revenue Marine Service for the year ending June 30, 1871, were $1,251,984 52, against $1,138,393 31 for the preceding year. The first quarter of the present fiscal year shows a reduction in expenses of $83,201 42, as compared with the corresponding period of the preceding year.

At the date of my last report, a board of officers was in session charged with the duty of examining the officers then in active service. The report showed that five captains, ten first lieutenants, nine second lieutenants, and ten third lieutenants, were not qualified for duty. The persons found to be incompetent have been discharged, and their places have been filled by promotion and by the appointment of additional officers, after a competitive examination.

There are several officers in the service who, on account of age, are unfit for active duty. For the supply of officers in their places, and for the increase of the number of engineers, rendered necessary by the substitution of steam for sailing vessels, additional appropriations are required for the next fiscal year. This branch of the public service is, upon the whole, in a satisfactory condition.

During the third session of the 41st Congress a bill was submitted for the organization of a Mint Bureau. The bill passed the Senate but failed in the House of Representatives; though not, as I am informed, from any objection to the principles on which it was framed. I urgently recommend the passage of a similar bill at the present session of Congress. All the Mints and Assay Offices are nominally in charge of the Treasury Department; but there is not, by authority of law, any person in the Department who, by virtue of his office, is supposed to be informed upon the subject; and no one on whom the Secretary of the Treasury can officially rely for information or advice in the management of this important branch of the public business.

It is estimated that the internal commerce of the country is fifteen times as great as our external commerce, but the statistics are not trustworthy or complete; and I respectfully recommend that provision be made for obtaining such returns as will show fully the trade of the country upon the rivers, canals, lakes, and railways.

The report of Mr. Charles Bryant, Special Agent, who has had charge of the fur seal-fishery at the Islands of St. Paul and St. George, shows that the business has been conducted by the Alaska Commercial Company in substantial conformity to the terms of the contract. Mr. Bryant suggests an appropriation for the construction of a house upon each island, for the accommodation of the agents of the Government, who at present are dependent upon the company for board and shelter; and, although I am not aware that any evil has resulted from the arrangement, it is manifest that it ought not to be continued. It is estimated that an appropriation of five thousand dollars will be sufficient for a suitable building on each island.

The agents charged with the management of the seal fishery have been detailed from the customs service. As the full number of agents authorized by law is needed upon customs business, I respectfully recommend that authority be given for the appointment of two agents and two assistant agents, and that a suitable appropriation be made for their salaries and expenses. The necessity of two agents at each island is apparent. The agents will desire to return to the States as often as once in two years; and, moreover, it is wise for the Government to have not less than four persons in its employment connected with the care of the people and the business of the islands.

Mr. Bryant also makes suggestions as to further provision for the care of the natives, which appear to me to deserve consideration.

I again call the attention of Congress to the importance of increasing the salaries of the Bureau Officers and Heads of Division in the Treasury Department.

At present there is great inequality and injustice existing. The First Comptroller receives a salary of five thousand dollars a year, while the Second Comptroller and other Bureau Officers, whose duties are hardly less important, receive only three thousand dollars. The Solicitor of the Treasury is upon a salary of three thousand five hundred dollars, while the Solicitor of Internal Revenue, whose duties are less important, receives a salary of four thousand dollars.

The Heads of Division, in the Internal Revenue, receive salaries of twenty-five hundred dollars per annum, while in every other branch of the Treasury they are selected from fourth class clerks, whose salaries are fixed by law at eighteen hundred dollars a year; although, for several years an appropriation has been made from which the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, has increased the salaries in his own office to twenty-eight hundred dollars per annum.

It is not an exaggeration to say that the head of a division in charge of the loans, of the warrants, or of the sub-treasury accounts, occupies a position in which the country and the world are more concerned than in that of the Collector of Customs at New York; yet the latter officer receives more than fifty thousand dollars a year, while it is with difficulty that the former is able to secure the inadequate sum of twenty-eight hundred dollars.

The same remark might with truth be made of several Bureau Officers, and of persons in the office of the Treasurer of the United States.

In this connection, I also recommend an increase of the salary of the Supervising Surgeon of the Marine Hospitals.

I think it my duty to speak of the provisions of the act creating the Department of Justice, by which the Solicitor of the Treasury and the Solicitor of the Internal Revenue Office are made officers of that Department. The proper and essential duty of the Solicitors is to give advice to the Secretary and Bureau officers upon questions which arise in the daily business of the Department. Under the existing system, the Attorney General is made nominally responsible, while, in fact, he ought to be exempt from all responsibility for the advice given by these officers, that, upon a reference to him of questions which may have been previously considered by them, he may be free to revise or reverse their action. These officers should receive their appointments through the Treasury Department, and be responsible to its head. It is a fundamental error in administration, to place in one of the Departments officers deriving their appointment from another Department.

Should the Attorney General transfer these officers to the Department of Justice, as appears to have been contemplated by the act, this Department would be deprived substantially of their services. I earnestly recommend the restoration of these officers to their former positions in the Treasury.

The examination of persons designated for clerical service, and for promotion in the Treasury Department, has been continued, with beneficial results; and the examination is even more exacting in its requirements than at the date of my last annual report. Means will be taken to extend the system, with such modifications as the difference of duties may suggest, but with equal efficiency, if possible, to the principal custom-houses, and to other branches of the public service under the control of this Department.

On the 28th of February last public notice was given that on the 6th of the following March books would be opened in this country and in Europe for subscriptions to the National Loan, under the act approved July 14, 1870, and the conditions on which the subscriptions would be received were also made known. All the national banks, and a large number of bankers both in this country and in Europe, were authorized to receive subscriptions. The first preference was given to subscribers to the five per cent. bonds, within the limit of two hundred millions of dollars. On the 1st of August the subscriptions amounted to sixty-five millions seven hundred and seventy-five thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, chiefly by the national banks.

Under date of July 14, 1871, a despatch was received from Hon. William A. Richardson, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, then in London, stating that certain bankers in Europe proposed to take the remainder of the two hundred millions of five per cents. upon certain conditions. This proposition was considered and modified, and early in August an agreement was made with Messrs. Jay Cooke & Co., representing bankers in Europe and in the United States. By the terms of the agreement, the parties represented by Messrs. Jay Cooke & Co. had the right to subscribe for the remainder of the two hundred millions of said bonds, by giving notice thereof, at any time previous to the first of April next, and by subscribing for ten millions at once and for an average of at least five millions of dollars of bonds per month during the intervening time, subject to the right of the national banks to subscribe for fifty millions of dollars within sixty days from the 25th day of August.

It was also agreed that the subscriptions should all be made through national banks, and certificates of deposit therefor issued by said banks to the Secretary of the Treasury, bonds to be lodged with the Treasurer of the United States for the amount of the deposit. By a printed circular issued on the 10th of August, 1871, it was announced that national banks making or obtaining subscriptions, payable in coin, would be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as depositaries of public money, on the usual condition of placing in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States bonds of the United States for the security of such deposits; and that, at the commencement of each month, notice would be given of the redemption of an amount of bonds equal to the amount of subscriptions in coin for the preceding month, interest to cease in ninety days from the date of such notice.

It was also stated in the circular that, as the bonds called should mature, the deposits would be drawn from the several banks proportionately.

It was further agreed that the subscribers to the loan should receive as commissions whatever might remain of the half of one per cent. allowed by law upon the two hundred millions, after paying the cost of paper for the bonds, for engraving, printing, advertising, delivery, and all other expenses of the same.

Under this agreement the books were opened in this country and in Europe, and by the last of August subscriptions were obtained for the entire amount offered.

On the first of September public notice was given that certain five-twenty bonds, to the amount of one hundred millions of dollars, of the issue of 1862, specified by number as nearly as was practicable, according to the provisions of the act of July 14, 1870, would be paid on the first of December, and that the interest would cease on that date. Of the bonds so called, more than eighty millions of dollars are now in the possession of the Department; of which amount, seventeen millions of dollars have been paid in coin, and the remainder have been received or deposited in exchange for the five per cent. bonds.

Previous to September five per cent. bonds to the amount of $62,139,550, had been issued and payment made therefor. The work of delivering the bonds subscribed for at that date is now going on, and under such circumstances as to leave no doubt that the whole business will be concluded in a brief period of time.

By the act establishing the national banking system, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to make them depositaries of any public money, except receipts from customs; and the act authorizing the refunding of the national debt directed the Secretary of the Treasury to give three months' notice of the payment of any bonds which, in such notice, might be specified and called for payment. In the same act it was provided that the money received for the new bonds should be used only in payment of bonds outstanding known as five-twenty bonds. The statute proceeded upon the idea that the holders of five-twenty bonds should receive three-months' interest upon their bonds after notice should be given by the Government.

As this notice could be given safely only upon subscriptions already made or secured, the general necessary result, even in case the money were paid into and held in the Treasury of the United States, would be a loss of interest for three months.

On the 1st of August last the demand for the new bonds had nearly ceased; but, by the agreement referred to, the necessary loss to the Government incident to the refunding of the public debt was made the means of securing subscriptions to the amount of about one hundred and thirty millions of dollars.

The banks, or those represented by the banks, derived an advantage in the use of the amount of their subscriptions for three months, but this without other loss to the Government than what was incident to the negotiation of the loan under the law.

I am informed by Judge Richardson, and such is my own opinion, that the most serious obstacle in the way of negotiating the four and four-and-a-half per cent. bonds in Europe is the inadequacy of the commissions allowed. When the circular of the 28th of February last was issued, one or two leading European bankers declined to act as agents, and I am persuaded that others who accepted the agency failed to give that attention to the business which would have been bestowed upon it had the commissions corresponded more nearly to those usually received by them for the negotiation of public loans. The credit of the country is fully established in every financial centre of Europe, and the bonds of the United States can be negotiated at their market value in a larger number of cities than the bonds of any other country in the world. Under these circumstances, I think it my duty to advise such an allowance for commissions upon the four and four-and-a-half per cent. bonds as will secure the negotiation of them with the least possible delay. It needs no analysis of the subject to show that the interests of the country will be greatly promoted by the proceeding, even though the commissions should seem to be unnecessarily large. I also recommend that authority be given for the payment of interest in London. This can be done without the least cost or risk to the Government.

Returns for the fiscal year 1870-'71 show that the ocean commerce of the United States is passing rapidly into the hands of foreign merchants and shipbuilders. In the year 1860, nearly seventy-one per cent. of the foreign commerce of this country was in American ships; in 1864, it had fallen to forty-six per cent.; in 1868, to forty-four per cent.; and in 1871, it is reported at less than thirty-eight per cent.

The loss of the shipping of the United States is due chiefly to two causes—first, the destruction of American vessels by rebel cruisers during the war; and, secondly, the substitution of iron steamships for the transportation of freight and passengers upon the ocean, in place of sailing vessels and steamships built of wood.

When the war opened English builders of iron steamships had acquired considerable proficiency, and since that period the art has been carried to higher perfection in Great Britain than in any other part of the world. It is stated that the superiority of British machinery and knowledge of the business by British mechanics give an advantage over American shipbuilders equal at least to ten per cent. upon the cost of construction. They possess additional advantages in the cost of labor, the cost of iron, coal, and other materials, and in the rate of interest upon the capital employed, equal in all to about twenty per cent. more, so that the difference in favor of British shipbuilders is at least thirty per cent.

In considering the means for the restoration of our ocean commerce, two facts must be accepted: First, that it is useless to attempt to revive it with wooden ships; and, secondly, that iron ships moved by sails cannot compete with iron ships propelled by steam. Hence, the only practical questions for consideration are these: Can the construction of iron steamships be established in this country, and, if so, by what means?

The trans-ocean commerce of the United States would employ about six million tons of shipping, if each vessel made but one round voyage in a year. The value of our exports and imports has already reached the sum of nearly eleven hundred millions of dollars, and during the present decade it will exceed fifteen hundred millions of dollars annually. The annual returns for freight and passengers are about one hundred millions of dollars.

The history of the loss of our commerce, as shown in the statistics already given, renders it certain that without some efficient action on the part of the Government, the entire foreign trade of the country will soon pass into the hands of our rivals.

The monopoly of the trade between the United States and Europe by foreign merchants and shipbuilders carries with it the monopoly of shipbuilding for the entire world, and, as a consequence, the Atlantic trade, the trade of the Pacific, and the seas adjacent thereto, will be carried on in English-built steamers.

An alteration of the law by which foreign-built vessels may be admitted to American registry will furnish no adequate relief. On the contrary, the change would stimulate shipbuilding in England, while the prospect of establishing it on this continent would diminish in proportion to the prosperity of the business in the ship-yards of our rivals.

In view of the facts of our extensive coast upon the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and our position with reference to Europe and Asia, the country ought not to be satisfied with any policy which does not look to the establishment and continuance of shipbuilding in the United States, the encouragement of our own seamen and merchants, and the control of so much, at least, of the commerce of the world as is derived from the export of our products and the importation of articles required for domestic consumption.

The removal of duties upon foreign articles used in the construction of iron steamships, or the allowance of a drawback equal to the amount of duties paid, will not, in the existing condition of things, secure the reestablishment of the business. But were it otherwise, the removal of duties or the allowance of drawback raises practical questions of great difficulty, while any concession by an indirect process is likely in the end to prove unnecessarily expensive to the country. Several of the existing lines of European steamers were established by the aid of Government subsidies. They are still encouraged by the same means; and it is unreasonable to expect that our merchants and shipbuilders can successfully compete with this formidable combination, unless they are supported by the power of their own Government.

After careful consideration of the whole subject, I am prepared to advise the passage of a law guaranteeing to persons who may employ in the foreign trade American-built first-class iron steamships of not less than two thousand tons burden each, an annual payment, for the period of five years, of the sum of thirteen dollars per ton. The subsidy should be proportionately less to vessels of lower classification.

In making this recommendation, I do not assume that there is no other practicable method of restoring our commerce, but I present it as the method which appears to me to be the most efficient and economical.

Connected with this plan, it will be wise to consider whether the ships may not be so constructed as to be available for naval purposes, and, in case of war, subject to the right of the United States to take them upon payment of their appraised value. A similar suggestion was made by the Secretary of the Navy in his report for the year 1869. They should also be required to carry the mails upon moderate terms, or in consideration of the subsidy.

The use of sailing vessels and steamers built of wood may be continued successfully in the coasting trade, the trade with the British possessions, and upon the rivers and lakes of the country; but any effort to regain our former position upon the ocean by their agency must end disastrously.

I entertain the opinion that the policy suggested will be effectual, and that in a comparatively short period our mechanics and artisans will acquire equal skill with those of England, and that we shall not only have the aid of the best machinery now in use elsewhere, but that important improvements will be made, calculated to place the country in a position of superiority.

We shall also be able to test practically the quality of American iron, which, for the purpose of shipbuilding, is represented as better than that used in Great Britain.

If it shall appear, as is claimed, that American iron is about ten per cent. better than the iron used in England, an advantage will be secured, not only in the diminished cost of the vessels, but also in the increased tonnage capacity of American ships of equal dimensions over those constructed with inferior materials.

Accepting as a truth, established by experience, that the ocean commerce of the world is to be carried on in iron steamships, we must consider and decide whether the United States shall disappear from the list of maritime nations, or whether, by a determined and practical effort, we can regain the position which we occupied previous to the late rebellion.

.OF
THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

MR. PRESIDENT: The reorganization of the Army required by the act of July 15, 1870, the provisions of which were alluded to in my last annual report, has been accomplished. The enforcement of that portion relating to a reduction of commissioned officers demanded strict investigation of the records of the military conduct and service of supernumerary officers, and forced upon the Department an unpleasant duty. It is believed, however, that the decisions finally reached were fair, impartial and for the good of the service. In accordance with the same act the number of enlisted men was on July 1 reduced to 30,000; indifferent soldiers were discharged, the standard of recruits was raised with a view to improving the character of the rank and file, and the following table of organization was established :

Enlisted men of engineers.....	301
Enlisted men of ordnance	475
Ordnance sergeants at posts.....	200
Military Academy band.....	24
60 enlisted men per company for 55 companies artillery.....	3,300
84 enlisted men per battery for 5 batteries light artillery.....	420
81 enlisted men per company for 120 companies cavalry.....	10,080
67 enlisted men per company for 250 companies infantry.....	15,000
Non-commissioned staff of regiments.....	200

The staff of general officers was also reduced to the simple requirements of the Army in time of peace, and the line officers thus relieved from detached duty were ordered to their regiments where they could be of more benefit to the service.

The total expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, were $80,644,042 76; the expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1870, were $57,655,675 40, which sum includes $3,697,500 for river and harbor improvements. The expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1871, were about $40,000,000, including for river and harbor improvements $3,945,900. Thus during the year 1869-'70 the reduction in expenses of the War Department amounted to $22,988,367 36, and during the year 1870-'71 a further reduction of $17,655,675 40 was made. For the next fiscal year 1871-'72 there is appropriated $36,530,776, including for river and harbor improvements $4,407,500.

The total estimate for military appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, is $32,415,472 85. Of this estimate the sum of $1,153,607 05 is necessitated by the prohibition of the use of unexpended balances of former years, thus requiring estimates for reappropriation of such sums as have reverted to the Treasury under the fifth section of the act of July 12, 1870. The estimate of the Chief of Engineers for fortifications, improvement of rivers and harbors, public buildings and grounds and Washington Aqueduct, are submitted separately, as presented by that officer, as follows: Fortifications and other works of defense $3,255,500; for river and harbor improvements $9,930,200; and for public buildings and grounds and Washington Aqueduct $446,704.

Up to this date, during the current fiscal year, there has been paid into the Treasury, as realized from the sale of arms and from other sources, during the current fiscal year, $21,766,403 07.

Under the act of July 27, 1861, providing for the adjustment and payment of the claims of the several States for enrolling, subsisting, and other expenses incurred by them for troops called into the service of the United States, these claims were paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The act of July 12, 1870, repeals the appropriation clause of the act of July 27, 1861, and requires the proper Department to submit estimates for these expenses, in the usual manner. I have accordingly submitted an estimate of $3,000,000 for this purpose, that being the amount designated by the Third Auditor of the Treasury as being required for the settlement of claims now pending in his office for the next fiscal year.

The reports of the General of the Army and of the division and department commanders, herewith submitted, will convince the country that the officers and men of the Army have performed the duties devolving upon them faithfully and well. Though these duties, resulting from the determination of the Government to enforce the laws for the collection of the revenue and for the suppression of armed insurrection, have few agreeable features, they are performed with that cheerful energy which is the result of discipline. The records of the Department show that one hundred applications for troops for various purposes, and for military protection, have been made since January 1, 1871, all of which, where the necessity required it, have been promptly responded to.

It is with great embarrassment and difficulty that the appropriations made at the last session of Congress—reduced as they were below the estimates of the Department—can be so economized as to answer the pressing requirements of the service. The operations of active warfare in Arizona, in connection with Indian difficulties there, are such as necessarily require large expenditures, and the causes which have produced this necessity were not anticipated by Congress when the appropriations were made. The officers in charge of these operations—General

Schofield, commanding the Division of the Pacific, and Colonel Crook, in immediate command of the Department of Arizona—have united with this Department in endeavoring to retain the expenses at the lowest possible limit, and have used the most judicious efforts in this direction, and the conduct of Colonel Crook in his administration of the affairs of his department has received my full approval. While, therefore, the full appropriations asked should be given, continued endeavor will be made to prevent any expenditures beyond those absolutely essential.

I recommend that the extra lieutenants now authorized by law to serve as regimental adjutants and quartermasters in the artillery, cavalry, and infantry regiments, as provided by sections 2, 3, and 4 of the act of July 23, 1866, be discontinued as vacancies occur in those grades. This would effect an ultimate reduction of eighty lieutenants; would result in a yearly saving, if the reduction should be completed, of nearly $160,000, and would be of no detriment to the service.

It is further recommended that the grade of quartermaster-sergeant for the companies of cavalry, infantry, and heavy artillery be abolished. The duties of this non-commissioned officer before the late war were usually discharged by the first sergeant, and the present strength of a company is such that a return to the old system in this respect can well be made.

With regard to the grades of enlisted men known as company artificer and company wagoner, the state of the service is now such as to justify the recommendation that they too be discontinued and their duties devolved upon a smaller number of private soldiers, detailed for extra-duty service and employed under direction of the Quartermaster Department. Should this recommendation be adopted, 1,165 enlisted men would be dispensed with, at a gross yearly saving of $412,740. From this deduct the probable cost of extra-duty men, estimated at two-thirds the number of artificers and wagoners—$72,240—and the net saving will be over $340,000.

By the act of March 3, 1863, the first six regiments of cavalry are each allowed one veterinary surgeon at a compensation of $75 per month. By the act of July 28, 1866, the four other cavalry regiments are provided with the same organization, with the additional allowance of one veterinary surgeon to each, at a compensation of $100 per month; that is to say, two veterinary surgeons are allowed to each of the latter regiments, one at a salary of $75 per month and the other at $100. To remedy this defective organization, I recommend that two veterinary surgeons be authorized for each cavalry regiment, at a compensation of $100 per month, and that the provisions of the acts above cited be repealed.

In the general regulations of the Army, of 1863, a plan is presented by which soldiers who are frugal enough to save their pay shall have a safe deposit for it. The outline is simply this: Not less than five dollars may be deposited at any one time with the paymaster, at pay-day when a check-book will be given the soldier in which the amount of deposit will be entered. These deposits cannot be drawn till the discharge of the soldier. They are not subject to forfeiture by sentence of court-martial, but belong to the personal estate of the soldier, voluntarily confided by him to the trust of the United States, until he receives final payment on discharge. The benefits of this plan are various. It prevents the vicious practice of confiding money to commissioned officers for safe keeping, which injures discipline by the invariable disputes engendered, and it avoids the lumbering of the pay-rolls by constant entry of pay not drawn.

By the restriction contained in section 7, act of July 12, 1870, which was interpreted by the Treasury Department to apply to these deposits, it became necessary to issue an order for rescinding this regulation, and to cause all the deposits to be drawn from the Treasury by soldiers holding check-books. The amount was considerable, and it is feared many men were induced to desert by thus coming into possession of unusually large sums during their term of service, instead of receiving them when discharged. It is recommended that provision be made to meet this unexpected application of the legislative restriction that the benefits of the regulation may be restored to the soldier.

The law authorizing the enlistment of men who are eighteen years of age, and by its language "the oath of enlistment taken by the recruit shall be conclusive as to his age." The appeals to the Department for the discharge of soldiers are almost numberless. The force of clerks employed upon this branch of office duty is not sufficient to answer the repeated applications for discharge, which fill the Department mails, and the stereotype refusal which must in most cases be given only stimulates the applicant to obtain renewed appeals from persons of influence and character, who willingly apply to the Department, with a request for assistance, without reflecting upon the embarrassment which is given, or upon the cost of a result so easily recommended and so difficult to justify. The enlistment of each recruit and the cost of transportation to his regiment involves an average expense of $80 in each case. By his discharge this amount is a total loss to the Government.

The greater number of those for whom this costly favor is asked are under the age of 21 years, and in this connection I recommend that the law regarding enlistments be amended, and that no recruit be permitted to enter the service whose age, by his own oath, is not shown to be over 21 years—the oath, as now, to be taken as conclusive.

Experience shows that the age of enlistment for music boys can, with advantage, be reduced, and it is advised that the law be so amended that hereafter enlistments in that class of recruits may be made at the age of twelve years.

It was found impossible to prepare, in time for submission to Congress at its last session, a system of regulations for the administration of the affairs of the Army, as contemplated by the act of July 15, 1870. A board of competent and experienced officers has been for some months diligently engaged in the compilation of a code of regulations, and the work is rapidly approaching completion.

Desertions during the past few months have largely increased. The reports received at the Department indicate that the reduction of the pay of soldiers from sixteen to thirteen dollars per month has contributed greatly to this result, as far as those men are concerned who enlisted prior to July 1, 1871, the date of reduction.

The board of officers directed to investigate the subject of military prisons and prison discipline in the British army, visited, last summer, the only military prison now in Canada, viz, the one at Quebec, and through the courtesy of the Inspector, Colonel H. F. Williams, were enabled to witness its practical workings. The board were very favorably impressed with the good results obtained from this system, which has now been fifteen years in operation in the British service, and recommend its adoption in our own. I invite the attention of Congress to this subject, believing it to be of great importance to the efficiency of our Army, which is greatly impaired by the inadequate and imperfect means of punishment now practiced. By having the pay of the convicts forfeited to the prisons, but little, if any, additional means would be required to support them after they were put in operation. The report of the board is full of interest and will hereafter be transmitted to Congress.

The retired list of the Army is now limited to 300. The endeavor has been to equalize the selections for that list from both the higher and lower grades of the officers entitled to be placed upon it, so that it may not be filled to an unreasonable extent by officers of high rank and consequently greater compensation. There have been sixteen deaths of retired officers during the past year.

By the act approved September 28, 1850, appropriation was made of $10,000 for purchasing, walling, and ditching a piece of land near the city of Mexico, for a cemetery for such of the officers and soldiers of our Army as fell in battle or died in and around that city during the Mexican war, and for the interment of American citizens who have died there.

In December, 1869, a report was made by the vice-consul of the United States at the city of Mexico, to the effect that, in consequence of neglect and the want of means for repairs, many depredations were being committed, and that the cemetery presented a lamentable appearance of dilapidation. An appeal was made to this Department for funds to the amount of about $1,150 to be sent to the consul to enable him to restore the cemetery to a condition creditable to the United States Government. The War Department was fortunately able to meet the temporary demand, but could not comply with a further suggestion for the employment of a superintendent at a salary of $50 per month instead of $20, the rate heretofore paid and which is deemed insufficient. By the act of July 21, 1852, there was appropriated $1,412 34, and by the act of August 31, 1852, $3,000 for the purchase of the cemetery, under the direction of the President, and these sums were all disbursed by the Department of State. It is recommended that, as the general subject of national cemeteries is now administered by the War Department, a special act be passed placing this cemetery upon the same footing as other cemeteries, with a regularly appointed superintendent, and that a sufficient portion of the appropriations for national cemeteries be made applicable to the repair and preservation of the one in question. The latest report of the condition of the cemetery shows that, with the temporary aid afforded by this Department, its condition was very materially improved. An appropriation of $1,200 is asked by the United States consul to complete the repairs and to construct an artesian well for irrigation, to preserve the shrubbery and save the annual tax for water.

By the tenth section of the act of July 15, 1870, the Secretary of War was required to investigate into what are known as the Montana Indian war claims of 1867, and to report to Congress the names of the persons entitled to relief, together with a statement of the facts and sums upon which such report may be based. The investigation was confided to an inspector general of the Army, whose report, setting forth the nature and amount of the claims and the amount required for an equitable settlement of them, was submitted to Congress at the last session and commended to favorable consideration.

To complete the investigation, there remained to be submitted a list of the persons entitled to relief and a statement of the award equitably due to each claimant. This list, when nearly finished, was, with most of the papers connected with the case, destroyed in the late fire at Chicago. A greater part of the original vouchers, however, had been returned to their owners after certified copies had been taken, and new copies can consequently be obtained. The claimants have been called upon by advertisement to furnish such copies, or, in default thereof, to file statements of their claims, and in this way the lost evidence will be measurably renewed. With these papers and such data as survived, a new report of awards can be made which will probably prove as reliable as the one destroyed. This report will be laid before Congress without material delay, its early preparation depending wholly upon the promptness with which claimants respond to the invitation to replace their evidence.

Under the joint resolution approved May 7, 1870, authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to select and set apart for a permanent military post so much of the military reservation of Fort Snelling, not less than 1,000 acres, as the public interests might require for that purpose, and to quiet the title to said reservation, and to settle all claims in relation thereto, and for the use and occupation thereof upon principles of equity, I have selected and set apart for a permanent military post at Fort Snelling 1,521 $\frac{20}{100}$ acres, embracing the fort and buildings pertaining, and in full settlement and release of all claims in relation thereto, and for the use and occupation thereof, have conveyed to the purchasers of the property the remainder of the reservation, amounting to 6,394 $\frac{3}{100}$ acres.

The proceeds of sales of clothing from June 30, 1870, to the present date amount to the sum of $1,875,728 84, all of which, as collected, is turned into the Treasury and cannot be used by the Department. Some of the purchasers have not been able, on account of the disastrous effects of the Chicago fire to meet their engagements promptly, but the time of payment has been extended. A great amount of old clothing and equipage is unfit for Army use, and hence larger appropriations will become necessary. The cost of transportation for this year has been about $1,500,000, which is but little less than for the previous year. The reduced Army is compelled to increased activity to compensate for its loss in numbers.

The appropriation for barracks and quarters has not been sufficient to shelter the Army in a manner essential to its comfort and health, and hence it is earnestly desired that the appropriation asked for that purpose may not be reduced.

Of the southern railroads which were allowed to purchase rolling stock and other railroad supplies from the United States, twenty-seven have paid in full, and twenty-four are still in debt to the Department in the sum of $4,724,350 53.

In the office of the Quartermaster General large numbers of miscellaneous claims for transportation and for stores taken and used by the Army in certain States and Territories, under the act of July 4, 1864, have been filed and final action had as far as possible. These claims amount to many millions of dollars, and the large interests involved require that there should be more care taken of these important records than can be given them in the present building, in which a fire would be disastrous.

The number of graves in national cemeteries is 317,850, including 2,225 added during the year. The cemeteries cover an area, in the aggregate, of about 1,800 acres of land, acquired at a cost of $170,000.

The attention of Congress is asked to the loss and embarrassment resulting from the condition of the title to sites of military posts in Texas. The law forbids the purchase by the Secretary of War of any lands without special authority from Congress. New posts on the remote and unsettled frontier of that State have generally been located on the public lands belonging to the State, as there are no public lands available owned by the United States in Texas. As soon as this Department begins to erect shelter for the troops, speculators enter these lands, and hence claims arise for rent and timber to an amount far beyond their value. An act authorizing the Department to quiet title to sites already occupied, and to purchase such as may hereafter be required, is necessary to remedy the evil.

The report of the Commissary General of Subsistence shows that the Army has been well supplied during the past year. I agree with him that according to the varying necessities of troops stationed in the different climates of the country, there should be authorized for issue substitute articles, so that the food of the soldier may be at times varied from the regular ration. Since the last annual report a detailed statement has been furnished the Department of the Interior of the expenses incurred in the fiscal year of 1869-'70 by the Subsistence Department in furnishing supplies for Indians, which shows the amount to have been over $1,600,000, of which $1,200,000 has been repaid by transfer at the Treasury. It is desirable that appropriations for the subsistence of Indians, when necessary, be made for the disposition of the Interior Department, as the subsistence fund of this Department, based upon the appropriation actually necessary for the support of the Army, is not large enough to allow any portion to be diverted from its legitimate use without embarrassment to the service.

Owing to the deficiency existing in the clerical force of the Surgeon General's Office, a large number of official demands for information from the records of the office for the settlement of pension and other claims have remained unanswered. Under the act of Congress authorizing the appointment of hospital stewards, that force has been strengthened, and it is hoped that the accumulated work will be rapidly disposed of. There were 206 military posts requiring medical attendance on July 1, 1870. The number of medical officers is insufficient for the service, and I renew the recommendation that the law prohibiting promotions and appointments in that corps be repealed.

Part First of the Medical and Surgical History of the War is near completion, and will be laid before Congress during its coming session, when it is hoped sufficient appropriation will be made to continue the publication of the remaining parts. The report of the Medical Statistics of the Provost Marshal General's Bureau, the compilation of which was authorized by the act of July 28, 1866, is also nearly completed and is in process of being printed at the Government Printing Office. It is expected that the entire report will be printed and ready for distribution during the approaching session.

The Corps of Engineers during the past year has been actively engaged upon the works for the defense of our sea-coasts, on river and harbor improvements, and in surveys and reconnaissances and construction of light-houses. With the appropriations granted for fortifications in our principal harbors, these works along the Northern Atlantic and Pacific coasts have been pushed forward in their modifications as rapidly as the circumstances would permit, and already the batteries are beginning to assume the character needed by the requirements of modern warfare. The modifications referred to look to the strengthening of our works by the introduction of heavy earthen batteries for the largest guns and mortars.

Since the last report the battalion of engineers has been reduced to 354 enlisted men, and constitutes an efficient body of troops, and is carefully instructed and drilled in its duties. The engineer posts and depots of Jefferson Barracks and Yerba Buena Island have been broken up and the troops are now concentrated at Willet's Point and West Point, New York. Besides assisting in the instruction of the cadets of the Military Academy, the battalion of engineers constitutes the school for the trials with torpedoes for the defense of our harbors, and takes charge of the depots for the bridge-trains and equipage and engineer tools for the use of the Army in general. The appropriation asked for torpedoes and other purposes at the engineer depot at Willet's Point and recommended to Congress.

A visit made to Willet's Point in September last gave me an opportunity for inspecting closely the management of the post, and for observing the advantages offered the men in drill and discipline, and in the education necessary for that arm of the service. The result was very gratifying. The thorough mode of instruction and the perfected drill of the battalion deserve commendation.

Satisfactory progress has been made in the prosecution of works for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and of the surveys connected therewith. The annual report of the Chief of Engineers contains a detailed account of the progress and condition of these works, and of the results of the surveys ordered by Congress. This report also contains information concerning the public buildings and grounds and the Washington Aqueduct.

Proper measures have been taken to carry out the joint resolution of February 21, 1871, in relation to the establishment of water-gauges, and making daily observations of the rise and fall of the Lower Mississippi and its chief tributaries.

Under the act of April 4, 1871, for the appointment by the President, of a commission to examine and report on the Sutro tunnel, Lieutenant Colonels H. G. Wright and John G. Foster, of the Corps of Engineers, and Professor Wesley Newcomb, a mining engineer, were thus appointed, and Captain W. R. King, Corps of Engineers, was directed to act as secretary to the commission. The commission has completed the investigations at the tunnel and the mines of the Comstock lode, and is now preparing to report.

In the survey of the lakes, operations were carried on in Lakes Superior, Michigan, St. Clair, and Champlain, and the progress of the work in the field and office has been highly satisfactory. The geological survey along the central route of communication with the Pacific coast has been actively continued, and the publication of the results, already begun, is looked for with much interest.

During the fiscal year small-arms and ordnance stores to the amount of $10,000,000 have been sold, and the entire proceeds, except a small sum retained to meet expense of preparing other stores for sale, have passed into the Treasury beyond the control of this Department. The operations at the arsenals have been confined to the manufacture of supplies required by the troops, to the care of stores on hand, and to the manufacture of one or two experimental gun-carriages. It is hoped that Congress will grant the appropriations asked for to carry out the plans for the continuance of the work at the great arsenal of construction for the Mississippi Valley at Rock Island. Several kinds of experimental rifles and carbines, as recommended by the St. Louis board, have been manufactured at Springfield armory for comparative trial in the field. An inspection of that armory, not long since, satisfies me of the necessity for continuing the appropriations for its maintenance and support. The ability of its present administration especially commends this well-appointed armory to the attention of Congress.

Sufficient information will doubtless be derived from the use of the experimental arms in the field, to enable a board to recommend a breech-loading system for adoption. The armament of State troops should be like that of the national forces, who now use breech-loading small arms. The reserve of 10,000 arms of that kind now on hand is not half sufficient to supply the States upon quotas now due.

Attention is called to the recommendation of the Chief of Ordnance concerning the repeal of the act prohibiting promotions and appointments in the Ordnance Corps.

An increase of the annual appropriations under the law of 1808, providing for arming and equipping the militia is urgently required.

The small clerical force allowed the office of the Judge Advocate General of the Army is not sufficient to perform the great amount of labor required to copy, on the demand of persons who have been tried, the voluminous proceedings of the courts-martial in their cases. The duty is an imperative one under the law, but the force is inadequate to its accomplishment, as may easily be seen upon an inspection of the record of the vast amount of work performed in that office. I recommend the continuance of the appropriation by which special copyists could be employed for this purpose.

At Fort Whipple, Virginia, instruction has been given in the meteorological duties and studies required at the signal-stations for observations and reports of storms throughout the United States, and in military signaling and telegraphy to officers of the Army and Navy. During the year the observation and report of storms has been necessarily rather in the process of organization for future success than as completely organized. A duty without precedent has had to be originated in all its details of plans and discipline—the observation, reports, and mode of making public the necessary deductions and reports. The progress made has been fully as great as could have been anticipated, and has secured valuable results and gives promise of extended usefulness.

By a comprehensive telegraphic organization each of the signal-stations is in telegraphic communication with the Signal Office at Washington, and from each of them daily and nightly weather reports are received at the Department. These reports are studied, bulletined, and charted at the office of the Chief Signal Officer, and are furnished at the same time to most of the principal cities and ports of the country. The deductions from the study of the reports are instantly telegraphed to the press and bulletined as soon as practicable at the observing offices, in board of trade rooms, merchants' exchanges, and other prominent places, and during the past year there have issued in this manner from the Chief Signal Office and the observing stations fifty thousand charts.

In the month of October the display of cautionary signals, announcing the probable approach of storms, was commenced, for the first time in the United States, at twenty ports upon the lakes and Atlantic and Gulf coasts. These signals are arranged to be displayed at any hour of the day or night, upon the receipt of telegraphic orders from Washington.

While the service has been rapidly organized and pressed to these results, each step has been taken only when the public mind seemed to be educated and prepared for it, and the public necessity demanded it. The average time of the receipt by telegraph of the reports and observations made simultaneously from all the stations throughout the United States has been 45 minutes. The average time elapsing between the moment at which telegrams were sent to the office at Washington from the most distant stations, to that at which the deductions are made, published, and issued to the press, has been 90 minutes.

Of the deductions published from the office, 69 per cent. are, after a careful examination of the statistics, considered to have been fully verified. This percentage, increased by those regarded as partially verified, will make an aggregate of 90 per cent. of average verifications.

It has been the policy of the Department to diffuse, as widely as possible, for the use of co-operating institutions, and for scientific study everywhere, the meteorological information collected at its stations and upon its records. It is believed that the United States now possesses a service more extensive and better organized for these purposes than that of any other country.

The steadiness, regularity, and promptness with which the varied labors incident to a work co-extensive with the United States, and which requires in its details a vigilance reaching through both night and day, have been accomplished, illustrate the advantages gained by placing these duties under military direction. A rigor less than that of military discipline would fail to insure the accuracy and strict obedience to orders which have been necessary.

Under the second section of the act of July 24, 1866, to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, the Postmaster General has fixed the rates at which telegraphic communications for the Government shall be sent. The plan and method of compensation have worked well, and are found to be of much economy to the signal service.

The wisdom of Congress in affording facilities for its prosecution is daily exemplified. The labors of this branch of the Department, undertaken with some hesitation as to the result and received at first with doubt in many quarters, have gradually grown into popular favor, and by the really wonderful results accomplished in this new field have commanded the attention and approval of the country. The fact that the reports daily issued find in most cases full confirmation, impresses itself on the minds of the people, and men of all callings, especially those engaged in commerce and agriculture, evince the greatest interest in this important work. Full recognition of its value has been given by the press and by the scientific men of other countries as well as of our own, and the results attained so clearly indicate its importance that I can, without hesitation, rely upon Congress for an appropriation for the prosecution and extension of its duties to the full extent of the estimate submitted.

By law the control of the Military Academy at West Point is devolved upon the Secretary of War. For some years past its immediate management had been intrusted to an officer of the Inspector General's Department, who faithfully discharged his duties. Feeling, however, that, for his better information and that he might more efficiently perform the duties that this responsibility placed upon him, there should be a more direct communication between the Secretary of War and the Academy, the system was changed, and now all reports are made directly to this office.

The present strength of the Corps of Cadets at the Academy is 229. Several instances of improper interference by cadets with their fellows have occurred, but the offenders have been summarily dealt with, and strenuous exertions have been made by the Department to prevent the recurrence of such disorders, and to improve generally the tone of military discipline. Legislation on the subject of the expenses of the Board of Visitors is desirable, as under existing laws for the payment of the board and lodging of the members, doubts arise as to what is properly to be included under the head of board. A per diem allowance would remove this uncertainty, and it is recommended that such an allowance be made in the next appropriation.

By the fire at the cadet barracks last winter, many cadets who were engaged, under the direction of their officers, in extinguishing the flames, suffered the loss of clothing, books, &c., and an appropriation is recommended to compensate them for such losses. The sum necessary for this purpose will not exceed six thousand dollars, and should be confined to compensation for their clothing and books.

The intelligence of the great fire of October in Chicago reached the Department while the flames were in progress, and orders were at once telegraphed to officers in charge of Army depots to forward to that city supplies for the homeless and destitute. The promptness with which the wishes of the Department were carried out, merits high commendation. In a few hours, clothing, blankets, tents, and provisions were on their way to the stricken city, and this immediate action relieved much distress. The records and property in the building occupied for headquarters of the Military Division of the Missouri were totally destroyed, but the greater portion of the most valuable can be duplicated from the War Department. Several companies of troops were ordered to the city by General Sheridan, under whose supervision they assisted in preserving order during the trying days which succeeded the conflagration. The official and personal conduct of General Sheridan, while intrusted, by common consent, with the management of affairs in the city, receives the emphatic approval of this Department.

Similar issues of supplies of various kinds were made to the governor of Wisconsin for the relief of the sufferers in that State, and relief was also afforded to those in Michigan. Without further application, Congress will, without doubt, record its sanction of this action.

A perfect system of financial disbursements is a subject which, from the beginning of the Government, has commanded the attention of all the Departments; and the discovery of the astounding frauds, which have startled the country by their magnitude, has recalled attention anew to the causes which have combined to permit these dishonest actions to go so long undetected. No system of regulations can be devised which will make embezzlement, under all circumstances, impossible. The rogue is always vigilant. Counter-vigilance alone can thwart his schemes. The regulations now governing disbursements appear to be ample for the prevention of fraud. The failure to enforce them makes the path to fraud an easy one. The daring deceptions lately practiced provoke an inquiry as to some mode for the prevention of their recurrence. Relaxed duty, failing vigilance, and excessive confidence suspend all checks on dishonesty, and render regulations a farce. A careful scrutiny, by frequent inspections of the accounts of disbursing officers and of their cash balances, followed up, without loss of time, by a comparison of the result of this searching inspection with the officer's balance at the place of deposit, is clearly the only safe resort. The objection that a sentinel is thereby placed at every disbursing officer's door is not entitled to consideration. Integrity does not object to test. It invites scrutiny. An honest public officer prefers that his discretion should be limited. He accepts responsibility when it comes, but he cheerfully submits to any examination of his public conduct, deeming it no reproach that he is subjected to the operation of an inflexible rule, which the dishonest acts of others have made a necessity. Men of large experience as disbursing officers have told me that they do not remember a single defalcation which might not have been prevented or speedily detected by the exercise of proper vigilance on the part of the supervising officer. In this he does not transcend his duty. He only performs it.

Why the necessity of furnishing duplicate statements to different Departments if no comparison is made? When the shock of discovery comes, and a great fraud is made manifest, it is clear that there is neglect somewhere. Is it in the regulations and orders and circulars issued for the prevention of these very frauds? Not at all; but in the disregard of supervising officers of their provisions. The vigilance which these circulars prompt, would, if exercised, furnish a different result. Holding these views as to the necessity for frequent inspections, and recognizing their great advantages, I propose, in this Department, to test their efficacy in the most thorough manner. In assigning inspectors to districts, I shall deem it my duty to hold each one of them responsible for every misdemeanor which occurs in connection with the accounts of any disbursing officer in his district, which due diligence on his part would have prevented, so that he will feel that he has a trust with which he dare not trifle. A plan of inspection can, in my judgment, be established, which will be simple and direct, and I shall endeavor to show by its operation that it is eminently practicable. With detection made morally certain, and with punishment sure and speedy, there can be no safety for fraud.

The proclamation of the President of May 3, 1871, calling attention to the act of Congress entitled "An act to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and for other purposes," approved April 20, 1871, necessitated orders for the enforcement of the same by this Department, and consequently it was directed—

That whenever occasion shall arise, the regular forces of the United States stationed in the vicinity of any locality where offenses described by the aforesaid act, approved April 20, 1871, may be committed, shall, in strict accordance with the provisions of said act, be employed by their commanding officers in assisting the authorized civil authorities of the United States in making arrests of persons accused under the said act; in preventing the rescue of persons arrested for such cause; in breaking up and dispersing bands of disguised marauders and of armed organizations against the peace and quiet or the lawful pursuits of the citizens in any State.

It has been absolutely necessary to retain about one-sixth of the Army in those States of the South, east of the Mississippi, which were engaged in the war of the rebellion. Numerous applications for troops to aid in the enforcement of the laws were received from United States marshals, officers of internal revenue, and State officials; urgent appeals for assistance crowded in from private citizens, and it soon became evident that the security of the people demanded the continued presence of the regular forces. It is a painful fact, which merits serious consideration, that in some portions of the South freedom of opinion is not tolerated, if that opinion is expressed in opposition to the doctrines which originated the late rebellion. Indisputable evidence establishes the fact, which is proven, too, by the experience of numerous sufferers, that an armed rebellion of regular organization and great strength now exists in parts of those States. The frequent reports by Army officers of perfect reliability, made after mature observation and judgment, conclusively show that the ramifications of this organized body are extensive; that its system is arranged with great care and shrewdness; that its persecutions extend in the dark hours of the night, and in cowardly disguise, to persons of every age, sex, and condition who dare to exercise a freedom of conduct, action, or speech which disagrees with the political doctrines of these marauders. This body of conspirators, constituted for the purpose of crushing out many of the inherent liberties of the defenseless people of those States, defies the law and spurns the authority of the Government, and, so long as it exists, so long will it be necessary to aid the civil authorities with the armed force of the nation in putting down this second rebellion and in bringing its leaders to speedy punishment.

The attention of Congress has been repeatedly called to the necessity of appropriations for the speedy erection of a substantial fire-proof building for the War Department, and I cannot close this report without again alluding to the subject. The rented buildings, scattered all over the city, are remote from the main office and ridiculously unsafe. Many tons of records, to which the public business requires daily reference, are stored in these buildings. Besides their historical interest, these papers are of immense value for the protection of the Government against fraud, comprising all the muster-rolls of the regular and volunteer armies, reports of Army officers, hospital records, accounts of public property, and, in fact, the accumulated records of the Department for seventy years, and are scattered here and there in such buildings as can be secured by rent from private parties, and utterly unsuited to the purposes for which they must be used. Every consideration of public interest urges me to press this matter upon the attention of the people's representatives, in the hope that they will act before a conflagration sweeps from the possession of the nation those records whose value cannot be told in figures.

Reflection on the mode of clerical selection and appointments suggests the hope that a system may be devised by the civil service commission which may extend its beneficial effects to the various Departments of the Government. The experience of those who have watched with interest the workings of this Department teaches that time is lost, money wasted, and business demanding attention delayed by the constant changes which occur under present laws and customs. A judicious reform would soon exhibit the great advantage of an improved system.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, November 25, 1871.

SIR: I respectfully submit the following report of the Navy Department and the naval service for the past year:

The Navy of the United States now consists of 179 ships of all classes and in all conditions. These are calculated to carry, when in commission for service, 1,390 guns, exclusive of howitzers and small caronades.

Since the date of the last report, the news of the loss of the Saginaw, on the 29th day of October, 1870, at Ocean Island, in the Pacific, was received at the Department, and in May last the tug Primrose was sold at the navy-yard in this city.

Of the 179 ships remaining on the Navy list, 29 are sailing-ships, and the remainder side-wheel steamers, or sailing-vessels with auxiliary screws; 53 of them, armed with 601 guns, are in service, attached to the various fleets and stations as regular cruisers, dispatch-boats, hospital, store, receiving, and practice ships; these, with the tugs and small vessels in use at the various navy-yards and stations, make the force in commission for all the purposes of naval service.

Of the remainder, 6 are nearly ready for sea, and will join the various squadrons as soon as their crews can be enlisted and organized; 52 are monitors, only one of which is now in commission, the balance being laid up at the various stations, but principally at League Island, where, in the fresh water of the Delaware, their iron bottoms deteriorate with far less rapidity than in the salt water of the other stations; 17 are under repair at the various yards; 13 are on the stocks, never having been completed and launched; and the balance of those whose names are on the list are laid up in ordinary.

Of these last a very large proportion, including, as a general proposition, almost all those built of unseasoned white oak, are unfit for use, and cannot be repaired with advantage.

Built with great rapidity, of the only material available during the pressing emergencies of the war, and many of them designed for special purposes, the necessity of which has passed away, the cost of repairing them would be entirely out of proportion to the results to be obtained, either of service or endurance. Their usefulness has passed or is passing away. They make a part of the necessary expenditure of the great war, and the nation must accept the loss, and from its abundant resources must supply the deficiency which is thus occasioned. Unless something is done in this direction, our cruising navy, now by no means powerful, indeed scarcely respectable for a nation of our rank and responsibilities, will soon almost wholly pass out of existence as an arm of our national power.

It is certainly true, as suggested in your last annual report, that, situated as our country is, "the Navy is our only means of direct protection to our citizens abroad, or for the enforcement of any foreign policy;" and while we may have some reason to hope that in our own generation we may see the beginning of an end of warlike strife among the more enlightened and free of civilized nations, yet we cannot expect that the world will be wholly civilized in our day, or that freedom will come to it without contention. Barbarism will still respect nothing but power, and barbaric civilization repels alike interference, association, and instruction. Even in civilized communities, ambitious, selfish, and turbulent passions still sway the actions of men, and arbitrary power will not yet resign, without a struggle, its hold on the organizations of civilized society.

Not only on the shores and among the islands of our continent, but in every seaport of civilized Europe, in Asia, from the shores of the Bosphorus to the head of navigation on unnamed rivers on the confines of the Chinese Empire, in Japan, in the islands and semi-continents of the East, and among the groups of the Pacific and the Southern Oceans, our citizens claim and need our protection. In every quarter of the known world they are found occupying every field which enterprise dares to invade or energy avails to conquer; and everywhere, outside of our own limits, wherever they enter, they carry with them affirmative, and sometimes aggressive, ideas of freedom and progress, antagonistic alike to the traditions, customs, and habits of the people, and the ideas and practices of the local governments.

• Such is the result of our progressive civilization upon the enterprising and affirmative spirit of our people. Its effect is apparent in every land that they penetrate; and we cannot afford, either as a Government or as a people, to neglect wholly our responsibilities as a representative nation, nor our national obligations to our citizens who, wherever they are, claim the countenance of our Government and the protection of its flag.

I feel it my duty again to press these considerations, so often presented already, in the hope that in their own time the representatives of the people will give their attention to the situation, and take efficient measures, at least, to check the decline of our naval power.

The limits and duties assigned to the various cruising stations have not been changed since my last report, and the naval force given to each has not been materially changed. The vessels actually in commission on some of the stations are less in number than formerly; but this decrease is rather apparent than real, for in almost all there has been an actual increase of the active force. This has been done by putting out of commission the unwieldy iron-clads, which could only lie inactive in harbor or were towed slowly and at great expense from port to port, and substituting for them, as far as the Department has been able, small and active cruisers, by which means we are enabled to occupy continually a larger extent of cruising ground and visit more frequently the ports assigned to each station, and generally to render more effective service in every department of public affairs where the presence and aid of the Navy is necessary, without greater expense of men and money.

The force on the North Atlantic station is still under command of Rear-Admiral S. P. Lee, who held that position at the making of the last report. The force on this station consists of the Severn, the Swatara, the Nantasket, the Nipsic, the Kansas, the Pawnee, the Terror, with the Worcester and Canandaigua just fitted for the station, and the Shawmut now on duty there, but ultimately destined for the South Atlantic—in all 10 ships, mounting 70 guns, all active cruisers, except the Terror, which is an iron-clad of the Monitor class.

The South Atlantic station remains, as at the date of the last report, under command of Rear-Admiral Lanman, with a fleet consisting of the Lancaster, (flag-ship,) the Ticonderoga, and the Wasp, with the Wyoming already fitted for the station—4 ships, mounting 40 guns, besides the Shawmut, detained for the present on duty on the North Atlantic station.

The fleet on the Pacific station, still commanded by Rear-Admiral John A. Winslow, consists of the California, the Pensacola, the Narragansett, the Saranac, the Mohican, the Resaca, the Ossipee, the Onward, and the St. Mary's—in all 9 ships, mounting 99 guns, and divided into two squadrons, viz: the North Pacific and the South Pacific, commanded respectively by Commodore Roger N. Stembel and Commodore David McDougal.

The European station is now commanded by Rear-Admiral Charles S. Boggs, who relieved Rear-Admiral Glisson on the 28th day of January last. The ships belonging to this fleet are the Brooklyn, the Plymouth, the Guerriere, the Wachusett, the Shenandoah, the Juniata, and the Wabash, with the Congress about to sail—in all 8 ships, with 139 guns.

On the Asiatic station, of which Rear-Admiral John Rodgers is still the commandant, we have the Colorado, the Benicia, the Alaska, the Ashuelot, the Monocacy, the Idaho, and the Palos, with the Saco, now on her way through the Suez Canal, and the Iroquois, under orders to join the squadron—in all 9 ships, mounting 97 guns.

Of these ships on the various stations forty have been more or less refitted and repaired at home or abroad since my last report, and four others, all of the smaller class, now at the various navy-yards, will be ready for sea in periods varying from twenty to sixty days.

During the year the Navy has also supplied 16 officers and 220 men for duty in the Coast Survey service; has completed the survey of the Darien and Tehuantepec routes, has made extensive surveys and soundings for telegraph cables, and, under the direction of Congress, fitted out and dispatched three store-ships loaded with provisions, by the charitable people of our country, for the sufferers from the European war, and has, under like direction and under your order, sent out a vessel, completely fitted, equipped, and supplied, to explore the Arctic Ocean "toward the North Pole."

All these are appropriate and valuable duties for the Navy in time of peace, and are proper expenditures of its material and force; and while they add to the information of the world, and contribute to civilization and advancement, they afford to the officers and men employed a proper and practical school of service and instruction.

MIDWAY ISLANDS.

In my last annual report it was stated that the work of deepening the harbor of Midway Islands, prosecuted under the authority of an act of Congress approved March 1, 1869, would of necessity cease in October, 1870, on account of the exhaustion of the fund appropriated for the purpose. Accordingly work on the cut was discontinued on the 21st of the month named, and the working party embarked on the Saginaw October 28, for San Francisco. The reports of Commodore Sicard, detailing the progress of the work, will be found in the Appendix. This officer estimates that to complete the canal to a width of 175 feet will require about forty-six months' work, at a cost of $187,000, without counting the cost of removing the débris or "small stuff." Such would, he thinks, cost as much more.

WRECK OF THE SAGINAW.

Leaving Midway Island on the 28th of October, Commander Sicard, of the Saginaw, determined to run to Ocean Island, a small island lying about one hundred miles to the westward of Midway, to rescue any sailors who might have been wrecked there, and who, being out of the ordinary track of vessels in that part of the Pacific, would have little chance of relief from any other source. This expedition, though in the direct line of his duty as the commander of a naval vessel, was fraught with the usual perils of navigation in unknown and dangerous waters; and about 3 o'clock on the morning of the 29th of October the Saginaw, running slowly in the darkness, was wrecked on a reef outlying the island for which she was bound. With great exertion and the exercise of much energy and skill, all on board, including the officers and men of the ship, and the working party from Midway Island, were safely landed, with a small allowance of provisions and materials rescued from the wreck. Cast upon the shores of an uninhabited island, with scanty means of subsistence, out of the line of travel, and more than one thousand miles from the nearest port of refuge or relief, then it was that the commanding officer of the Saginaw illustrated the benefits of the comprehensive education and strict training which he had received at the hands of the Government, and exhibited the high personal qualities which characterize him as an officer. Ably seconded by his subordinate officers of every grade, Commander Sicard took, immediately, every possible means for the health, safety, and final relief of those who were committed to his command. Whatever could be saved from the wreck was at once secured; measures were immediately taken to keep up the health, spirits, and discipline of the men; fresh water was distilled by means of an old boiler; and everything was organized so that there was no waste of either provisions, material, or labor.

The boat fittest for the service was promptly repaired, provisioned, and equipped, as far as might be, for the perilous voyage, and, manned by one officer and four men, all of whom volunteered for the service, was dispatched to Honolulu, the nearest port from which relief could be expected. After her departure work was vigorously pushed on the island; and when finally rescued, the shipwrecked mariners, with well-directed labor, had almost completed, from the material of their old ship, a new schooner, perfectly seaworthy, and sufficient, under favorable circumstances, to carry the whole shipwrecked party to a port of safety. I have thus collated some of the facts of this case to illustrate my high opinion of the energy and ability displayed by Commander Sicard and his comrades on this occasion, and to show how well such conduct repays the favor of the Government.

The little party who volunteered for the voyage in a small boat to Honolulu, to bring relief to their comrades, more than fifteen hundred miles across a winter ocean, consisted of Lieutenant John G. Talbot, executive officer of the Saginaw; William Halford, coxswain; Peter Francis, quartermaster, and John Andrews and James Muir, seamen. They left Ocean Island on the 18th of November, and after a voyage of thirty-one days, during which they encountered terrible difficulties and danger, and endured much privation and suffering, they arrived, on the 19th of December, off the Island of Kanai, one of the Hawaiian group. They had previously lost their oars in a storm, and in attempting to land the boat was upset, and Lieutenant Talbot and three of the men, already exhausted by privation and suffering, were drowned in the surf. William Halford alone survived, and reached the shore in safety with the dispatches from Commander Sicard. Mr. Pierce, our minister to the Sandwich Islands, at once chartered a vessel, which, with a Hawaiian steamer proffered by the government, sailed the same day, and relieved the shipwrecked crew of the Saginaw. The thanks of the Department are due to Mr. Pierce and to the Hawaiian government for their energy and kindness.

The death of Lieutenant Talbot closed a career of unusual promise, and in it the Navy lost a brilliant and beloved member. A skillful sailor, an accomplished officer, and a Christian gentleman, his self sacrifice has arrested the attention of his comrades, and will remain an example to the service, which in life his virtues adorned, and whose highest qualities were illustrated in the crowning heroism of his death. His comrades of humbler rank will not be forgotten. With him they faced the dangers of the lonely ocean, and offered their lives, with his, to save their shipwrecked messmates; and no one can estimate how much of danger and suffering, perhaps of death, was saved through the courage and endurance of the sole survivor of that gallant boat's crew.

TEHUANTEPEC CANAL.

The Department is in receipt of the report and accompanying maps of the Tehuantepec surveying expedition, under the command of Captain R. W. Shufeldt, United States Navy.

This expedition was authorized by act of Congress, and an appropriation made therefor. A small corps of naval officers was detailed for the work, and the steamer Mayflower placed at the disposal of Captain Shufeldt. The Kansas was ordered to accompany the expedition for the purpose of surveying the river Coatzacoalcos and its bar. The Cyane was ordered to assist the expedition in the survey of the harbors and lagoons on the Pacific coast. It was known that surveys had before been made for a railroad, and the feasibility of supplying the summit-level with water reported by Señor Moro, in 1848, and the main object of the present expedition was to determine, ultimately, the question whether a sufficient supply of water for a ship-canal across the isthmus could be obtained. For this purpose a careful and thorough examination was made of the country adjacent to the lowest passes, under the immediate supervision of Civil Engineer E. A. Fuertes. Señor Moro's proposition was first examined into and found to be impracticable. The attention of the party was next turned to the Rio Corte, or Upper Coatzacoalcos, as the only solution of the question of water supply, and it was found practicable, by means of a feeder, to supply upward of 2,000 cubic feet of water per second. For the technical part of the engineering question, Captain Shufeldt refers to the report of the chief engineer of the expedition. This is accompanied by twenty maps and profiles, with many calculations to prove that a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec is not only practicable, but that the obstacles in the way of the canal-route are of the most ordinary nature.

The party was joined, on the 10th of January, by three Mexican commissioners, who worked in perfect accord with our own force.

The season of the year prevented the running of a line to the Atlantic; yet, from the thorough surveys previously made for railway purposes, and the general information gathered on the frequent journeys of the party, it is assumed that the canal can start at the head-waters of ship navigation of the river Coatzacoalcos and run thence along its right bank and the valley of a tributary to the dividing ridge at Tarifa, descending through the Tarifa Pass, across the plains, to its Pacific terminus. The total length of such a canal will be 172 miles, including river navigation. It will require locks to overcome a height of 732 feet. The Coatzacoalcos River, forming the harbor at the Atlantic side, is well sheltered, and will require dredging at only a few points. The Salina Cruz Harbor, on the Pacific, is exposed to the south winds, and a breakwater is proposed, to convert this roadstead into a safe harbor. No estimates have been made as to the cost of the work, since a minute survey of the whole region would have required larger means and more time than were at the disposal of the officer in charge.

Full and interesting accounts of the geology, natural history, and productions of the country accompany the report.

DARIEN CANAL.

The survey of the Isthmus of Darien, under Commander T. O. Selfridge, which had been interrupted by the advent of the rainy season last year, has been successfully conducted in spite of the great obstacles met in making way through a dense and almost impenetrable wilderness.

The Guard and Nipsic were detailed for this service upon the Atlantic coast, and the Resaca upon the Pacific. Commander Selfridge sailed from New York in December last. His attention for the past year has been directed mainly to that portion of the isthmus bordering upon the valley of the Atrato, known properly as the Tuyra and Napipi routes.

The route of the Tuyra and Atrato Rivers had been reported upon most favorably by former explorers, and hopes were entertained that these reports might prove true. Five months were spent in the examination of this route, a line of levels 120 miles long was run from ocean to ocean, and though the divide in one portion was found to be not over 400 feet in height, the very broken nature of the country which was developed seems to render this portion of the isthmus impracticable for this enterprise.

The survey of the Napipi route has been productive of far more favorable results, and has illustrated the possibility of a ship-canal between the two oceans.

The line adopted by Commander Selfridge commences at the mouth of the Atrato, in the Gulf of Darien, ascends that river for 150 miles to the mouth of the Napipi, and thence across, in the valley of the latter, to the Pacific Ocean, at Cupica Bay. The Atrato is navigable the whole of this distance for ships of the largest size, having a width of 1,500 feet and a depth nowhere less than 30 feet. The actual length of the necessary canal is $31\frac{2}{3}$ miles, the distance from the Atrato River to Cupica Bay, of which 23 miles is a flat plain, with a rise of 90 feet, and no difficulties of construction. The remaining 8 miles present the only engineering obstacles; here the hills rise to a height of 600 feet and descend almost precipitously to the Pacific.

Commander Selfridge's report will be found in the appendix. His estimates of cost are based upon a canal 120 feet wide and 26 feet deep. It is proposed to lock up to a summit level of 90 feet, at which point the canal is fed by the Napipi River with a volume, at its lowest stage, of over 500,000 cubic feet per hour—a quantity which can be doubled by a feeder 3 miles long. The 8 miles beyond the summit level include a cut averaging 125 feet deep and a tunnel 5 miles long. The successful operations at the Mt. Cenis and Hoosac tunnels, with the modern improvements in drilling machines and explosives, seem to solve successfully the problem of great tunnels, which now cost but little more than open cuts. The total cost of such a work in this country is liberally estimated at $95,000,000, which, adding twenty-five per cent. for contingencies, makes a total of $125,000,000. This route presents not only the great advantage of most excellent harbors at each terminus, but its low cost, compared with other lines, its construction in rock, requiring but a small outlay for annual repairs, the proximity of the heaviest portion of the work to the Pacific Ocean, the absence of swamps, and the comparative healthiness of the position, give it a prominence which repays the cost and labor of the expedition.

These surveys, in addition to developing this excellent route, have, in clearing away the doubts and ignorance hanging over the Isthmus of Darien, in the fixing of its geographical positions, and in giving positive knowledge of the interior, its inhabitants, products, rivers, and mountains, added much to the general information of the scientific world.

The whole of the Isthmus of Darien, as embraced in the instructions of the Department, dated January 16, 1870, having been surveyed, Commander Selfridge returned with the expedition to the United States in July last.

It is gratifying to know that, notwithstanding the privations and hardships incident to this service, and the prevailing idea of the unhealthfulness of the climate, no lives have been lost in the prosecution of these surveys. Most of the work has been done by graduates of the Naval Academy, who, readily adapting themselves to the various duties required of them, have given an additional proof of the usefulness of that institution.

SUPPLIES FOR FRANCE AND GERMANY.

In pursuance of a resolution of Congress approved February 10, 1871, three naval vessels, the Worcester, the Supply, and the Relief, were detailed for the transportation of supplies furnished by our people for the sufferers of the European war which was then raging. The vessels soon had full cargoes, shipped respectively at Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and started on their noble mission; each under instructions to deliver their cargoes at the points designated by the agents of the relief associations of the respective cities. Having successfully fulfilled their instructions, they returned safely to the United States to the ports from which they started.

EXPEDITION TOWARD THE NORTH POLE.

By the ninth section of an act approved July 12, 1870, "the President of the United States was authorized to organize and send out one or more expeditions toward the North Pole, and to appoint such person or persons as he may deem most fitted to the command thereof; to detail any officer of the public service to take part in the same, and to use any public vessel that may be suitable for the purpose; the scientific operations of the expedition to be prescribed in accordance with the advice of the National Academy of Sciences."

Mr. Charles F. Hall, a traveler of great experience in that locality, was appointed by your order to command the expedition fitted out under this authority.

The Perriwinkle, now called the Polaris, a small steamer of 387 tons, was selected for the service, and thoroughly prepared and strengthened at the Washington navy-yard to encounter the perils of polar navigation. Mr. Hall himself was permitted to suggest and supervise the preparation of the vessel, and to recommend the persons selected to accompany him.

The general instructions given to Mr. Hall by this Department, those for the scientific operations of the expedition, prescribed by the National Academy of Sciences, and the main correspondence and reports connected with the expedition, from its organization to its arrival at Upernavik, are embraced in the Appendix to this report.

The Polaris left Washington June 10, arrived at New York the 14th, completed there her crew and outfit, and sailed the 29th. Touching at New London, St. John's, and Holsteinberg, in Greenland, she reached Godhaven on the 4th of August. The United States steamer Congress, detailed to convey to Greenland such stores of the expedition as the Polaris could not carry, sailed from New York on the 25th of July, and came up with the Polaris at Godhaven on the 10th of August.

The Danish authorities at Godhaven extended every facility to the officers of our ships, and contributed by every means in their power to the success of the expedition.

The Polaris took her departure from Godhaven August 17, and reached Upernavik the next day, whence her adventurous crew has sailed into the unknown Northern Ocean, full of hope and vigor, and bearing with them the good wishes of the world.

The Congress, having accomplished successfully the duty assigned to her, left Godhaven August 19, and arrived at New York on the 21st of September.

COREAN EXPEDITION.

Our minister to China having been instructed to arrange and conclude, if possible, a convention with the people who occupy the peninsula of Corea between the Yellow Sea and the Sea of Japan, for the protection of sailors and other strangers shipwrecked on their coast, it became necessary to that end that he should visit the capital of the country, or at least put himself in direct communication with the authorities. With this view, and with the assent of the authorities of China, to which country the government of Corea is tributary, our minister sailed, in May last, from Nagasaki to Boisé anchorage, on the Sale River in Corea, in the Colorado, the flag-ship of Rear Admiral Rodgers, commanding our Asiatic fleet. The admiral was accompanied by the Alaska, the Benicia, the Monocacy, and the Palos. He was ordered thus to transport and convoy the diplomatic representative of our Government, to exhibit, in his behalf, such force as was proper to illustrate his dignity in the eyes of the people, who respect only the exhibition of power, or as might be necessary to insure the safety of the expedition and vindicate, if need be, the honor of the flag. The wisdom and necessity of this policy was shown in the events which followed.

After the arrival of the fleet at the anchorage, and after communication with and visits from the local authorities, and the assurance on our part, and understanding on theirs, that the expedition was not only peaceful but friendly in its objects, a surveying party, engaged in the peaceful occupation of making surveys and soundings, in the interest of science and for the safety of commerce, after having been allowed, with the understood consent of the authorities, and without protest or challenge by any one, to pass up the channel to a point past the Corean forts, far separated from and beyond the reach of assistance from the main body of the fleet, was suddenly and treacherously attacked while in the difficult navigation of an unknown passage swept by strong tides and filled with hidden rocks. The surveying boats were obliged to re-pass the forts, under a fierce fire of cannon suddenly opened upon them, and maintained with vindictive spirit and energy. The small vessels which had accompanied the party hurrying into action answered the fire of the forts, and, driving the Coreans from their works, rescued the surveying boats from danger, with only two of our men wounded.

It was determined, by the concurrent judgment of our minister and Admiral Rodgers, that an explanation should be at once demanded, and that ample time should be given the Coreans to understand the situation and make proper reparation.

This was done, and ten days were allowed to pass, during which no movement was made by Admiral Rodgers, nor was any explanation offered by the Coreans. An attack was then planned and carried out upon the forts and citadel from which the outrage had been committed.

A party of sailors and marines were landed, and, after a difficult march over an almost impassable country, the forts were assaulted and captured June 9th and 10th. The officers and men engaged in this attack displayed perseverance, steadiness, and courage highly creditable to the country and the service.

Five forts were captured and destroyed, fifty battle-flags taken, and 481 pieces of artillery fell into our hands. Upward of two hundred and forty Coreans were killed and a few captured.

Our own losses were three killed and ten wounded; among the former was Lieutenant Hugh W. McKee, a gallant and promising young officer, who fell at the head of his men, himself first inside the enemy's citadel.

Finding it impossible to conclude the peaceful treaty, and not authorized to continue hostilities, except to repel and punish attack, the fleet left the anchorage of Boisé on the 3d of July, and arrived at Chefoo on the 5th of the same month. The latest dispatches indicate that though the direct object of the expedition has failed, yet the punishment which was inflicted upon our treacherous assailants, and the gallant conduct of our forces, has not failed to make an impression upon the people of the Chinese coast, and to contribute materially in its effects to the consideration and comfort and perhaps to the safety of our citizens located there.

REPORTS OF BUREAUS.

The reports of the several bureaus of the department will be found in the appendix, together with the report of the admiral, presenting in detail many subjects to which I am unable to allude in this report; I commend them to the careful perusal of all interested in the service.

The Naval Observatory has well earned its reputation as an admirable institution, and the works of its officers in late years have placed it in the foremost rank at home and abroad. It is ably and economically administered, and I commend it to the favorable consideration of Congress.

The Hydrographic Office has, during the past year, made marked progress, and its publications, both in books relating to navigation and charts, reflect great credit on the officer in charge and on those attached to the office. The report of the hydrographer, Captain R. H. Wyman, is embraced in the report of the chief of the Bureau of Navigation. I particularly recommend that some additional appropriation be made for the advancement of this work, so necessary to our naval and commercial marine. While every great maritime nation is yearly prosecuting the survey of unexplored or insufficiently determined avenues to commerce, the United States has remained idle, and, taking advantage of the work of other nations, has by no means returned to them an equivalent. The means should at least be furnished for the prosecution of more general surveys, particularly in the Pacific Ocean and the waters most traversed by our commercial marine.

The Marine Corps, besides discharging well all their ordinary duties on land and at sea, have also been employed during the past year to accompany the various surveying parties on the isthmuses, and have been called upon several times for the protection of the civil officers engaged in the execution of the revenue laws. For their efficiency and services in this behalf they have received the thanks of the Treasury Department.

NAVY-YARDS.

I again call attention to the necessity of developing our most important navy-yards.

The commercial nations of Europe, from their enormous arsenals, are able to strike our shores sharply and suddenly.

Our own yards are generally small in area and very deficient in water front; developed on no well-considered plan, they are imperfectly adapted to the changed condition of construction and equipment.

At Mare Island, in California, we have ample space, abundant water front, and, happily, all the requirements of a great naval arsenal.

It is unnecessary to dwell upon our great naval interests in the Pacific, or upon the immense importance of improving the invaluable naval site, in the immediate vicinity of our great Pacific City.

At League Island we have had the same ample area and water front, and the means of easily converting its back-channel into an admirable wet-basin, like those in Europe, while the excavation thus made will raise the island to a requisite height.

The Department has been able, on the appropriation made last year for this purpose, to contract with responsible parties for the building of a commodious wharf, and for the dredging of a considerable basin in the back-channel, and the filling in to a proper level of about ten acres of the island, or nearly half the area of the present working yard at Philadelphia.

A navy-yard so ample in its proportions, in the midst of our great coal and iron region, easy of access to our own ships, but readily made inaccessible to a hostile fleet; with fresh water for the preservation of the iron vessels so rapidly growing into favor, surrounded by the skilled labor of one of our chief manufacturing centers, will be invaluable to our country. With the resources of Mare Island on the Pacific and League Island on the Atlantic shore, fully developed on a well-considered plan, the country would receive a great accession of strength, and find new bulwarks against foreign aggression,

At New London, also, the appropriation of $10,000, made by Congress, has been found sufficient for the building of a small but convenient dock, and that station is now in use for laying up ships in ordinary, as a point convenient to our repairing-yards at New York and Boston.

IRON-SHIP BUILDING-YARDS.

In March last, I had the honor to make a report to the Senate, in obedience to a resolution of that body, upon the subject of the proposals made to the Department "for establishing iron-ship building-yards and docks to economize expenditure in the Navy, and to aid in restoring commerce."

This subject is much too comprehensive for cursory discussion in this report, but I have already, in my first annual report, spoken of its great importance to every interest of the country, and I hope to be able hereafter to present some system to be matured under the deliberations of Congress.

NAVAL PENSION FUND.

The pension-roll on the 1st of November, 1871, was as follows :

1,130 invalids, annually receiving	$130, 654 25
1,703 widows and children, annually receiving	260, 644 00
3,133 persons, receiving a total of	391, 298 25

EXPENSES AND ESTIMATES.

The whole expenditure of the Department and the service since the date of the last report is $19,265,240 52, including the payment of invalid pensions and adjudicated prize-money, and the appropriations of Congress for the payment of bounties and claims of various kinds to the first of the present month.

The appropriations for the current fiscal year amount in the whole to $20,964,717 25, and the expenditures from these appropriations are considerably within the proportion applicable to the period which has elapsed since its commencement.

The estimates for the general expenses of the service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873, amount to $19,925,507 02, and are as follows:

Pay of officers and seamen of the Navy.....	$6,500,000 00
Current repairs of buildings, docks, and incidental expenses in navy-yards, &c.....	1,046,000 00
Pay of civil establishment in navy-yards, hospitals, &c.....	338,786 00
Ordnance and Torpedo Corps.....	1,142,942 00
Coal, hemp, and equipments.....	1,500,000 00
Navigation, navigation supplies, &c.....	137,000 00
Hydrographic work.....	28,500 00
Naval Observatory, Nautical Almanac, &c.....	65,900 00
Repairs and preservation of vessels.....	3,300,000 00
Steam machinery, tools, &c.....	1,650,000 00
Provisions.....	1,587,600 00
Repairs of hospitals and laboratories.....	25,000 00
Surgeons' necessaries.....	50,000 00
Contingent expenses of various departments and Bureaus.....	1,307,000 00

Naval Academy.....	$193,403 25
Support of Marine Corps	1,049,652 70
Deficiencies of Marine Corps.....	3,718 07

and to these is added the sum of $507,200 for permanent improvements at the several navy-yards and stations.

These estimates, it will be perceived, are in the aggregate more than $1,200,000 less than the estimates made for the current year, and more than half a million less than the appropriations made by Congress for that period. It must not be forgotten, however, that they are made closely for the mere maintenance of the naval establishment as it is, and that needed improvement demands increase of appropriations.

REDUCTION OF THE NAVY.

The subject of the reduction of the personnel of the Navy has been much discussed, and it becomes not only those who are charged with the responsibility of the question, but also all who are interested in its solution, to meet and consider it deliberately and fairly, keeping in view at once the history of the country and of the service, and looking to the honor and welfare of both.

Though it is sometimes alleged, as a matter of complaint, that there are more officers of the Navy, especially of the higher grades, than are required for the service, yet it is a fact that, notwithstanding the promotions so hardly earned by many gallant officers during the late war, notwithstanding the admiration which they conquered and the high consideration which they deserve at the hands of a Government, which owes its preservation as much to them as to any other class of its servants or people, still the whole number of active officers in the higher ranks of the Navy is considerably less now than it was before the war.

As a matter of fact, the whole number of officers of the three highest grades of the Navy, (including lieutenants and those above them,) on the active list in 1859, was 535, while on the 1st of July, 1871, the number of officers on the active list in the eight highest grades (including lieutenants and those above them) was 488, or 47 less than before the war. Notwithstanding this condition, I recognize the desirability of reducing the military establishments of the country, of every kind, to the lowest point consistent with the dignity and safety of the country and its important interests, and with that attitude of good faith and generosity which becomes a great government and a prosperous people toward its faithful and devoted servants. With all these considerations in view, I am of the opinion that there are some grades in our Navy now established by law which may be safely and properly reduced or dispensed with in time of peace.

The grades of Admiral and Vice-Admiral, assimilating to those of General and Lieutenant General in the Army, were properly established as the recognition and reward of brilliant service in the late war.

These conditions have been fully met by the character and services of the very distinguished officers who have filled, and now fill, these grades. But the grades themselves are not required for the ordinary service of our Navy in time of peace, and they would lose their peculiar significance of honor, if continued after the termination of the war, beyond the lives of its most conspicuous actors. I therefore suggest that these two grades be allowed to lapse with the lives of those who now hold them.

The grade of commodore, after the lapse of the grades of Admiral and Vice-Admiral, the grade next to the highest of the service, can also, I think, be dispensed with at this time. The number of officers of this grade is fixed by law at 25. As our Navy is now organized, these officers are not absolutely required for any special duty. It is necessary for the efficiency of the service, and for the dignity, influence, and success of our naval representation abroad, that our fleets on foreign stations should be commanded by officers of the rank of rear-admiral at least. This is the lowest grade of officers to whom the fleets of any naval power are committed, and it is with this grade, or with those of higher rank, that our commandants abroad are to come in constant contact, in every country, and before every people of the world, in the discharge of every duty which may devolve on them, relating either to the policy, interest, influence, or honor of our country. Under these circumstances, to commit the command of our fleets to officers of less rank would not only strike at the efficiency and dignity of the service, and often place it and the power it represents, in official consideration abroad, below that of every petty power, from Portugal to Hayti; but would in many parts of the world always postpone and often endanger the interests of our Government and citizens, to a degree out of all proportion to the small additional expense incurred for officers of the grade referred to.

The number of rear-admirals is limited by the general provisions of the law to ten. These are now temporarily increased by two, who are retained on the active list because they have received the express thanks of Congress for distinguished services; with five cruising stations, and a pressing necessity for a sixth, by a division of the Pacific station, this number of rear-admirals is only sufficient to afford commandants, and relief for our fleets abroad, and that without taking into consideration any diminution in the number available, by reason of accident or sickness; to reduce this number would be neither statesmanship nor economy.

Our fleets abroad are, however, generally too small in time of peace to be advantageously divided into squadrons. This leaves the grade of commodore, in such times, without appropriate command at sea, and without duties on shore which may not be discharged by officers of other grades. I therefore suggest that no more promotions be made to this grade after a date to be fixed by law, and that, after this grade shall have lapsed by the death, retirement, or promotion of the present incumbents, promotions be made to the grade of rear-admiral, by selection as vacancies occur, from the list of captains. This plan will in a short time work the abolition of the whole grade of commodores, twenty-five in number, without real injury to the service or to any one connected with it. The grade of commodore will pass away, and though the captains on the active list will not reach and enjoy its honors, those of them who are deserving will reach the grade of rear-admiral at an earlier and more active age, while only those who are not deserving will miss promotion.

I would further suggest, in accordance with the spirit of the recommendation made this year by the Vice-Admiral, as a member of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy, that the term of cadetship for midshipmen be increased by law from four years to six, two of which, at least, shall be spent at sea. The reasons for this change I will take occasion to present more at large hereafter. By this means, the number of officers annually entering the naval service will be reduced by one-third. We may add to these reductions by dropping the mates now employed on temporary duty, except those who have peculiar claims by reason of war service or special fitness. When these reductions are consummated, we will, besides reducing by one-third the number of officers annually entering the service, have accomplished, since the 15th of July, 1870, (including the reductions made by the act of that date,) a reduction of near three hundred in the number of line officers now authorized by law, with an annual saving to the public Treasury of near a half million of dollars.

This is, I think, as far as reductions can be carried at this time without injury or danger. In making these suggestions of reduction, I am conscious that I shall not meet the views of those whose interests are directly affected, and possibly I shall not entirely satisfy those who, on imperfect information or immature reflection, may think further reduction proper. To the first of these classes, I would say that I have made the suggestions after much consideration, and in clear view of the interests of the service, as well as of the country. For the information of the latter class, I beg to present again the following explanations, which I have heretofore made in a less formal manner, showing the many important and complicated duties and requirements of the service:

Our naval organizations are small, and in service are largely separated from and independent of each other. Each organization, however small, must be complete in itself for every purpose of service, with its complement of officers, sufficient in number and experience for every kind of duty and responsibility.

More than one-half of the officers on the active list are now actually at sea. But they cannot, no officer can or should, remain always at sea. The efficiency of the service and common humanity alike require that they should have regular relief from their distant and dangerous duties. But if this were otherwise, still they must come home in the ships which carried them out, because the seamen are enlisted for only three years, and must be returned to the United States for discharge, and their officers must come with them.

There are, however, other reasons why all the officers cannot be kept always at sea.

They are needed for shore duty ; duty required by law, duty as essential to the efficiency, good order, and safety of the Navy, as is sea service itself.

Ships are neither built, nor manned, nor armed, nor equipped, nor largely repaired at sea. All the business connected with the building, preserving, and repairing of war vessels, with recruiting and enlisting men, with providing ordnance, means for navigation, equipment, provisions, clothing, medicine, hospitals, &c., &c., must be attended to on land. Hence the necessity of navy-yards, and naval stations, and an adequate number of officers and men to manage, conduct, and protect them.

The education of cadet midshipmen requires its quota of both officers and vessels.

Courts-martial and courts of inquiry, composed of commissioned officers, as required by law, are as indispensable in administering naval law and justice as are civil courts in civil affairs.

Boards of examination and retiring boards are required by law, and boards of survey and inspection are a constant convenience and necessity.

Officers are also constantly required and employed on other important duty not connected with the several squadrons: some in acquiring a knowledge of the signal code ; some, under requirement of law, on the Light-House Board, with the Coast Survey, the Observatory, and Hydrographic Office; some, in obedience to resolutions of Congress, in making soundings for telegraphic cables; and some in exploring the routes of the great interoceanic canals.

Officers of competent rank, knowledge, and experience are required for all these duties, alike by the necessities of the service and the provisions of existing laws.

Whether they are engaged in active duty or waiting orders, justice and sound policy concur in requiring, what existing laws also require, that the pay of naval officers shall, to some extent, continue. If this were not common justice, it would be at least common prudence. No maritime and naval power has ever been or ever will be guilty of the folly of turning its naval officers adrift the moment their cruise is ended.

Navy officers fit for important commands require the training and experience of years, and cannot be obtained at a moment's notice, nor be called into existence by proclamation or legislation, even upon the spur of rebellion or invasion. They are only produced by long-continued processes of instruction and development.

False economy may seek to scatter our officers and cripple our service, leaving our interests unprotected on every sea, but wise and liberal statesmanship will alone avail to protect our commerce, secure our foreign interests, and maintain our national honor.

In conclusion, I must again express my renewed obligations to the chiefs and officers of the several Bureaus, and to the accomplished Chief Clerk of the Department, and his associates, for the constant and effective energy and skill with which I have been assisted in every branch of departmental duty.

GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

The PRESIDENT.

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., November 18, 1871.

SIR: The ordinary revenues of this Department for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1871, were $20,037,045 42, and the expenditures of all kinds $24,390,104 08. For the year ended June 30, 1870, the ordinary revenues (not including the amount of money-order funds deposited as postal receipts for convenience of transfer) were $18,879,377 65; and the expenditures (not including the amount of money-order funds re-transferred) were $23,348,837 63. The increase of revenue for the year 1871 over the year 1870 was $1,157,667 77, or 6.13 per cent., and the increase of expenditures $1,041,266 45, or 4.45 per cent., showing a net increase in revenue of $116,401 32. The increase in revenue for the year 1871 over the year 1869 was $2,722,869 70, or 15.72 per cent., and the increase of expenditures for 1871 over 1869 was $1,251,972 58, or 5.41 per cent. The increase in revenue for 1871, compared with 1870, was less than the increase for 1870, compared with 1869, by $270,042 16; and the increase of expenditures for 1871, compared with 1870, was greater than the increase for 1870, compared with 1869, by $740,590 32.

If, in addition to the ordinary revenues, the Department be credited with $700,000 appropriated for transportation of free matter and the amounts drawn and expended for subsidies to steamship lines, it will appear that the deficiency provided out of the general Treasury for the year 1871 is $2,928,058 66, against $2,814,116 98 for the year 1870.

The accompanying report of the Auditor fully sets forth the details of the financial operations of the Department.

The estimated expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1873, are.....	$27, 489, 750 00
The revenues, estimated at 10 per cent. increase over last year.....	$22, 040, 749 00
Standing appropriations for free matter	700, 000 00
	22, 740, 749 00
Leaving a deficiency of	4, 749, 001 00

The foregoing estimates do not include the following special appropriations in the nature of subsidies:

For mail steamship service between San Francisco and Japan and China	$500, 000 00
For like service between the United States and Brazil.....	150, 000 00
For like service between San Francisco and Sandwich Islands.....	75, 000 00
Total	725, 000 00

Of the deficiency appropriated for the year 1870 there was unexpended at the close of that year the sum of..... $4,740,000 00
 Amount appropriated for deficiency in 1871..... 4,685,032 00

A total of..... 9,425,032 00
 There were drawn during the last fiscal year of the amount unexpended at the close of the year 1870 for payments on account of that year..... $1,050,000 00
 Of the amount appropriated for the year 1871..... 1,650,000 00

A total of..... 2,700,000 00

Leaving in the Treasury, unexpended, the sum of..... 6,725,032 00

Against which there are chargeable sundry unliquidated accounts, estimated as follows :

Excess of expenditures over receipts during year just closed $226,858 66
 For balances to foreign countries 275,000 00
 For mail service under contract and recognized, but not yet reported 527,867 95
 Mail service still unrecognized 249,195 00

1,278,921 61

Leaving, after settlement of all liabilities to June 30, 1871, a net balance of deficiency appropriations of 5,446,110 39

The number of adhesive postage-stamps issued during the year was 498,126,175, representing..... $14,630,715 00
 Stamped envelopes, plain, 49,954,625, representing 1,432,474 75
 Stamped envelopes, "request," 48,111,650, representing..... 1,434,181 50
 Newspaper wrappers, 6,609,000, representing..... 132,180 00

The whole number of stamps, envelopes, and newspaper wrappers was 602,801,450, of the aggregate value of..... 17,629,551 25

The increase in the issue of stamps, stamped envelopes, and newspaper wrappers is best exhibited by the following table :

Description.	Fiscal year ended June 30, 1870.	Fiscal year ended June 30, 1871.	Increase, amount.	Increase per cent.
Adhesive postage-stamps	$13,976,768 00	$14,630,715 00	$653,947 00	4.67
Stamped envelopes, plain	1,297,159 00	1,432,474 75	135,315 75	10.43
Stamped envelopes, request.....	1,084,250 00	1,434,181 50	349,931 50	32.27
Newspaper wrappers	98,605 00	132,180 00	33,575 00	34.05
Aggregate	16,456,782 00	17,629,551 25	1,172,769 25	7.13

The number of packages of postage-stamps lost in the mails during the year was six, representing $258; and of stamped envelopes three, representing $51 70; being much less than the losses from similar delinquencies in 1870 and previous years.

CONTRACTS—TRANSPORTATION STATISTICS.

There were in the service of the Department on the 30th June, 1871, 7,286 contractors for the transportation of the mails.

Of mail routes in operation there were 8,951, aggregating in length (exclusive of special routes) 238,359 miles, in annual transportation 107,572,794 miles, and in annual cost $11,529,395. Adding the compensation of railway post-office clerks, route-agents, local agents, mail-messengers, mail-route messengers, and baggage-masters in charge of registered passages, amounting to $1,875,526, the aggregate annual cost was $13,404,921.

The service was divided as follows:

Railroad routes: Length, 49,834 miles; annual transportation, 55,557,048 miles; annual cost, $5,724,979—about 10.30 cents per mile.

Steamboat routes: Length, 20,334 miles; annual transportation, 4,684,778 miles; annual cost, $776,943—about 16.58 cents per mile.

Other routes, on which the mails are required to be conveyed with "celerity, certainty, and security:" Length, 168,191 miles; annual transportation, 47,330,968 miles; annual cost, $5,027,473—about 10.62 cents per mile.

There was an increase over the preceding year in length of routes of 7,127 miles, in annual transportation 10,547,798 miles, and in cost $644,742. Adding the increased cost for railway post-office clerks, route, local, and other agents, $404,636, the total increase in cost was $1,049,378.

The foregoing statements of distances and costs do not include service for "special" offices. There were at the close of the year 2,115 of these, each with a mail-carrier whose pay from the Department is not allowed to exceed the net postal yield of the office. "Special" routes and their carriers are included, however, in the number of contractors and routes as given above.

The new railroad routes put in operation during the year 1871 amounted to 6,107 miles; during 1870, to 4,190 miles; and during 1869, to 3,519 miles—making in the aggregate an addition in three years of 13,816 miles to the 36,018 miles in operation on July 1, 1868. The increase in three years exceeds 38 per cent., and in the last year alone it reached the unparalleled proportion of 17 per cent

READJUSTMENT OF PAY ON RAILROAD ROUTES.

The regular four-years term of contracts for the transportation of mails in the States of West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas expired June 30, 1871. In anticipation of the close of the term, returns of the amount and character of the mail service performed on railroad routes in those States were obtained, as a basis for the readjustment of the rates of compensation for the new term commencing July 1, 1871. These returns, with those from a number of routes in other States, are presented in Table E, hereto appended, from the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General. The readjustment founded upon these returns, and also the adjustment of rates on certain new routes, are exhibited in Table F. The rates were increased on fifty routes, and decreased on nine, the net excess of the present over the former amount of annual pay being $205,448 87. Table F embraces ninety-five routes in all, of which thirty-six are new.

In both my former reports I have advocated a revision and readjustment of the rates of compensation for the transportation of mails on railroads, but as yet no effective action has been taken by Congress. The Department continues to encounter many annoying difficulties in its efforts to secure a rapid transmission of the mails, particularly those containing newspapers, to the South and West, owing to complaints by the managers of railroads of the inadequacy of their pay, and their refusal to allow the use of their fastest trains and most commodious mail-cars. It is important to the service that this long-pending controversy should be settled, and hence I again renew my recommendation that the act of 3d March, 1845, be so amended as to allow a fair and reasonable increase of the compensation of railroad companies, upon condition that they shall enter into contract with the Department for the prompt and faithful performance of their duties.

POST-ROUTE MAPS.

The work on the preparation and publication of the series of post-route maps of the United States has been continued during the past year under the supervision of the topographer of the Department. Six maps in all, comprising fifteen sheets, on a large scale, are now completed, embracing the northern tier of States, from Maine to Wisconsin. These maps are in constant demand, as brought up in successive editions, to be furnished, when considered requisite, to postmasters and other agents of the Department. They are also furnished to members of Congress, for their convenience in correspondence with their constituents and with the Department. During the past year the double-sheet map of the States of Michigan and Wisconsin has been completed by the engraver. The compilation and engraving of a map, in four sheets, of the States of Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri are being pushed forward as fast as the peculiar nature of the work, involving the great and rapid changes and extension of the mail service in that region, will allow.

I renew my previous recommendation that an effort be made to secure some more precise and correct system of survey than now exists in some of the Middle and Southern States.

FINES AND DEDUCTIONS.

The amount of fines imposed upon contractors, and deductions made from their pay, on account of failures and other delinquencies, for the last year, was $75,256 71, and the amount remitted during the same period was $10,076 94, leaving the net amount of fines and deductions $65,179 77, as will appear by the following recapitulation :

Amount of fines	$4, 132 02
Amount of deductions	71, 124 69
Total	75, 256 71
Amount remitted	10, 076 94
Net amount	65, 179 77

MAIL-BAGS, LOCKS, AND KEYS.

A table appended to this report exhibits in detail the number, description, and cost of mail-bags, locks, and keys purchased and issued during the year. The total number of new mail-bags procured and put in service was 60,400, of which 54,000 were used for transmission of printed matter, and 6,400 for letter-mails. Their cost was $86,015. Contracts for furnishing mail-bags of all kinds were made during the year, according to law, after due advertisement, at prices averaging about 18 per cent. less than the last contracts for similar articles.

The necessity of substituting new kinds of mail-locks and keys for those formerly in use demanded very large purchases during the year. The number of locks of the new kinds purchased was 100,000, and of keys 63,000, at a cost of $68,190. Adding $1,273 40, the cost of repairs, the total expenditures are shown to be $69,463 40.

THROUGH MAILS.

Tables accompany the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, giving interesting details relative to the transmission of through mails from Washington, New York, Boston, Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Louis to San Francisco and back; from Washington to New Orleans and back; from New York to New Orleans and back, by different routes; and from New York to Memphis and back, by different routes.

On the route to San Francisco and back, the gratifying regularity noted in the last annual report has been fully maintained. Of 644 mails carried through, during the year ended with the month of September, 1871, to San Francisco from New York, 569 were conveyed in schedule time, and only 75 behind time, against 573 in time and 145 behind time the preceding year. Of 364 mails carried through to New York from San Francisco, 321 were conveyed in schedule time, and only 43 behind time, against 280 in time and 72 behind time the preceding year. The average time, going west, was 173 hours, or 7 days, 5 hours—nearly 3 hours less than the average the preceding year. The average time, going east, was 169 hours, 45 minutes, or 7 days, 1 hour, and 45 minutes—nearly 3 hours less than the average the preceding year. The shortest time, going west, was 162 hours; going east, 167 hours; against 144 hours, 40 minutes, going west, and 159 hours, 10 minutes, going east, the preceding year.

Between New York and New Orleans, one mail a day is still sent in each direction over the Southwestern route, via Washington, Lynchburgh, Knoxville, Chattanooga, and Grand Junction, and one over the Western route, via Cincinnati, Louisville, Humboldt, and Grand Junction, at which last-mentioned point the two routes unite and run on the same road to New Orleans. Of 357 mails carried through, during the year ended with the month of September, 1871, by the Southwestern route, to New Orleans from New York, 236 were conveyed in schedule time, and 121 behind time, against 214 in time and 149 behind time the preceding year; the average time being 93 hours, 9 minutes—29 minutes more than the average the preceding year. Of 357 mails carried through, by the same route, to New York from New Orleans, 224 were conveyed in schedule time, and 133 behind time, against 221 in time and 142 behind time the preceding year; the average time being 95 hours, 36 minutes—54 minutes less than the average the preceding year. The shortest time, going south, was 85 hours, 29 minutes; going north, 85 hours; against 84 hours, 54 minutes, going south, and 85 hours, 30 minutes, going north, the preceding year. Of 355 mails carried through, by the Western route, to New Orleans from New York, only 127 were conveyed in schedule time, and 228 behind time, against 121 in time and 235 behind time the preceding year; the average time being 89 hours, 45 minutes—5 minutes more than the average the preceding year. Of 304 mails carried through, by the same route, to New York from New Orleans, only 70 were conveyed in schedule time, and 234 behind time, against 126 in time and 182 behind time the preceding year; the average being 93 hours, 24 minutes—5 hours, 8 minutes, more than the average the preceding year. The shortest time, going south, was 77 hours, 30 minutes; going north, 77 hours; against 75 hours, 45 minutes, going south, and 77 hours, going north, the preceding year. These figures show a slight improvement of the service on the Southwestern route, and on the Western a deterioration, yet not so great as wholly to destroy its usefulness as an adjunct to the other route, on a portion of which, between Washington and Chattanooga, until recently, only a single train a day was run. Arrangements are now in progress for the transmission of double daily through mails over the Southwestern route.

An order was made in June last to transfer the great through mails for and from New Orleans to the line of the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad, diverging from the Southwestern route at Chattanooga, Tennessee, and running thence, by an air-line, to Meridian, Mississippi, and thence over the Mobile and Ohio and the New Orleans, Mobile and Texas Railroads, by which it appeared the time of transit might be reduced twelve hours; but the execution of the order was prevented by the interruption of the running of trains on the Alabama and Chattanooga road, so that the capability of that line as a route for the through mails remains yet to be tested by actual experiment.

DAILY MAIL TO CALIFORNIA.

An arrangement was made in January last to accommodate the citizens of California with a daily mail to and from the East, without the intermission occasioned previously by the lack of Sunday service between Chicago and the Missouri River. For this purpose, an allowance of $25,000 per annum was made, from January 22, 1871, to the proprietors of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy and the Burlington and Missouri River Railroads, the companies named being alone responsible to the Department for the service, but having the option of performing it on any one of the three lines between Chicago and Omaha, viz: the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy and the Burlington and Missouri River, via Burlington, Iowa; the Chicago and Northwestern, via Clinton, Iowa; or the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, via Rock Island, Illinois. The service has been performed in a manner entirely satisfactory to the Department and to the citizens interested.

MAIL DEPREDACTIONS.

The number of complaints of missing letters during the year is 4,600, of which 2,057 were registered and 2,543 unregistered, containing bonds, drafts, and currency to the nominal amount of $418,748 92. Of registered letters, 659 were accounted for as received at their destination, and only 283 have been reported as actually lost. The remaining cases are in the hands of special agents for investigation.

For violations of the postal laws, 123 persons have been arrested, of whom 51 have been convicted and sentenced to different degrees of punishment, and the remainder are in the hands of the Department of Justice to be dealt with according to law.

RAILWAY POST-OFFICES.

The statement hereto appended shows an increase of eight lines and 2,956 miles of railway post-office service. The number of lines in operation on the 30th day of June, 1871, was 49, extending in the aggregate over 11,208 miles of railroad and steamboat routes. Upon 8,660 miles the service is performed daily, upon 2,527 miles twice daily, and upon 21 miles four times daily, equivalent in all to 13,798 miles each way daily. Counting all the lines both ways, the aggregate service is 27,596 miles daily, and 10,072,540 miles annually. The number of clerks employed was 513, at an annual cost of $649,400, against 375 clerks, at a cost of $442,600, for the previous year, showing the increased cost for the fiscal year to be $206,800. Of this amount, the sum of $28,600 was expended for the equalization of salaries, the clerks in the western division and on two lines in Massachusetts, numbering in all 143, having been paid, previous to July 1, 1870, for the same class of duties, each $200 per annum less than those upon the other lines. Deducting this sum, the increased expenditure is $178,200.

During the last year, the Union Pacific Railroad, 1,032 miles in length, from Omaha, Nebraska, to Ogden, Utah, has been added to this service, and it has been decided to extend this line over the Central Pacific Railroad, an additional distance of 881 miles, from Ogden, Utah, to San Francisco, California.

There is twice-daily service between Portland, Maine, and Chicago, Illinois, and over the greater portion of this route the mail-cars are carried upon the fastest passenger trains, thereby insuring the delivery of all through and way mails in the shortest possible time.

Arrangements have recently been completed to establish a continuous line of railway post-offices from Portland, Maine, over the Maine Central and the European and North American Railways, to Vanceborough, at the boundary-line between New Brunswick and the United States. The authorities of the Dominion of Canada will connect and continue a similar service to St. John, New Brunswick.

Partial arrangements have also been made for a line of railway post-offices from Washington, D. C., to New Orleans, Louisiana, an organization having been effected this month (November) as far as Chattanooga, Tennessee. From that point to New Orleans the service will be established as soon as the negotiations, now pending, can be concluded.

On the 15th instant, a line of railway post-offices was also established from Milwaukee, Wisconsin, to Saint Paul, Minnesota, for the purpose of securing a more accurate and expeditious distribution of the mails for the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

The distance from Vanceborough, Maine, to San Francisco, California, via Boston, Albany, Buffalo, Toledo, Chicago, and Omaha, is 3,832 miles; and from Vanceborough to New Orleans, via Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and Chattanooga, is 2,108 miles. It is the purpose of the Department to establish continuous lines of railway post-offices connecting these remote points and supplying all diverging lines. They will be the longest lines in the world, and will afford the most ample facilities now known for the transmission and distribution of the mails between the States and Territories which they will respectively traverse.

Special efforts have been made during the past year to perfect the distribution of mail matter upon the several lines. Thorough schemes of distribution have been carefully prepared and furnished the clerks, thus enabling them to facilitate greatly the delivery of mails by the quickest attainable routes.

The value of the railway post-office system was especially demonstrated after the destruction, by fire, of the great distributing post-office at Chicago, Illinois, on the 9th of October last. But for the lines leading to the West and concentrating at Chicago, the mails for the extreme Western and Northwestern States would have been seriously interrupted for many weeks. During the month of October, besides the letter-mails, a large portion of the great paper-mails for the States mentioned were successfully distributed on the cars and passed to their destination with the usual dispatch.

The want of sufficient room upon the cars now in use prevents, however, the proper distribution of the large through paper-mails, subjecting them to frequent delays at the various distributing offices for separation, while the letter-mails go directly forward to their destination.

FOREIGN MAILS.

The total number of letters exchanged, during the year, with foreign countries, was 20,295,998, an increase of 1,936,620 over the number reported for 1870. Of this number, 10,461,868 were sent from, and 9,834,130 were received in, the United States.

The number of letters (single rates) exchanged in the mails with European countries was 14,113,560, an increase of 912,114 over the number reported for 1870.

The total postages on the letters exchanged with foreign countries amounted to $1,735,266 32, being $229,298 16 less than the amount reported for 1870.

The aggregate amount of postage (sea, inland, and foreign) on the letter-mails exchanged with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, The Netherlands, Belgium, and France, was $1,181,057 41, being $264,885 19 less than the amount reported for 1870. The postages on letters sent exceeded the postages on letters received from the same countries in the sum of $5,802 15, being less than one-half of one per cent. of the aggregate amount. The postages collected in the United States amounted to $755,724 39, and in Europe to $425,333 02, the excess of collections in the United States being $330,391 37, or 28 per cent. of the entire postage receipts.

Comparing the year 1871 with the year 1870, the rate of increase in the total number of letters exchanged in the mails with foreign countries was $10\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and the rate of decrease in the amount of postages thereon was $11\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. The increase in the number of letters exchanged with European countries was nearly 7 per cent., and the decrease of postages thereon amounted to $18\frac{3}{16}$ per cent.; this large reduction in postage receipts having resulted from the greatly reduced rates of international postages established between the United States and the different countries of Europe, which came into operation during the latter half of the fiscal year 1870, but the full effect of which was not realized until the year 1871. The most important of these reductions was that made between this country and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland on January 1, 1870, when the single rate for prepaid letters was reduced from 12 to 6 cents, causing a like reduction of 6 cents per single rate in the postage charges on letters to and from all countries and places served by the British mails. This was followed by reduced postage charges, from 15 to 10 cents per single rate, on the letters exchanged by closed mails, via England, with Germany, Belgium, Italy, The Netherlands, and Switzerland, including all countries and places to which they respectively serve as intermediaries, which came into operation near the close of the last fiscal year. Reduced rates of postage were also established, at the same time, to countries on the west coast of South America, British Columbia, Sandwich Islands, New Zealand, Australia, and the East Indies.

The total weight of the mails exchanged, during the year, with European countries, under provisions of existing postal conventions, was 1,298,966 pounds; the weight of the letter correspondence being 281,905 pounds, and of printed matter and samples 1,017,061 pounds. The aggregate weight of the mails sent to Europe was 627,591 pounds, and of mails received from Europe 671,375 pounds. The weight of letter correspondence sent to Europe was 155,601 pounds, and of letter correspondence received from Europe 126,304 pounds.

The cost of the United States transatlantic mail steamship service for the year 1871 was $174,138 39, being $148,153 48 less than the cost of the same service during the year 1870. The steamships employed under contract with this Department received the sea postages of 6 cents an ounce on letter-mails, and 6 cents a pound on other matter, as full compensation for the service. The earnings of the respective lines were as follows, viz :

The Liverpool and Great Western line, for 53 trips, from New York to Queens- town	$60, 805 3 ⁴
The Inman line, for 53 trips, from New York to Queenstown and Liver- pool	49, 537 35
The Cunard line, for 49 trips, from New York to Queenstown and Liver- pool	22, 178 81
The Hamburg-American Packet Company, for 29 trips, from New York to Plymouth and Hamburg	20, 415 69
The North German Lloyd, of Bremen, for 48 trips, from New York to South- ampton and Bremen	15, 676 32
The Canadian line, for 52 trips, to Liverpool	5, 524 84
Total	174, 138 39

The United States postages on the mails conveyed to and from the West Indies, Mexico, Panama, South Pacific, Belize, (Honduras,) Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Bermuda, amounted to $125,780 93, and the cost of the sea conveyance thereof was $76,857 32. The United States postages on the mails exchanged with Brazil, Japan and China, the Sandwich Islands, New Zealand, and Australia, by means of the subsidized lines of direct mail steamers, amounted to $46,993 52.*

The total cost of the United States ocean mail steamship service for the year 1871 (including $725,000 paid from special appropriations for steamship service to Japan and China, to Brazil, and to the Hawaiian Islands) was $975,995 71.

The mail steamship service on all the ocean routes has been regularly performed according to contract. The transatlantic mails have been conveyed exclusively by foreign steamship lines, receiving, under the general law, the sea postages thereon as compensation for the service. Regular monthly service has been maintained on the United States mail steamship routes to Japan and China, to Brazil, and to the Hawaiian Islands. There is no doubt that an increase of service from monthly to semi-monthly trips on the Brazil and China lines would greatly promote their efficiency for postal and commercial purposes. The great length of each of these routes, between ports distant from each other 5,500 and 7,000 miles, respectively, renders a monthly mail service on either of them disjointed and inadequate for rapid reliable postal communication. This is peculiarly the case with regard to the mail service performed on the United States and Brazil line. The schedule of sailing-days is the best that can be arranged for a monthly service on a route of that length, and allows, at most, only two days at New York between the arrivals and departures of the steamers, so that merchants in Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other Atlantic seaboard cities are usually unable to answer correspondence or fill orders by the return steamers, causing them great delay, inconvenience, and loss. The result is that a majority of the letters from the United States for Brazil are forwarded in the British mail via Southampton, reaching their destination by that circuitous route sooner than if detained a month for transmission by the next direct steamer from New York to Rio de Janeiro. It is manifest, therefore, that a monthly service on this commercially important route is inadequate to the wants of the public, and fails to accomplish the purposes which Congress had in view in granting a money subsidy to this line of steamers.

In my report of last year I renewed the recommendation of the preceding year for an increase of mail service to semi-monthly trips on the route from San Francisco to Japan and China. I am still impressed with the importance of authorizing additional trips on this line, the establishment of which has already given us the control of the large and rapidly increasing commerce of the North Pacific Ocean with Japan and China; and, for like considerations, I deem it expedient that suitable provision should be made for increasing the service from monthly to semi-monthly trips on the steamship line from New York to Rio de Janeiro.

An application was made to Congress at its last session, by American citizens, for governmental aid in establishing an American line of mail steamships between San Francisco, New Zealand, and the Australian colonies, by way of the Sandwich Islands. A bill granting a money subsidy to the proposed line was reported by the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, but it failed to pass the Senate, as did all other similar bills proposing Government aid to projected steamship lines. Disappointed in obtaining the desired legislation from Congress, the projectors of this enterprise entered into a contract for the contemplated service with the government of New Zealand, which government had previously signified its readiness to assist, by a moderate subsidy, in establishing a direct postal communication by steamships with the United States. An American line of steamships has thus been placed upon the route between San Francisco, New Zealand, and Australia, via the Sandwich Islands, and is now carrying our mails regularly once in four weeks from San Francisco, under the patronage of the New Zealand government, with the expectation, on the part of the proprietors of the line, that additional aid to maintain this service will be granted by Congress at the approaching session. There can be no question of the commercial importance to the United States of establishing and maintaining a direct and rapid steam communication by American steamships with the countries and islands of the Southwest Pacific Ocean. Such a line will secure to our citizens a large share of the trade of those colonies, now rapidly growing in population and wealth, and greatly benefit the general business interests of the country. A large portion of the heavy traffic and travel between Europe and Australia, which has heretofore taken the routes via Suez and the Cape of Good Hope, will be transferred to the American route via San Francisco, if reliable and rapid steam communication shall be permanently established between that port and the countries of Australasia. Already, since the inauguration of direct steamship service from San Francisco, heavy English mails are being transported across our continent to and from New Zealand and the Australian colonies, the time occupied in their conveyance to destination being less by nearly two weeks than by the Suez route. As manifest considerations of public policy and commercial advantage make it desirable to sustain a first-class line of American steamships upon this route, the question of uniting with the Australian colonies in the support of the existing service by a moderate money subsidy is respectfully submitted to Congress for its consideration and appropriate action.

In previous reports I have called attention to the importance of judicious legislation to encourage the establishment of American mail steamship lines. For several years past we have practically ceased, as a nation, to compete with other maritime powers in ocean steam navigation. Various projects have been devised and urged upon Congress by interested parties, many of them without capital or practical experience in steam commerce, seeking large subsidy grants, in a variety of forms, for the conveyance of our mails in American steamships to European ports. Much valuable time has been devoted by the Post-Office committees and by Congress to the consideration and discussion of the many conflicting schemes presented for their action, without accomplishing any practical results; and the transportation of our mails, passengers, and freights across the Atlantic is still performed exclusively by the steamship lines of other nations. Surely some legislation is demanded to revive the great maritime interests of the country and encourage the construction and equipment of an efficient ocean steam mercantile marine. The subject is one of paramount importance to the material interests of the country, and should receive the most thorough and careful attention of Congress.

It is a very gratifying fact, in this connection, to state that, amid all the discouragements of the present situation, a new line of American iron steamships, to ply between Philadelphia and Liverpool, consisting of four first-class propellers of 3,000 tons each, (old measurement,) are now being built on the Delaware for the American Steamship Company of Philadelphia, of materials exclusively of American manufacture. They will be completed and ready for service early in the fall of 1872, and will form a regular weekly line between the above-named ports. The proprietors of this pioneer line of American iron steamships are among the most enterprising merchants and capitalists of Philadelphia, and deserve such encouragement in their praiseworthy undertaking as can properly be extended by Congress. A reasonable compensation for conveying the mails, in excess of the postage receipts, is probably the only Government aid needed to insure the permanent establishment of this or any other similar line of American ocean steamers plying between our own and foreign ports; and, in my judgment, the granting of such incidental aid, in connection with proper legislation to encourage the construction by American builders of first-class iron steamships, is the most simple, economical, and practical method of establishing American lines of ocean steamers and advancing the general commercial prosperity of the country.

An additional article to the postal convention between the United States and Germany was signed at Washington March 3, and at Berlin May 14, 1871, reducing the postage on direct letter-mails exchanged between the two countries, a copy of which is annexed. Arrangements have also been concluded with the German postal administration, and carried into operation on the 1st of October, 1871, further reducing the postage charge for prepaid letters between the United States and Germany transmitted by closed mail via England from 10 to 7 cents per single rate, and also the postage charges for prepaid letters by the direct routes via Bremen and Hamburg, respectively, from 7 to 6 cents per single rate.

Postal conventions have been negotiated with the republic of Ecuador and with the Argentine Republic establishing and regulating the reciprocal exchange of correspondence with each of those countries at reduced rates of international postage. The duplicate originals of said conventions have been transmitted to those governments, respectively, for ratification, and notice was recently received through the Department of State that the convention with Ecuador had been ratified by the congress of that republic.

Negotiations are in progress with the governments of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway for the conclusion of postal conventions ameliorating the exchange of correspondence and reducing rates of postage between the United States and each of those kingdoms. I have every reason to hope for the early conclusion of the desired conventions.

I have also submitted to the Russian government, through its minister at Washington, propositions for a postal convention with Russia providing for an exchange of correspondence with that country in closed mails via England and Germany, at moderated postage charges.

Negotiations have been renewed for a postal convention with France, but I regret to state that there is little prospect of a favorable result. Modified propositions, based on the liberal provisions of our postal arrangements with Germany and other leading countries of Europe, were submitted by this Department more than a year ago, at the request of the French minister at Washington, and transmitted by him to his government for consideration and instructions. No reply having been received, the attention of Mr. Washburne, our minister to France, was recently invited to the subject, with request to bring these proposals to the notice of the French government, and, if possible, have them considered and acted upon by the proper authorities at Paris; but I am not advised that any action has yet been taken.

APPOINTMENTS.

The report of the Appointment Office shows the following:

Number of post-offices established during the year	2, 407
Number discontinued	854
Increase	1, 553
Number in operation on June 30, 1870	28, 492
Number in operation on June 30, 1871	30, 045
Number to be filled by appointments of the President	1, 172
Number to be filled by appointments of the Postmaster General	28, 873

Appointments were made during the year:

On resignations	4, 307
On removals	1, 179
On changes of names and sites	178
On deaths of postmasters	309
On establishment of new post-offices	2, 407

Total appointments

Number of cases acted on during the year

The number and aggregate compensation of special agents, route-agents, mail-route messengers, railway post-office clerks, and local agents in service during the year ended June 30, 1871, were:

50 special agents	$121, 899 00
684 route-agents	671, 280 00
103 mail-route messengers	61, 910 00
513 railway post-office clerks	649, 400 00
82 local agents	58, 430 00
Total compensation	1, 562, 919 00

FREE-DELIVERY SYSTEM.

The free-delivery system has been in operation during the year in fifty-two of the principal cities, with the following aggregate results:

Number of letter-carriers	1, 419
Mail letters delivered	112, 612, 693
Local letters delivered	27, 045, 760
Newspapers delivered	32, 610, 353
Liters collected	113, 287, 602
Amount paid carriers, including incidental expenses	$1, 353, 923 23
Postage on local matter	$758, 120 78

This shows the following increase, compared with last year:

Letter-carriers	57
Mail letters delivered	14, 800, 862
Local letters delivered	5, 248, 111
Newspapers delivered	4, 743, 330
Letters collected	15, 496, 556
Amount paid carriers, including incidental expenses	$123, 843 38
Postage on local matter	$76, 256 08

EMPLOYÉS IN THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The following table will show the number of employés in the Post-Office Department; also the number of postmasters, contractors, clerks in post-offices, route-agents, railway post-office clerks, and other officers, in service on the 30th June, 1871:

Department officers:

Postmaster General	1
Assistant Postmasters General	3
Superintendent of Foreign Mails	1
Superintendent of Money-Order Office	1
Chief of division of dead letters	1
Chief clerk of Department	1
Chief clerks of Bureaus	4
Clerks, laborers, watchmen, &c	319
Total departmental	331

Other officers:

Postmasters	30, 045
Contractors	7, 286
Clerks in post-offices	3, 439
Letter-carriers	1, 419
Route-agents	684
Railway post-office clerks	513
Mail-route messengers	103
Local agents	82
Special agents	52
.....	43, 623
Total in service	43, 954

DEAD LETTERS.

The number of letters, domestic and foreign, received at the dead-letter office during the last fiscal year was as follows:

Domestic letters, classed as—
Ordinary	2, 931, 244
Drop	492, 300
Unmailable	373, 363
Hotel	26, 732
Fictitious	66, 264
Registered	6, 162
Returned from foreign countries	77, 010
Total domestic letters	3, 973, 075
Foreign letters	221, 673
Whole number	4, 194, 748

Of domestic letters not registered, 16,218 contained money amounting to $59,608 37, in sums of one dollar and upward; and of the registered letters, 2,359 contained $19,204 61, making a total of 18,577 letters, containing $78,812 98. Of these, 17,082, containing $74,420 90, were delivered to the writers or persons addressed; 2,902, containing $10,397 02, which could not be returned to the owners, were filed for reclamation; and 1,495, containing $4,392 08, were outstanding. The number inclosing sums less than one dollar was 14,956, containing $3,808 92; of which 12,413, containing $3,094 90, were delivered to the writers, and 2,543, containing $714 02, were filed for reclamation.

The number of letters containing bank checks, drafts, deeds, &c., was 19,193, of the nominal value of $3,075,869 23; of which 17,905, of the nominal value of $2,855,030 31, were delivered to the owners, and 1,288, of the nominal value of $220,838 92, were outstanding or filed for reclamation.

The number of packages and letters containing jewelry, books, and other property was 6,498; of which 4,298 were delivered, and 2,200 were filed for reclamation.

The number containing photographs was 42,119; of which 36,544 were delivered, and 5,575 were filed. The number containing receipts, bills of lading, &c., was 28,196; of which 27,081 were delivered, and 1,115 were filed. The number containing postage and revenue stamps and articles of small value was 40,749; of which 37,889 were delivered, and 2,860 were filed.

The number of letters without inclosures remailed to the writers was 1,628,803; of which 1,334,303 were delivered, and 294,500 were returned to the office and destroyed. The number in which the writer's name and local address were omitted or were illegible, and of letters containing circulars, &c., and consequently destroyed, was 2,173,984.

Of the unmailable letters, 301,472 were detained for postage, not being prepaid, as required by law. They were either wholly unpaid, were not prepaid one full rate, or were stamped with illegal or revenue stamps; 68,373 were misdirected, the post-office, State, or some necessary part of the address being omitted; and 3,518 had no address whatever.

The number of applications for dead letters was 7,371, and in 2,471 cases the letters were found and forwarded to the owners.

The amounts deposited in the United States Treasury were—

POSTAL MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM.

During the last fiscal year, the number of money-order offices in operation was 2,076. On the 31st of July, 1871, 376 additional money-order offices were established, so that the whole number of such offices is at present 2,452.

The number of domestic money-orders issued during the year was 2,151,794, the aggregate value of which was	$42, 164, 118 03
The number of such orders paid was 2,121,664, amounting in value to	$41, 705, 667 03
To this sum is to be added the amount of orders repaid to the purchasers.....	321, 669 28
Total of payments.....	42, 027, 336 31
Excess of issues over payments.....	136, 781 72

The amount of fees or commissions paid by the public to postmasters for the issue of orders was $295,286 15.

This statement shows an increase over 1870, in the amount of orders issued, of \$8,109,923 32, or 23 $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; in the amount of orders paid, of \$8,099,411 52, or 23 $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; and in the amount of fees received, of \$60,050 35, or 25 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

The average amount of the money-orders issued during the year was $19 59. This amount varies but little from year to year, not having fallen below $19 for the last five years, and having only once slightly exceeded $20.

The whole number of duplicate orders drawn was 8,858, of which 8,725 were issued in lieu of original orders which failed to reach the respective payees because of their change of residence, or because of erroneous or imperfect address, or for other causes; 111 were substituted for orders which became invalid because not presented for payment before the expiration of one year after date; and 22 for orders rendered invalid in consequence of bearing, contrary to law, more than one indorsement.

The increase in the number of duplicates during the last year was 1,683, or 23½ per cent., nearly the same rate of increase as that of the orders issued and paid.

The receipts and expenditures of the last year, as adjusted and reported by the Auditor, were as follows, viz:

Receipts:
Fees received for money-orders issued	$295,286 15
Amount received for premium on drafts	277 23
Total	295,563 38
Expenditures:
Commission to postmasters and allowances for clerk hire....	$177,773 56
Allowances for remittances lost in transmission by mail.....	7,715 00
Incidental expenses for stationery and fixtures.....	8,893 04
	194,381 60
Excess of receipts over expenditures, being revenue derived from the trans- action of the money-order business.....	101,181 78

During the past year, the amount of surplus money-order funds accruing at the smaller post-offices from the sale of money-orders, and by them remitted to and deposited in the larger or first-class offices designated as their depositories, was $30,965,223 35.

Forty-two remittances, to the aggregate amount of $11,053 52, were reported as having been lost in transmission by mail last year, of which the sum of $4,492 52 was recovered through the efforts of special agents of the Department; the sum of $2,627 was allowed to the credit of postmasters who furnished satisfactory proof that they had, respectively, duly remitted the several amounts stated by them; credit claimed for remittances to the amount of $495 was disallowed; and claims amounting to $3,439 were unsettled and pending at the close of the year.

The total amount of allowances made to postmasters during the year for lost remittances was $7,715; but of this amount the sum of $5,088 was on account of losses during previous years.

The drafts drawn by postmasters whose money-order payments habitually exceed their issues against credits furnished them to a designated amount, in each case, with the postmaster at New York, amounted to $3,850,227 86. Funds amounting in the aggregate to $58,636 15 were also furnished by the postmaster at San Francisco to postmasters in the Pacific States and Territories who required assistance to pay orders drawn upon them.

Out of the whole number of orders paid, viz: 2,121,664, payment of 30, amounting to $922 68, was claimed to have been improperly or fraudulently obtained. In nine cases, the amount of the orders, $381 54, was recovered by special agents and paid to the rightful owners. In five cases, amounting to $141, the paying postmasters were held responsible for the erroneous payment and required to pay over that amount to the several persons entitled to receive it. The Department refunded the amount of two orders, for $45, improperly paid, the postmaster not having been found at fault. In four cases, amounting to $81, the claim for compensation was not allowed, as it was discovered upon investigation to be without good foundation. Ten cases, of the value of $274 14, are still pending.

From the establishment of the money-order system, on the 1st of November, 1864, the profits accruing from its operations have been as follows, viz :

Proceeds from November 1, 1864, to July 1, 1866.....	$90 82
Proceeds during the fiscal year 1867.....	26, 260 61
Proceeds during the fiscal year 1868.....	54, 158 15

Postmasters are allowed, by the standing regulations of the Department, "to make deposits of surplus money-order funds, by procuring from any disbursing officer of the United States a check on an assistant treasurer or designated depository thereof located in the same city or town as the post-office where the deposit is to be made." This mode of remittance is not only very convenient for postmasters of money-order offices at or near military posts, but is often the only means by which they can forward their surplus funds without extreme danger of loss. The Treasury Department, however, by the Second Comptroller's circular of May 15, 1871, notified disbursing officers that it would decline thereafter to approve any duplicate check except for "additional bounty and pensions, as specially authorized by law," for the reason that Congress, at its last session, declined to pass a bill providing a general system for the issue and payment of duplicates of lost checks drawn by disbursing officers of the United States. Hence, if such check, drawn in consideration of money-order funds received from a postmaster, is lost or destroyed, the money which it represents is lost to this Department. A case of this kind has already occurred, a quartermaster's check for $522, in favor of the postmaster at New York, having been lost in course of transmission by mail by the total wreck of a steamer off Cape Hatteras. For this check no duplicate can now be obtained. Under these circumstances, I would respectfully suggest such legislation as would authorize disbursing officers of the Army, under regulations to be prescribed by the Treasury Department, to issue duplicates of lost checks drawn by them in favor of one postmaster on account of public moneys received from another.

By the act of February 13, 1865, any assistant treasurer or depository of the United States is allowed, in case of sickness or unavoidable absence from his office, to authorize, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, his chief clerk, or some other clerk employed therein, to act in his place, and to discharge all the official duties required of him by law, "provided that the official bond given by the principal of the office shall be held to cover and apply to the acts of the person appointed to act in his place in such cases." The interests of the postal service require the passage of an act giving postmasters at money-order offices similar authority in like circumstances.

The recommendation made in my last report with reference to the expediency of additional legislation to authorize the extension of the money-order system to the stations or sub-post-offices in the large cities is respectfully renewed.

During the year 1871, the amount, in currency, received by postmasters for orders issued by them on the exchange office at New York in favor of payees in Switzerland, was $38,489 56. The amount of orders paid in the United States on account of remittances from Switzerland was $12,003 53; showing an increase over the corresponding transactions of last year of $16,299 86, or 73.45 per cent., in the issues, and a decrease of $8,447 39, or 70.37 per cent., in the payments. From the commencement of the international system with Switzerland, on the 1st of September, 1869, to the close of the last fiscal year, a period of twenty-two months, the amount of orders issued by the United States offices for payment in Switzerland was $60,679 26, and the amount of orders paid on account of remittances from that country was $32,454 45. After payment of the entire balance due Switzerland on account of this exchange of money-orders, a net profit of $4,521 21 accrued to the United States, the expenses proper, exclusive of the premiums paid for gold funds purchased to pay balances found due periodically to Switzerland, having amounted to but $51 87. The total cost of such premiums was $2,623 77.

It was stated in my last annual report that negotiations were in progress for the establishment of an international system of postal money-orders between the United States and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. As these negotiations, which were conducted by means of epistolary correspondence for a period of eighteen months, failed to effect an agreement as to the provisions of such a system, I decided, in May last, to send a competent officer of this Department to confer personally with the postal authorities of the United Kingdom upon the points in controversy. The Superintendent of the Money-Order System was accordingly dispatched to London for that purpose on the 25th of that month, as a special agent, duly authorized to negotiate the terms of a convention for a money-order system between the two countries, subject to my approval, by and with the advice and consent of the President. The special agent succeeded in negotiating a convention for that object, which was signed in London June 30, 1871, and approved and signed in Washington July 27, 1871. A copy of that convention will be found in the appendix. In pursuance of its provisions, the money-order system between the two countries went into operation October 2, 1871. From that date up to October 28, a period of four weeks, the amount of the orders remitted from this country to Great Britain was $63,061 13, and of orders in the opposite direction $14,684 19, a manifest indication that this system of exchange supplies an existing public want and will be extensively used by remitters of small sums to and from Great Britain.

A communication having been received May 15, 1871, from the post department of the German Empire, expressing a desire to enter into negotiations "for the introduction of the money-order system into the postal intercourse between the two countries," I instructed the special agent above mentioned to proceed, after having completed negotiations with the British office, to Berlin, and to treat with the post department of Germany as to the terms of a convention for establishing an international money-order system with that country. A convention to that end was duly negotiated, in pursuance of these instructions, with an authorized agent of the German post department, at Berlin, July 22, 1871, and now awaits complete ratification by the proper authorities of both countries. By the terms of this convention, the money-order business between the two countries is to commence on the 1st of October, 1872.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The recent experience of the Contract Office of this Department indicates the propriety of a material amendment to the laws regulating mail contracts.

On the 30th of September, 1870, advertisements were issued, in regular form, for all mail contracts in the section comprising the States of West Virginia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas. In response to these advertisements, many bids were received and duly entered, and, under the 24th section of the act of July 2, 1836, contracts were, without exception, awarded to the lowest bidders. On the 1st of July, the time when, agreeably to the advertisement and the usage of the Department, the new contractors were required to commence the discharge of their duties, it was ascertained that the bidders to whom contracts on most of the important routes had been awarded had failed to perform the service. The whole number of failing bidders was 195, and the routes thus left without regular contractors were found to be located as follows: 3 in West Virginia, 11 in Virginia, 2 in Georgia, 2 in Florida, 77 in Alabama, 2 in Mississippi, 11 in Louisiana, 42 in Texas, and 45 in Arkansas. Suspecting that the bidders who had thus failed were not acting in good faith, and that in many cases they were fictitious and what are called "straw bidders," the Department, on the 19th July last, addressed a letter to the Attorney General, stating the condition of affairs, and asking for an authoritative interpretation of the laws as to the powers of the Postmaster General in making contracts for the conveyance of the mails.

In strict conformity with the opinion of the Attorney General, dated July 22 last, the Department proceeded to make temporary contracts, on the best terms attainable, for six months, or longer, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, and to readvertise, for the residue of the contract term, all the routes whereon service had failed. The new advertisements, for a reletting from January 1, 1872, to June 30, 1875, were issued on August 4, 1871, and the new awards were made on the 1st of November, instant.

It was hoped that, under the operation of the 4th section of the act of March 3, 1871, which required all bidders to accompany their bids for five thousand dollars or over with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster General, for an amount not less than five per cent. of their bids, and which was applied, for the first time, to the bids under the last-named advertisement, a more favorable result would be obtained. I regret, however, to be obliged to say that the bids under the last advertisement are in no respect an improvement on those under the first, and that, of all the routes readvertised, only two were awarded to bidders who bid over five thousand dollars and who gave evidence of honesty of purpose by accompanying their bids with a check for five per cent. of the amount thereof.

This second failure satisfied me that, under existing laws, it is impossible for the Department to secure a fair competition among responsible parties who are willing and able to perform the required service for a fair price. Herewith I file a statement of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, showing the number and termini of all the routes readvertised, the compensation under the old contracts, the amount of failing bids, the cost per annum of temporary service for six months, and the amount of accepted bids for the same from January 1, 1872, from which it will appear that the cost of temporary service is largely in excess of the cost of a like amount of service under the regular contracts, which expired on the 1st of July last.

Hoping to frustrate like attempts to defraud the Government in the future, I respectfully recommend that the laws regulating mail contracts be so amended as to make it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for any person who, after bidding for mail service and receiving an award thereof, shall fail to make a contract in due form and perform the service described in his bid or proposal, and also so as to declare it to be a misdemeanor, punishable in like manner, for any person to withdraw or attempt to withdraw, after the day appointed for the opening thereof, any bid he may make for such service, until a contract therefor shall have been duly signed and accepted and the contractor shall have proceeded to perform his duties thereunder to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General. I furthermore recommend that additional power be given to the Postmaster General to reject manifestly fraudulent or fictitious bids, and, after a regular bidder or contractor shall have failed to enter into contract, or to fulfill his contract when made, to proceed to contract on the best terms obtainable from any responsible party, whether a bidder or not, for the performance of the service for the residue of the contract term. If it be deemed advisable to continue in force the provision requiring certified checks or drafts to accompany the bids, then I recommend that the amount of the check or draft in each case be fixed at five per cent. of the last regular contract price, where said contract price exceeded $5,000. This would compel bidders to make deposits in support of their proposals on all the more important routes, and would not leave open, as now, an opportunity to the fraudulent bidder to defeat the law by simply reducing his bid below five thousand dollars.

The Postmaster General being required by a clause of the first section of the civil appropriation act of March 3, 1871, to fix the rates to be paid for telegraphic dispatches by the several Departments of the Government, I called to my assistance Brigadier General Albert J. Myer, Chief Signal Officer of the Army, and, upon his recommendation, supported by the legal opinion of Hon. William Whiting, specially retained as Assistant Attorney General, I passed an order, dated June 29 last, declaring—1st. That the rates for all telegraphic communications known as the signal-service messages and reports should be two cents for each word for each circuit over which it may pass in accordance with the schedule of circuits and plans of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, and that no additional or extra allowance should be made under any pretext whatever; 2d. That for all other communications on behalf of the Government the rate should be one cent per word for each distance of two hundred and fifty miles or fraction of such distance. The views of General Myer are fully stated in a communication addressed to the Postmaster General, dated 18th of July last, and made part of this report.

The postal telegraph is by far the most important subject now inviting consideration in connection with the transmission and interchange of intelligence. The governments of the continental countries of Europe have, with few exceptions, claimed and exercised for years past the right of controlling and managing the electric telegraph, and in every instance with a degree of success commensurate with the care and attention bestowed upon their respective administrations. In Sweden, Norway, Russia, Bavaria, Italy, Turkey, Greece, and Spain, great advantages have been gained by making the telegraph a part of the public postal system; while in Switzerland, Belgium, The Netherlands, Prussia, and France, where modern appliances and improvements have been more thoroughly utilized, the policy of governmental control has been fully vindicated. It remained for Great Britain to give a practical test of the public system as compared with the management of corporations and companies of private stockholders. After a protracted and most laborious investigation, Parliament passed, on 31st July, 1868, "An act to enable Her Majesty's Postmaster General to acquire, work, and maintain electric telegraphs," which was followed on the 9th August, 1869, by an act providing the money necessary to purchase the undertakings of the several telegraph companies in Great Britain and Ireland. On the 5th of February, 1870, the transfers were effected, and the work of the postal telegraph began. At first, serious difficulties were encountered by reason of the delay in passing the money bill and the inadequate preparations to accommodate the immense increase of business which immediately followed the large reduction of rates. These difficulties, however, were soon overcome, and, thanks to the indefatigable and intelligent labors of Hon. Frank Ives Scudamore, second secretary, and his assistants, the advocates of the measure can already boast of its triumphant success. The charges established in the beginning were uniform throughout the United Kingdom, without regard to distance, and were fixed at the maximum permitted by law, that is to say, one shilling (24 cents) for the first twenty words or part of twenty words, and threepence (six cents) for each additional five words or part of five words, exclusive of signature and address. Referring to an elaborate report of Mr. Scudamore, it appears that the average cost of inland messages was about one shilling, one penny, (26 cents,) against an average cost prior to the transfer of one shilling, sevenpence, (38 cents,) showing a reduction in price of nearly one-third. In the first week after the transfer, the number of messages (exclusive of news and press messages) forwarded from all stations was 128,872; in the week ending 31st March, the number had risen to 160,775. The average weekly number in 13 weeks, to 30th June, was 177,410; the average number in 13 weeks, to 30th September, was 200,787; and the average number in 13 weeks, to 31st December, was 203,572. In the week ending on the 31st December, which is usually considered the worst week in the year for telegraphic work, the number was 144,041, or nearly 16,000 in excess of the number of the first week. The total number of messages forwarded in the three quarters, to 31st December, 1870, was as follows:

In quarter to 30th June.....	2, 306, 340
In quarter to 30th September.....	2, 610, 237
In quarter to 31st December.....	2, 646, 432
In three quarters.....	7, 563, 015

In addition to the foregoing, ample provision was made for the press and news work. The companies, before the transfer, sent news to 306 subscribers in 144 towns only in the United Kingdom; the postal telegraph sent news to 1,106 subscribers in 365 towns. The companies sent news to 173 newspapers only; the postal telegraph sent news to 467 newspapers: showing an increase of 221 in the number of towns to which news was sent, an increase of 800 in the total number of subscribers for news, and an increase of 294 in the number of newspapers taking news. There was, moreover, a vast increase in the quantity of news transmitted. The companies sent, during the session of Parliament, nearly 6,000 words of news daily; during the remainder of the year, they sent nearly 4,000 words daily. The postal telegraph sent, during the session of Parliament, in behalf of the news associations, nearly 20,000 words of news daily; and during the remainder of the year, nearly 15,000 words daily. The postal telegraph also transmitted from 15,000 to 20,000 words daily for the ordinary newspaper correspondents; and seven newspapers rented special wires during the night at the uniform rate of £500, instead of rates ranging from £750 to £1,000, as before. Two other wires were about to be rented to newspaper proprietors at the close of the year, and many more could have been rented if the department could have spared them. There has been doubtless a still further increase of messages during the current year. By an official statement received from the British office, the number of messages for the week ended September 23, 1871, is shown to be 256,456, against 189,636 for the corresponding week of last year. This increase for a single week of 66,820, averaged through the year, would exhibit an annual increase of 3,474,640 messages. The financial results are even more satisfactory. The official report of Honorable George Chetwynd, receiver and accountant general of the British office, shows the following most favorable result for the fiscal year ended 31st March last.

Amount received for the transmission of telegraphic messages, &c., in cash.	212,519	5 4	273,281 17 3½		697,933 16 8
Amount received for the transmission of telegraphic messages, &c., in postage stamps.	758,696	8 7½
	971,215	13 11½	273,281	17 3½	697,933	16 8

Let it be noted that the net produce is £697,933, or, computing the pound sterling at $4 86, $3,391,954 38.

These facts, all tending, with overwhelming force, in one direction, demonstrate conclusively the utility of the postal telegraph for both government and people.

Some may hesitate to adopt it in this country because of the great extent of our territory, the paucity of our population in certain large sections, and the great expense involved in extinguishing the rights of telegraph companies. The first two are the same objections that were urged for many years against all ameliorations of our postal service; nevertheless, postages have been cheapened and made uniform, and, at the same time, the postal system has been maintained and improved. Rightly viewed, the extent of the country is a strong argument in favor of a postal telegraph and the additional facilities and uniform rates it will afford. It is only in countries of large extent that the value of instantaneous, or nearly instantaneous, communication can be appreciated. Who, that desires to convey or acquire any information, would hesitate between sending a telegram from New York to California in seven minutes for twenty cents, and sending a letter in seven days for three cents? Our sparse population is rapidly growing more dense by the acquisition of one million and a quarter of people per annum. As railroads are extended across the plains and through the mountains, they banish solitude and reclaim the wilderness with a celerity unknown to men of the last generation. The emigrant of to-day moves as part of an organized community. The railroad preserves for him a channel of constant supply, and the telegraph keeps unbroken the communication between the new and the old homestead. Before many years we shall hear complaints, not that we have too much land, but rather that we have not land enough.

It is true that a large sum of money will be required for the purchase of the present telegraph lines and their appurtenances. But if this be a difficulty, delay only magnifies it; for, admitting that the Government must at some time become the exclusive proprietor of the telegraphs, it is clear that every year will add to the amount of purchase-money it will have to pay. The companies now in existence will extend their operations, and new companies will be organized from time to time, all of whom would demand compensation for a surrender of their privileges and property. I therefore deprecate further delay as injurious to the public interests. The Post-Office Department is now prepared to undertake the organization and management of the telegraph in connection with its other duties. Indeed, I believe that the Department itself can aid materially in raising the money needed for the purchase through post-office savings banks, if Congress will authorize their establishment. The security of the Government being the best that could be obtained, many depositors would give it the preference over every other. By paying four per cent. interest, at the most, on deposits, a large fund could be readily accumulated and invested, under the direction of the Treasury Department, in the public securities. The proceeds of these investments could be used to reimburse the original purchase-money and all other expenditures for construction and repairs.

To prove the feasibility of this plan, I recur to the history of the British office. Savings banks in connection with post-offices were established in Great Britain on the 16th of September, 1861, with a limitation in the law creating them that they should not pay exceeding $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest on deposits. The following table will show with what rapidity and to what extent they have been intrusted with the money of the people :

Period.	Number of post-office savings banks.	Number of deposits.	Amount of deposits.	Total sum standing to credit of post-office savings banks on books of National Debt Commissioners at close of the year. The total amount in hand after ten years' operations, and for which the British government pays only $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest, is £15,463,928, or \$75,145,690—a much larger sum than will be required for the purchase and thorough repair of all the telegraphic lines in the United States.

Convinced of the wisdom of establishing the postal telegraph and post-office savings banks in this country, I earnestly recommend the passage by Congress of the laws necessary therefor. In my judgment, those laws should provide as well for the absolute purchase of the lines and appurtenances of all telegraph companies now in operation as for the exclusive right and authority of the Government, after the several purchases shall be concluded, to conduct the business of transmitting telegraphic messages.

Again I renew my recommendation for the repeal of the franking privilege. Its existence is utterly incompatible with an economical and vigorous administration of postal affairs. Flagrant frauds have been practiced during the past year, and will continue to be practiced, under its cover, so long as the privilege is protected by law. I refer to my arguments on this subject in former reports with unshaken confidence in their soundness.

The bill "to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," known as the postal code, having failed in the last Congress, has been again introduced into the Senate. Much time and labor having been expended in perfecting it, I trust it may be passed at the approaching session with as little delay as possible. It contains some new provisions of much importance—among others, an authority for the introduction of correspondence-cards, an improvement for which a strong desire has been manifested on the part of the public.

The salaries of the three Assistant Postmasters General and the Superintendents of Foreign Mails and the Money-Order System are entirely incommensurate with their valuable services. The Government, in simple justice to a class of officers whose faithful labors in its behalf require them to remain with their families in Washington during the entire year, should not hesitate to increase their annual compensation to $5,000. I cheerfully reiterate my acknowledgment of their conspicuous merit and industry, and earnestly commend them to the favorable consideration of Congress.

Renewing the assurances of my high regard, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JNO. A. J. CRESWELL,
Postmaster General.

The PRESIDENT.

OF THE

SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

OF
THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., October 31, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations of this Department during the year. In preparing it I have compressed it within the narrowest limits possible, and have also embodied such suggestions and recommendations as my observation has convinced me will conduce to the success of the several bureaus under the immediate supervision of this Department.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The humane and peaceful policy which has been inaugurated by the Government in the conduct of Indian affairs for the past two years has been productive of gratifying results. The board of commissioners authorized by the law of April 10, 1869, composed of citizens distinguished for intelligence and philanthropy, and serving without pay, has assisted in withdrawing from the Indian service much that has been heretofore regarded as the source of evil and injustice, and which is supposed to have prevented the success of public measures intended as a means of civilization. The services of that board have exercised a wholesome influence in establishing the new policy, and its active aid and co-operation in carrying out the measures of the Government in that behalf have been valuable to this Department.

The members of the board have visited many of the tribes of Indians in the West during the past year, inspecting their condition, and observing the progress they were making in education. They have also given their personal attention to the awarding of contracts for Indian supplies, and have exercised a careful supervision over the expenditures from the Indian appropriations. Their report will afford a more detailed statement of their transactions.

The most noticeable effect of the new policy thus far has been to suppress Indian wars and depredations, to unite tribes upon reservations designated for them by Government authority, to improve their education in letters, in the practice of agriculture and other industries, in the reformation of prevailing vices, and the generally gratifying evidences of a degree of progress which offers good reason to hope for the gradual social elevation and christianization of the race.

As encouragement to those who believe in the capacity of the Indian for civilization, an examination of the report of the Acting Commissioner will show that the various tribes have raised during the year agricultural products to the value of more than eight millions of dollars, not including the products of the Cherokees, from whom no report has been received, but whose products last year were valued at over two and one-half million dollars, an aggregate of about ten millions of dollars' worth of farm produce. It will also be seen that there are 216 schools among the Indian tribes, with 323 teachers, and an average attendance of 8,920 pupils.

Though this peace policy has been generally maintained, and a better understanding of the designs of the Government toward them prevails among the Indians, excepting a few nomadic tribes in Arizona, New Mexico, and on the western borders of Texas, which have not yet been so fully reached by the influence of the new policy, outrages by those bands or tribes have been punished so promptly by the military authorities, under the influence of which the disposition to make peace is generally manifest.

Some progress is being made towards inducing the more troublesome of those tribes to accept and enter upon reservations, and there is reasonable ground to hope that it will eventually be accomplished.

For this purpose it is of importance that increased and liberal appropriations for food, clothing, and farming implements be made by Congress.

On the line of the North Pacific Railroad, in the Territory of Dakota, the Sioux have also made some offensive demonstrations against the progress of that work, but thus far judicious management has prevented serious outbreak. The hostile disposition of that numerous and powerful tribe may require skillful treatment to avoid hostilities in the future.

Encouragement is afforded to the friends of the existing policy, in the fact that the Indians long in contact with the whites, as in New York, Michigan, and Wisconsin, as also of those whose proximity to the whites is not of so long standing, as in Kansas, Nebraska, and the Indian Territory, have made considerable progress in the arts of civilization, in the cultivation of the soil, or in the pursuit of general business, with success, as well as in their increased efforts in behalf of the education of their youth.

Without progress in industrial pursuits, and in education, we cannot hope for any lasting good results from the new policy, and it should, therefore, be the first effort of the Government to so act as to encourage the Indian in those directions which will induce him to cultivate habits of industry, and foster a desire for mental and moral culture. It might be well to establish a system of compulsory education to such an extent, at least, as to withhold annuities from those individuals who refuse or neglect to avail themselves of the educational facilities offered. This principle was adopted with the Pawnees in the third article of the treaty of 1857, and with good results.

The encouragement of agriculture might also be effectually secured by the payment of premiums for the best cultivated farm above a certain established standard of excellence.

The latter plan would not probably be productive of its legitimate results while the present system of holding their lands in common prevails, and could only be successfully carried out after the lands were divided.

These changes would entail additional and delicate duties upon agents, and would require increased vigilance in their performance. Under existing laws the salaries of those officers are too small. They should be men who have no desire to speculate upon their offices, and, therefore, should have no income beyond their legal compensation. It is a singular fact, and one, perhaps, not entirely creditable to the Government, that some of the religious denominations which have been requested to name persons for appointment as agents have been compelled, in order to secure good men, to contribute to the support of said agents while in Government employ, on account of the insufficiency of the legal compensation to their support. This is utterly inadequate to their support and every consideration of justice and economy will justify a liberal increase.

To insure a faithful performance of their duties by agents, and to secure uniformity in enforcing the Government policy throughout the various agencies, I would suggest that authority be conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior to appoint inspectors, when necessity requires, whose duty it shall be to visit the several tribes and agencies at stated intervals, and report concerning the fidelity and capacity of the agents and the condition of the tribes under their charge; to enforce uniformity of management, and to suggest such measures of reform as may seem best calculated to promote the general policy of the Government.

I deem it to be my duty, also, to urge an increase of the salary of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The present rate of compensation is entirely inadequate to the position. Its duties require the services of a man of intelligence, capacity, and integrity, and he should be so compensated as to secure such services. Five thousand dollars per annum would be a small salary for the services of a proper man in that important place, and, in view of the great influence he would wield in carrying out the present policy, it would be economy to increase the salary to at least the sum named.

The Indian population now under the jurisdiction of the United States, according to the most reliable data to be obtained, is about 221,000. This number includes 75,000, the estimated Indian population of Alaska, and 3,663, scattered throughout the States of Florida, North Carolina, Indiana, Iowa, and Texas, not maintaining tribal relations.

Excluding those in Alaska, and those scattered throughout the States just named, as not practically within the scope of the new policy, and the remaining Indian population is 242,371, located as follows:

Washington Territory	15,487	Wyoming	2,400
Oregon	24,503	Nebraska	6,410
California	7,383	Kansas	6,052
Arizona	5,066	Indian Territory	53,476
Nevada	6,000	Minnesota	6,377
Utah	12,800	Wisconsin	6,355
New Mexico	18,641	Michigan	8,000
Colorado	7,300	New York	4,804
Dakota	27,815
Idaho	4,469	Total	242,371
Montana	18,835

The Indians under the jurisdiction of the United States are now located on reservations of land amounting in the aggregate to 228,473 square miles, or 137,846,971 acres. Deducting from this statement the Indian Territory south of Kansas, and there remains a population of 172,000 occupying reservations of land amounting to 96,155,785 acres; being a per capita of 558 acres. The lands composing these reservations are generally of good quality, susceptible of profitable cultivation, and lie in the direct path of the settler. These reservations are generally held under treaties guaranteeing Indian possession against the intrusion of white settlement.

The Indian Territory, so called, lying west of Missouri and Arkansas, and south of Kansas, contains 44,154,240 acres of land, and a population of about 60,000. Westward to the 96° of west longitude the soil is of the very best quality, well watered and timbered, capable of producing the largest returns to the labors of the farmer. West of the 96°, and lying between that and the valley of the Arkansas River, the country is mountainous, and offers less inducements to the settler. The mountains are known to contain very rich deposits of coal, and are supposed to contain other valuable minerals. In the valley of the Arkansas River the soil is of excellent quality for a width of ten miles, while to the west of that valley the entire country, although not so desirable for location as that in the eastern portion of the Territory, is well adapted to the wants of the farmer. The present population of the Territory is but one person to every 630 acres. Could the entire Indian population of the country, excluding Alaska and those scattered among the States heretofore mentioned, be located in the Indian Territory, there would be 180 acres of land, per capita, for the entire number, showing that there is an ample area of land to afford them all comfortable homes.

On the other hand, such a disposition of the now scattered tribes would release from Indian occupancy 93,692,731 acres of land, and throw it open to white settlement and cultivation. This gathering together of all the outlying tribes into a comparatively small territory is the problem now before us. The proper solution of it must, in a great measure, decide the fate of that race. If they can be brought to realize their condition as we see it, they will recognize the fact that if they do not speedily accept the friendly offices of the Government, and endeavor in good faith to work out their part of the policy, the difficulties and dangers of their past and present condition will be increased by the increasing demand for the lands now occupied by them as hunting grounds and reservations made by our rapidly growing tide of emigration. Many of the tribes recognize the condition of things which compels the conclusions and suggestions herein made, and are willing to co-operate cheerfully in the measures set on foot in their behalf.

With judicious management and a careful observance of treaty stipulations, I doubt not that the plan of gathering all the tribes into a smaller area can be successfully accomplished.

The foregoing facts induce me to regard it as of the utmost importance to the success of the existing policy that the Indian Territory be organized under a territorial government, with such restrictions and regulations as will secure the rights of the Indians in the soil, encourage them in their efforts to improve their mental, moral, and industrial condition, while, at the same time, maintaining a general supervisory control of their legislation as in the case of any other Territory.

The bill introduced at the third session of the Forty-first Congress for the organization of that Territory under the name of Oklahoma, and the Ocmulgee constitution adopted by a council of the Indian nations of the Territory in December last, are intended to accomplish the object referred to. Those instruments seem to be so carefully guarded as to secure the end desired, and will fully protect the Indian from imposition and injustice until he shall have made such progress as to enable him to protect himself.

As has been shown, the Indian Territory is of sufficient area to locate all the Indians, and give each man, woman, and child among them 180 acres of land. With such an ingathering of the now widely scattered tribes, under an efficient territorial government, and with the nucleus of partially civilized nations and tribes already there, the entire race would be so well in hand and surrounded by such influences as to be more easily managed, thus enabling the Government to work out its humane policy toward them to its legitimate results. If it shall be deemed impracticable to bring all the Indian tribes into the Indian Territory, under an organized territorial government, I am satisfied that the good results that will accrue to those who conclude to settle in that Territory, under such a government as I have indicated, will demonstrate the necessity and propriety of locating the remaining Indians under a like territorial government, to be organized in some other place, and embracing such limits and having such location as time, experience, and subsequent information shall indicate as best adapted to the accomplishment of the great object which all good men so earnestly desire.

Such an organization would have a tendency to obliterate many of the existing obstacles to Indian civilization. The traditional feuds which now keep tribes in a state of continual warfare, compelling them to live in camps for protection, would be speedily crushed out by a strong home government. The custom of holding all property in common, which is always a tax upon industry, and a premium upon indolence and unthrift, would be abolished. Frequent changes of reservations, the source of so many of our troubles with that race in the past, would cease. The rewards of industry would be so liberal as to obliterate their long-standing prejudice against labor, while the lack of opportunity to engage in the chase, or in hostile raids, would soon do away with the desire to engage in those diversions, and those who were not convinced of the propriety of industry would soon be compelled to recognize its necessity.

We must not expect too great results from the immediate operation of the new policy. We cannot hope to make intelligent, law-abiding citizens of a race of unlettered barbarians in a day, in a year, or a decade. Time is required to change those habits which are firmly fixed by immemorial custom. Nor can we hope to mature a perfect system by a single act of Congress. We can only shape a policy, and arrange its details gradually, as experience dictates, after a careful observance of the results of measures already in operation.

Few of those now actively engaged in promoting the existing policy may live to see its full fruition, and it may never succeed, but no candid philanthropic man will deny that the policy seems to be right and proper under all the existing circumstances. A Christian Government like ours owes it to her own good name, to civilization and Christianity, to use every effort for the elevation of a race which has been placed under her guardianship. Should it fail, I trust it may not be through any want of fidelity on the part of any of those now engaged in its execution. The path of duty seems clearly marked; it is ours to follow it.

During the year a number of citizens of the United States moved upon the lands of the Indian Territory adjacent to the Kansas boundary, evidently for the purpose of effecting a permanent settlement thereon. They erected improvements and began to till the soil. These trespasses gave great uneasiness to the owners of the lands, who naturally inferred that they were but the beginning of an organized movement to deprive them of their territory. Upon being informed of this condition of things, I issued a proclamation to the trespassers, ordering them to withdraw at once from the Territory, and notifying them that unless they did so promptly, force would be used to secure their removal. This step seems to have been generally effective, and but few of the trespassers remain. Trespasses of another character are still being made, however, upon these lands, by citizens of Kansas, and much valuable timber is being cut down and carried away. The effort of the Department will be to prevent these spoliations in the future, as they do much to render the Indians uneasy as to the tenure of their lands, and the good faith of the Government towards them is seriously doubted, thus tending to retard the working out of the general policy.

The railroads authorized to be built through the Indian Territory by the eleventh article of the treaty of 1866 are in process of construction—the Missouri, Kansas, and Texas Railroad from north to south, and the Atlantic and Pacific road from east to west. The grant to those companies from the Indians was simply the right of way, and 200 feet of land in width for the occupancy of the road. The companies are anxious for an enlarged grant of lands, and that the lands lying adjacent to their roads, which are probably the most valuable in the Territory, should be open to general settlement. This is a question requiring the careful attention of Congress, and should be treated with a full consideration of the rights of the Indians, as guaranteed by existing treaties, and in connection with the general policy of the Government, not only to deal justly with them, but to secure, as far as possible, their education, civilization, and general prosperity.

At the request of the Cherokee delegation, and for the purpose of carrying out the provision of the treaty of 1866, ceding lands west of the ninety-sixth meridian, west longitude, to the Government for the purpose of locating friendly Indians thereon, a survey was ordered to establish that meridian. That survey is now in progress, and it locates the meridian about three miles west of its supposed former location. This change of that line has necessarily changed the boundaries of some of the reservations, and the tribes prejudiced thereby are greatly disturbed in consequence.

In the case of the Osage reservation, lying immediately west of the ninety-sixth meridian, and fourteen miles in width, the change of line cuts off all the rich lands lying in the valley of the Little Verdigris, or Big Caney River, and deprives that tribe of nearly all the valuable grazing and farming land in their supposed reservation.

The Seminoles have also entered complaints, showing a similar state of affairs with regard to their reservation, and doubtless other tribes will do the same.

When the report of the survey is received at the Department I will cause it to be carefully examined, and if any ground exists for supposing it to be erroneous, I will refer the whole subject to the President, and request that the attention of Congress be called to it. Should the survey prove correct, it will so materially disturb the equitable rights of several tribes of Indians as to demand, not only the serious consideration of this Department, but probably the attention of Congress.

The massacre at Camp Grant, in Arizona, and other occurrences preceding and subsequent to that affair in that Territory, have combined to produce a general feeling of hostility between the Apaches and the white settlers.

It was represented to the Department during the past summer that Cochise, the Apache chief, was at last willing to cease his depredations, and would use his influence with his people to bring them upon a reservation, if they could be protected in going to such reservation, or while remaining thereon. To afford him an opportunity to manifest his good faith in making such offers, Hon. Vincent Colyer, Secretary of the board of Indian commissioners, was directed to visit the Territory of Arizona, and to offer Cochise the protection of the Government, while he should endeavor to bring his people upon a reservation.

Mr. Colyer set aside three temporary reservations for the purpose designated, and made encouraging progress toward inducing the Indians to enter upon them. Instructions have been given the military authorities to co-operate with the officers of the Indian Bureau, and to advise the Apaches that if they will enter upon the reservation provided for them, in good faith, and live thereon peaceably, they will receive the aid and protection of the Government, but if they do not do so, and evince any disposition to renew their depredations, they will be promptly punished. The Indian agents have also been instructed to acquaint the Indians with the designs of the Government concerning them. It is sincerely hoped that these efforts will prove successful in the early accomplishment of the purpose designed. It is a subject of profound regret that so great misunderstanding of the temper and disposition of the Indians in Arizona should exist, and it is hoped that both the Indians and the white settlers will so act in future as to give no ground for complaint.

Efforts are now being made to remove the Flatheads and Pend d'Oreilles from their location in the Bitter Root Valley, Montana, to the general reservation at Jocko Lake. Under the terms of the treaty of 1855, the President has declared it unnecessary to set aside any portion of that valley for a reservation, and has ordered the removal of the Indians now residing there to the general reservation at Jocko Lake, after paying them for their improvements, but allowing any Indians who may so desire to remain and become citizens, granting them all the privileges of citizens under the homestead and pre-emption laws. This plan will, when perfected, open up the valuable lands in the Bitter Root Valley to white settlement, and it will doubtless be speedily settled up.

The attention of Congress has been heretofore invited to the fact that some portions of certain reservations which contain more land than the Indians need should, with their consent, be sold at their fair market value, and the proceeds applied to improvements, such as building houses, fencing and breaking land, the purchase of implements and stock, and the establishment of industrial and other schools. The details of this subject will be found in the report of Superintendent Jauney, and show that the Omahas, whose reservation contains 205,000 acres, have, by petition, expressed a wish to sell from the most western portion of their reservation 50,000 acres, as near as can be separated from the remaining part of their lands by a line running along the section lines from north to south.

The Otoes and Missourias, whose reservation contains 160,000 acres, have expressed a desire to sell about 80,000 acres, being the western half of the reservation, and lying wholly west of the Big Blue River, partly in Nebraska and partly in Kansas.

The Pawnees, whose reservation contains 288,000 acres, would sell about 50,000 acres, but the location of the part to be disposed of has not yet been determined.

I expect to submit a special report concerning these lands, together with a bill providing for a sale of such portions of said reservations as may be designated.

Mr. Janney recommends that there be established a sufficient number of day-schools for all the children between the ages of 6 and 12 years, and a manual-labor boarding-school at such reservation, in which I cordially concur.

In accordance with my request, Hon. Felix R. Brunot, President of the Board of Indian Commissioners, was present at the council of the Indian tribes occupying the Umatilla reservation in Oregon. That council was for the purpose of ascertaining the feelings and desires of those tribes relative to removing from said reservation upon the payment to them of certain specified annuities. The result of the council was the refusal of the Indians to leave their reservations.

Mr. Brunot's report fully details the proceedings of the council, and the propositions of the special commissioners, which the Indians declined to accept, and will be found with the report of the Office of Indian Affairs.

PUBLIC LANDS.

From the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, it appears that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, the transactions of that branch of the public service were as follows:

	Acres.
Disposal of public lands for cash	1,329,982.37
By military bounty-land warrant locations under acts of 1847, 1850, 1852, and 1855	525,920.00
By homestead entries under act of 1862 and amendments	4,600,326.23
By agricultural college scrip locations	494,446.98
By approvals to railroads	2,911,938.36
By approvals to wagon-roads	239,068.08
By approvals to States as swamp lands and swamp-land indemnity	428,597.01
By Chippewa and Sioux Indian scrip locations	16,513.00
Making a total of	10,606,792.03

This statement shows an increased disposal, as compared with the preceding year, of 2,511,379.03 acres.

The cash receipts during the past fiscal year, under various heads, including fees to local officers, &c., amount to $2,929,284 70.

The public surveys have been extended during said year over 22,016,608 acres, which, with the area already surveyed, make an aggregate of 550,879,069 acres, leaving an estimated area yet to be surveyed equal to 1,284,119,331 acres. In addition to this, the eastern boundary line of Nevada has been completed and verified in the field by astronomical observations and determinations, and a contract has since been entered into for the survey of the Utah-Idaho boundary line, which survey is now being prosecuted.

The estimates submitted by the Commissioner for the astronomical surveys of boundaries between certain States and Territories are recommended to the favorable consideration of Congress, in view of their importance as controlling questions of jurisdiction and title.

The Commissioner's report contains a very full synopsis of the laws governing the adjustment of private land-claims in California.

Special attention is invited to that part of the report relating to private land-claims in the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado, setting forth the necessity for further legislation in regard to such claims.

The increased value of lands in these Territories, consequent upon the extension of railroads, is rapidly attracting settlers, and it is a matter of the greatest importance to their future prosperity that the private lands should be separated from the public domain at the earliest possible period, to accomplish which result existing legislation is inadequate.

I join in the recommendation made by the Commissioner for the appointment of a commission similar to that created by the act of 3d March, 1857, for the adjustment of titles of the same kind in California, and for the enactment of a statute explanatory of the intent of Congress, as to whether the provisions of the second section of the act of March 3, 1869, (United States Statutes, vol. 15, page 342,) relating to the issuing of patents, applies only to claims confirmed by said act, or also to claims the titles to which were confirmed by previous acts, but which contained no provision for the issuing of patents.

The Commissioner, treating upon the operations of the pre-emption privilege, and the complications constantly arising under the same, thinks it questionable whether the pre-emption law, as now administered, is any longer a necessity to our public-land system, regarding the provisions of the homestead act sufficient at the date of its passage for a measure of complete substitution for the pre-emption laws, if we except the omission of the single feature of priority of settlement, which was not recognized under the pre-emption laws. I coincide with the views entertained by the Commissioner, that a complete unification of the law of settlement-rights is now not only desirable, but easily attainable, and recognizing the fact that some action should be taken to secure this; I therefore endorse the recommendation for further legislation suggested by the Commissioner for the reasons detailed in his report.

Under the homestead law the necessity for additional legislation to meet special cases not contemplated or foreseen by the original framers of the law has become apparent, and when called to the attention of Congress will, I trust, receive such favorable action as will adequately meet the cases referred to.

It is also suggested, and the suggestion has my approval, that agricultural college scrip be by legislation assimilated to military land-warrants, to the extent that the same may be receivable in commutation of homestead entries. I also fully concur in that part of the report relating to homesteads which recommends that credit be given to soldiers in the late war for the full term of service rendered by them in the war, and that the same may be deducted from the term of years required by law to perfect a homestead.

In view of the reasons given by the Commissioner, I would also recommend the confirmation of all entries regularly made under the graduation acts of August 4, 1854, (now repealed,) so far as the land may be shown to have been actually settled upon or substantially improved by the original purchasers, or their assignees, to the end that this class of anomalous entries may be finally disposed of.

The operations under the mining statute of 1866 and subsequent amendments have shown a steady increase in the work of this important branch of the service. Owing, however, in a great measure, to the difficulties which are encountered in properly notifying the parties interested in any mine for which an application for patent has been made, the work has been somewhat retarded. I therefore concur in the recommendation of the Commissioner that, in order to properly notify all parties whose interests may be affected by an application for the exact ground sought to be patented, a survey of the claim should be first made, and the required notice be thereafter given for the period prescribed by law, and that at the expiration of said time no further adverse filing be received.

In the matter of the increase of compensation to the employés of the General Land Office, the suggestions of the Commissioner are well worthy the consideration of the legislative branch of the Government, with whom the remedy for the evils enumerated by him lies. The appeal is based, not upon the deserving merits of industrious clerks—which, aside from other considerations, would justify Congress in providing for their sufficient pay—but upon the absolute necessities of the Bureau, in safely and correctly administering the laws relating to the disposal of the public lands, and in perfecting titles to the homes of thousands of worthy citizens. Equally important is the request for authority to appoint special agents, at fixed compensation, to investigate charges against district land officers, and to assist in the opening of new offices. Believing, as I do, that those recommendations, if acceded to, will, in the end, prove to be measures of actual economy, beside securing a more efficient execution of the important work of that Bureau, I have no hesitation in giving them my hearty approval.

The Bureau, under the control of the present Commissioner, has been improved in many important features, tending to insure greater efficiency in the discharge of its important and delicate trusts, and the general administration of the affairs of the Bureau has been entirely satisfactory.

PATENTS.

There were filed in the Patent Office during the year ending September 30, 1871, 19,429 applications for patents, including reissues and designs; 3,337 caveats; and 181 applications for the extension of patents. Twelve thousand nine hundred and fifty patents, including reissues and designs, were issued, and 147 extended; 514 applications for trade-marks were received, and 452 trade-marks issued. The fees received during said year amount to $671,583 81, and the expenditures for the same period were $560,041 67, leaving a surplus of $111,542 14 of receipts over expenditures. The appropriation asked for the next fiscal year is $606,400.

The number of applications for patents, including re-issues and designs, received during said year, is a small increase over the number received the preceding year, while the number of patents issued is not quite so great. It is worthy of remark, however, that the labors of the clerical force of the office are increased proportionally more than the number of applications would seem to indicate, inasmuch as each year's operations add about twenty thousand to the number of patented and rejected applications, with which the examining corps must become familiar, in addition to those previously filed. The examiners are, generally, men of distinguished ability and untiring industry, but their number is inadequate to properly and promptly discharge the increasing duties demanded of them.

The act of January 11, 1871, abolished the old form of annual report of the Patent Office, and authorizes the Commissioner to substitute therefor full copies of the specifications and drawings of all patents issued, these to be deposited in the clerk's office of each United States district court, and in certain libraries. This law was passed in the belief that there was very little public demand for, or interest in, the annual reports of the Patent Office, which belief the Commissioner thinks was not well founded, although approving of the law, and regarding it as a means of placing fuller information before those interested, and at a much less cost than before. Beside copies of the specifications and drawings for disposition under the law, other copies are printed for subscribers. These publications are rapidly becoming popular among those interested in patents, and will be of great benefit to the office in various ways. For the convenience of subscribers, the publication of the specifications and drawings has been arranged into one hundred and seventy-six different classes, according to their subject matter, so that subscribers need not necessarily pay for the entire issue, but only for the particular class or classes in which they may be interested.

The rapidly extending business of the office requires more room, and although additional room has been provided during the year by the transfer of the Pension Office clerks to another building, the Patent Office is still without sufficient room for the transaction of its business in a satisfactory manner.

The general business of the office has been promptly and satisfactorily administered during the term of the present Commissioner, and his efficiency and capability for its delicate duties is cheerfully attested.

PENSIONS.

There are at the present time on the pension rolls the names of 634 widows of soldiers in the Revolutionary War, a decrease of 93 since the last annual report. 49 were married prior to January 1, 1800, and 585 were married subsequent to that date.

There are on the rolls the names of 1,214 widows and children of soldiers who served in the wars subsequent to the revolution and prior to that of the rebellion, being 72 less than the preceding year.

During the past fiscal year there were examined and allowed 7,807 original applications for invalid pensions of soldiers, at an annual aggregate rate of $491,905 80, and 3,379 applications for increased pension of invalid soldiers, at an aggregate yearly rate of $170,522 80. During the same period 8,282 original pensions to widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of soldiers were allowed, at an aggregate annual rate of $1,116,156, and 1,816 applications of the same class for increase of pension were also admitted, at a total annual rate of $58,212 14. The number of claims, original and increase, admitted during the year was 21,284, and the annual amount of pensions thus granted was $1,836,796 74. On the 30th day of June, 1871, there were on the rolls 91,290 invalid military pensioners, whose pensions annually aggregated $8,141,734 85, and 112,428 widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of soldiers, whose yearly pensions amounted to $14,212,551 19, making an aggregate of 203,718 Army pensioners, at a total annual rate of $22,354,287 04. The whole amount paid during the last fiscal year to invalid military pensioners was $12,304,520 37, and to widows, orphans, and dependent relatives, $20,188,409 70, making a grand total of $32,492,930 07, which includes the expenses of disbursement.

Since the passage of the act of February 14, 1871, granting pension to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and to their widows, 727 claims for pension thereunder have been allowed, at a total annual rate of $67,792. There has been paid during the last fiscal year to pensioners of this class $3,066 05. During the same year there were admitted 127 new applications for invalid Navy pensions, at an annual rate of $11,804; 67 applications of the same class for increased pensions, at an annual aggregate rate of $2,995; 117 original applications of widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of those who died in the Navy, at an aggregate rate of $17,394; and 7 pensions of the same class were increased at a total yearly rate of $282. At the close of the last fiscal year there were borne on the rolls of Navy pensioners 1,377 invalids, at an annual aggregate of $125,233 25, and 1,673 widows, orphans, and dependent relatives, at an aggregate annual rate of $257,682, making the number of such pensioners 3,050, at a total annual rate of $382,915 25. The total amount paid during the said year to Navy invalids was $190,045 52, and to widows, orphans, and dependent relatives, $391,342 09; a total amount of $581,387 61.

The number of pensions, of all classes, granted during the past fiscal year was 17,060. During the same period there were dropped from the pension rolls, from various causes, 8,251, leaving a grand total of 207,495 pensioners on the rolls June 30, 1871, at an aggregate annual rate of $22,804, 994 29. The amount paid during said year for pensions of all classes, including the expenses of disbursements, was $33,077,383 63, being $5,296,571 82 in excess of the amount paid during the preceding year. This excess is chiefly owing to the operation of the act of July 8, 1870, making pensions payable quarterly, whereby the whole amount of pensions accruing between March 4, 1870, and June 4, 1871, became due and payable within the fiscal year just closed.

There were 2,598 bounty-land warrants issued during the year, for 406,160 acres, an excess of 840 over the number issued the preceding year.

Eight thousand nine hundred and eighteen persons availed themselves, during the year, of the benefits of the act of June 30, 1870, providing for artificial limbs and apparatus for resection, or commutation therefor, of whom 7,707 preferred the latter.

There are now on file, unadjusted, 33,182 claims for invalid pension, and 35,597 claims of widows, orphans, and dependent relatives, a total of 68,779 claims. On the 13th ultimo 24,844 claims for pension of survivors of the war of 1812 had been received, and 7,101 claims of widows or such soldiers, making a total of 31,945 applications of this class, 7,871 of which have been disposed of. The Commissioner estimates the number of those now living who are entitled to the benefits of said act to be 32,444; their average age seventy-nine years; their average duration of life less than six years; and the amount that will be required to pay, during the life of the pensioner, all pensions granted by said act, $18,095,855 44.

The act of July 14, 1862, and the acts supplementary thereto, make no provision for pension to the following officers in the naval service, their ranks having been created by acts passed subsequently to that of 1862, viz: Admiral, Vice-Admiral, rear-admiral, commodore, ensign, and secretary to Admiral and Vice-Admiral. I recommend that the right of these officers, their widows, orphans, and dependent relatives be recognized by statutory provision.

The Commissioner, in his report, furnishes much interesting information relative to the various diseases and injuries, on account of which so much of the bounty of the Government is dispensed.

The time for the biennial examination of invalid pensioners required by the act of March 3, 1859, occurred on the 4th day of September last, but the results thereof are not apparent, as the returns of the medical officers have not yet been received. The sound policy of such examinations is fully established by the experience of the office, and it is believed that the aggregate results of the recent examinations will exhibit a considerable reduction in the number of invalid pensioners.

Especial attention has been given to the investigation of frauds. Through the instrumentality of special agents, 301 persons have been dropped from the rolls during the year, and the cases of a greater number are under investigation. Thirty indictments have been found against dishonest attorneys or agents, of whom nine have been convicted, five are fugitives from justice, and the cases of sixteen were pending at the date of the Commissioner's report.

It is estimated that $30,480,000 will be required for the pension service for the next fiscal year.

Owing to the requirements of the Patent Office for more room for offices, it became necessary, during the year, to vacate those rooms in the Patent Office building occupied by the Pension Bureau. To accommodate the latter Bureau, and at the same time to consolidate it into one building, I leased the Seaton House, in this city, for the term of five years, at an annual rental of $10,000. That house was believed to be large enough to accommodate the entire Pension Bureau, and enabled us to vacate several outlying buildings, which have been heretofore occupied by said Bureau, and, at the same time, to save some $5,000 per annum in rent.

The policy of renting private buildings for office uses, and of keeping valuable public records in structures liable to destruction by fire can only be excused on the ground of necessity. The Seaton House is as safe from any danger of loss by fire as the buildings which were vacated when it was leased, but it is not fire-proof, nor can any fire-proof buildings be obtained in the city.

A due regard for the safety of the public records would dictate the pressing need for the construction of suitable buildings for the comfortable and safe occupancy of the Bureaus. I therefore renew the recommendation made by several of my predecessors, that early action be taken by Congress looking to the erection of a suitable building for this Department.

OFFICE OF EDUCATION.

The report of the Commissioner of Education exhibits, in fullest detail, the interesting and important results he has achieved, although the clerical force at his command would seem to be inadequate to the proper discharge of the duties with which the Bureau is charged. The details of the report will show the vast amount of work which the Commissioner has performed, and I take pleasure in attesting the ability, fidelity, and energy with which he has administered the affairs of his office.

It has been the design of the Commissioner to establish and maintain an intimate and constant communication with the various educational centres of the country; to seek and to supply information; to distribute documents, and to pursue original investigations. In the course of official duties the Bureau of Education has received and sent out about 2,000 written communications, has distributed about 12,000 printed documents, and has received many valuable accessions to its library. This sort of interchange is constantly and steadily increasing, and is already greater than the limited clerical force of the office can properly attend to, thus leaving very little opportunity for original investigation in its many interesting directions.

Among the workings of the Bureau may be noted :

First. The inauguration of a system of direct exchange of documents and information with foreign ministers of public instruction.

Second. Visits by the Commissioner to the whole educational field in this country, especially in the South and on the Pacific Coast, for the purpose of personally acquainting himself with prominent educators, and the demands of the work to be done.

Third. A great variety of original investigation, respecting orphanage, pauperism, crime, insanity, &c., in their relations to education.

Fourth. The papers accompanying the report of the Commissioner comprise an abstract of State and city reports for the whole Union; a résumé of the progress of education in Europe, Asia, and Africa; a great number of statistical tables respecting public systems of States and cities, colleges, professional schools, and other institutions, and original articles on various educational subjects by universally acknowledged authorities.

CENSUS.

Attention is invited to the report of the Superintendent of Census. The enumeration of inhabitants at the Ninth Census, as well as the collection of social and industrial statistics, which, under the American system, is made a part of the census, has been completed since the last annual report of the Department; and the compilation of the statistical tables usually published in that connection, as well as of many others, which appear to be equally desirable, has been well advanced. Appreciating the importance of giving the results of the census to the country at the earliest possible date, I have fully met the views of the Superintendent in respect to the amount of clerical force to be employed. Three-fourths, in bulk, of the statistical tables which it is proposed to embody in the three volumes of the census authorized by resolution of Congress have already been sent to press, somewhat over 1,000 pages being already in type. The compilation of the remaining tables has been begun, and the completion of the work upon the three quarto volumes will be accomplished during the winter. I would recommend that authority be given for the preparation and publication of an octavo volume, which shall contain the most important results of the census, within each department of inquiry, in a form convenient for popular use; and that of this volume a large edition be issued, of which 2,000 copies at least shall be by law reserved, not to be distributed until the occurrence of the next decennial enumeration.

I would particularly ask attention to the facts and considerations presented by the Superintendent, which appear to require extensive and radical changes in the census law.

The act of May 23, 1850, was, of necessity, in most of its parts, a tentative measure. Even were the conditions of the country and the requirements of statistical science substantially the same at the present time as at the date of that enactment, it would be unreasonable to assume that the experience of three censuses taken under that law had not shown occasion for many and important changes, both in the machinery of the census and in its schedules. But in the twenty-one years that have elapsed since the enactment of the census law of 1850, the occupations of the people have become so greatly diversified that the present industrial schedules fail to reach some of the most vital interests of the country, and are plainly insufficient adequately to represent many of those which they assume to embrace. Within the same period, the area over which the agencies of the census are to be extended has been practically trebled, and has been made to include vast territories under conditions of settlement and of industry such as did not require to be provided for when the present law was enacted. By the creation of the system of internal revenue, and the enactment of the election law, the officers to whom the act of 1850 commits the supervision of the census work have been charged with duties so numerous and engrossing as to render it impossible for them to give to the census the time and attention absolutely necessary to its proper completion. Moreover, the whole scale of prices and of wages throughout the country has been so advanced as to render the rates of compensation, both for marshals and assistant marshals, as fixed by the act of 1850, generally inadequate; while, yet, the experience of the recent census has shown that this defect is neither to be justly nor economically remedied by any provision for a uniform per centum increase of compensation, but only by a thorough readjustment of the entire scheme. In the field of social investigation, again opened up by the act of 1850, the experience of the last year has shown that the schedules propose many inquiries for which the country is not yet prepared, and at the same time omit to notice many subjects appropriate to the census, in respect to which information is urgently required, in the interest alike of science and of good legislation. The last and most impressive reason I have to present for a general revision of the census law is that the act of 1850, while charging important and critical duties upon this Department, fails to commit to it that control over its immediate agents in the census which is recognized in every other service known to the law as essential to the satisfactory performance of duty, and even to official responsibility for results.

By the law of May 23, 1850, it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, on the completion of each decennial enumeration of the population of the United States, to apportion the representation in Congress among the several States. This duty will be performed about the first of January next, in accordance with the provisions of said law, unless Congress shall in the meantime direct that a change shall be made in the existing law governing the subject.

The general plan of the report of the Ninth Census, as shown by those portions of it which are already in print, exhibits many interesting and valuable improvements in classification and arrangement over any preceding report, and the condition of the general work of the Census Bureau is so well advanced that the full reports of the census will be given to the public at a much earlier day than ever before.

The Department acknowledges the valuable services of General Walker, the Superintendent of the Bureau, whose thorough practical knowledge of the science of statistics has enabled him to effect such valuable improvements as cannot fail to be recognized by the public when the reports are issued.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

In accordance with the act of the third session of the Forty-first Congress making appropriations for the continuation of the geological survey of the Territories of the United States, under the direction of this Department, Professor Hayden was appointed chief geologist. He was instructed to direct his attention to the little-known but interesting region about the source of the Yellowstone and Missouri Rivers. He took as his initial point Ogden, Utah, and examined a belt of country northward to Fort Ellis, Montana; then proceeded up the valley of the Yellowstone, explored the wonderful ranges of mountains, cañons, falls, hot-springs, geysers, &c., connected with that remarkable region. A careful topographical and pictorial chart, with soundings of the lake which forms the sources of the Yellowstone, was made. Numerous maps, charts, sketches, photographs, &c., of the entire route explored were obtained, and are now in the possession of this Department. The geologist was also instructed to direct his attention to the economical resources of the public domain, and thus a great amount of valuable notes and specimens, illustrating the agricultural, mineral, zoological, and botanical wealth of the West, was secured.

The results of this expedition show it to have been a complete success, and it is the opinion of this Department that they fully justify the liberal provision made by Congress for it. A preliminary report of the results will be presented to Congress at an early date.

To reap fully all the advantages from this survey, it is important that every facility be afforded Professor Hayden in the preparation of his reports, maps, and charts in their publication in a style in some degree commensurate with the great value of the explorations to the country and to the scientific world.

I would also recommend the continuation of the system of geological explorations so auspiciously prosecuted thus far under the direction of Professor Hayden, that all our public domain yet unknown may be brought to the attention of the country.

RAILWAYS.

The subscriptions to the stock of the Union Pacific Railroad Company amount to $36,783,000, of which $36,762,300 has been paid. The receipts from the transportation of passengers, freight, and miscellaneous sources, for the year ending June 30, 1871, were $7,362,015 19. The entire cost of the road to said date (unadjusted balances with contractors not included) was, including fixtures, $112,793,618 29. The indebtedness of the company amounted, at the time above mentioned, to $74,653,512, of which $27,236,512 is due to the United States.

Stock of the Central Pacific Railroad Company to the amount of $59,644,000 has been subscribed, and $54,283,190 paid. The receipts from transportation of passengers and freight for the year ending 30th June, 1871, were $7,326,327 36, and the expenses $3,745,766 24, leaving net earnings to the amount of $3,580,560 12. At the close of said year the indebtedness of the company amounted to $71,430,751 88, of which $27,851,000 was to the United States. The act of Congress approved 6th May, 1870, (16th Statutes, 121,) provided for fixing the point of junction of the Union and Central Pacific Railroads within the limits of certain sections of land therein specified. On the 7th September, 1871, the Department received certified copies of resolutions passed by the companies, (that of the Union company on the 12th July, 1870, and that of the Central June 21, 1870,) fixing, in compliance with the law, "the common terminus and point of junction of said railroads at a point on the line of said roads 1,038.68 miles west from the initial point of the Union Pacific Railroad, near Omaha, the same being five miles west of Ogden and five miles west of the crossing of the Utah Central Railroad, on section 1 in township 6 north, of range 2 west, of the principal meridian and base-line of the Territory of Utah." The Western Pacific, the California and Oregon, the San Francisco and Oakland, and the San Francisco and Alameda Railroad Companies have been consolidated with the Central Pacific, as shown by its last annual report.

The stock subscription of the Central Branch Union Pacific Railway is $1,000,000, of which $980,600 has been paid. The receipts for transportation of passengers for the year ending June 30, 1871, were $67,971 66, and for freight $137,625 78. The expenses on account of the road and fixtures have been $3,723,700, and the indebtedness of the company (exclusive of first-mortgage bonds, $1,600,000, and the Government loan, $1,600,000) is $205,076 75. On the 27th ultimo the Department received a map of the continuation of the road from Fort Riley to a junction with the Union Pacific Railroad at the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich. On the 30th of that month this office transmitted said map to you for approval.

Stock of the Kansas Pacific Railway Company to the amount of $8,972,500 has been subscribed and paid in. The receipts for the transportation of passengers, freight, &c., for the year ending June 30, 1871, were $3,146,661 82. The cost of construction and equipment of six hundred and thirty-nine miles of main line and thirty-three miles of branch line is $29,517,999 75. The road extends from the mouth of the Kansas River to Denver, Colorado, a distance of six hundred and thirty-nine miles. It was regularly opened for business on the 1st September, 1870, and since that date has been in operation, in connection with the Denver Pacific Railroad, (one hundred and six miles,) to Cheyenne, Wyoming, on the Union Pacific Railroad. The total funded debt is $26,061,100, and the other liabilities and indebtedness amount to $3,133,504 89, making a total debt of $29,194,604 89, of which $6,303,000 is due to the United States.

The amount of stock of the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company subscribed is $4,478,500, of which $1,791,400 has been paid. The receipts from the transportation of passengers, freight, &c., for the year ending June 30, 1871, were $313,259 55, and the expenses during that period were $216,807 34, the net earnings being $96,452 21. The cost of the road and fixtures is $4,650,000, and the indebtedness of the company is $5,323,920. The line of this road commences at Sioux City, Iowa, and runs thence, by the most direct and practicable route, to a connection with the Union Pacific Railroad, at Fremont, about 48 miles west of Omaha, Nebraska. The entire length of the main line, as per map filed in this office, is 101.77 miles, besides extra tracks on each side of the Missouri River, and many miles of side-tracks; all of which, with the telegraph line, is now completed, equipped, and in successful operation. This company also owns a branch-road from Blair to De Soto, in Nebraska, about four and a half miles long, which was a portion of the Northern Nebraska Air Line, and was obtained through the consolidation of the two roads. The company have recently purchased of the Cedar Rapids & Missouri River Railroad Company the short line of road, heretofore operated by the latter corporation, between Missouri Valley and California Junction, which has proved indispensable, as affording direct communication between this road and Chicago, and also by way of Council Bluffs, with St. Louis, &c., together with the valuable depot-grounds, side-tracks, and all other improvements and buildings. The Fremont, Elkhorn, & Missouri Valley Railroad, commencing at Fremont, where it connects with this company's line, and also with the Union Pacific Railroad, has been extended to Wisner, about fifty-one miles northwest of Fremont, and is now operated by said Sioux City & Pacific Railroad Company. This line was designed to open Northern Nebraska and create business for the last-named company, the intention being to consolidate the two lines by lease or otherwise.

At the close of the last fiscal year, June 30, 1871, the amount of subscribed stock of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company was $5,224,000, and the amount actually paid in, $1,994,800. Since the date of the last annual report of the company, two hundred and eighty miles have been surveyed and explored. Of this distance, nearly all the work has been on that portion of the line from Gilroy through the different passes over the Mount Diablo Range to the San Joaquin Valley. The cost of the surveys has been $30,090 52. The amount received for the transportation of passengers is $256,410 13, and that received for the transportation of freight is $144,444 48. The expenses on account of the road and fixtures are $222,427 06. The principal of the company's indebtedness on account of their bonds issued is $480,000, and on account of the assumption of the bonded indebtedness of the San Francisco and San José Railroad Company, $740,000, possession having been taken of the latter company's road, &c., on the 13th of October, 1870. 50.26 miles of the Southern Pacific Railroad and telegraph line have been completed and accepted by you.

The second, third, and fourth sections, of twenty miles each, of the Oregon & California Railroad, were accepted by you on the 28th February last. This portion, with the section previously accepted, makes a length of line already reported upon and accepted of eighty miles, running from East Portland, Multnomah County, Oregon, to about half a mile beyond the station of the city of Albany.

Stock of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to the amount of $100,000,000 has been subscribed, of which $2,241,600 has been paid. The expenses of the company to June 30, 1871, were as follows: Surveys, $479,603 11; construction, $4,065,315 45; rolling-stock, $289,634; general expenses, $112,318 83; total, $4,936,871 39. The indebtedness of the company to that date is as follows: First-mortgage bonds issued, $7,441,900; bills payable for material in transitu, &c., $1,465,116 87; due contractors, $178,746 84; total, $9,085,763 71. A map of the Minnesota division, filed in this Department on the 18th instant, shows the line so far as then located and completed, beginning at its junction with the Lake Superior & Mississippi road, near the Dalles of the St. Louis River, in Carlton County; thence running in a nearly westward course to Sandy River; thence in a general southwesterly direction to the crossing of the Mississippi River, at Brainard, in Crow Wing County; thence in a nearly westward course to the crossing of Crow Wing River; thence in a general northwesterly course to the crossing of the Buffalo River, in Clay County; and thence in a nearly westerly course to the Red River, a few miles from Georgetown, Minnesota; a distance of 228.2 miles. Three lines have been surveyed in Dakota. The one extending from the point where the forty-seventh parallel of latitude crosses the Red River, and thence in a general westerly direction to the mouth of Heart River, Dakota, has been adopted as the line of location, and has been put under contract. The work on it is being vigorously prosecuted, the contractors binding themselves to have the line completed to the Missouri by the 1st of July next. A preliminary line has also been run from the mouth of Heart River, in a nearly westerly direction, to the Yellowstone, and from this latter point to Bozeman's Pass; and from thence several lines have been run, testing the various passes of the Rocky Mountains, through to the Columbia River. On the Pacific coast lines have been run testing all the passes through the Cascade Range between the Columbia River and the boundary line. The line from Portland to Puget's Sound has been located, following the valley of the Columbia River from Portland to Kalama, crossing the river at that point; thence following the valley of the Cowlitz River to the mouth of the Skookumchuck River, Washington Territory; from thence several lines have been surveyed, extending on both the eastern and western sides of the sound. Upon the lines, as located, the work of construction has been commenced, and twenty-five miles will be completed and in operation by the 1st of January next, as required by the company's charter.

You accepted on 3d of January the completed portion of the California & Oregon Railroad, 77.6 miles, commencing at Roseville, Placer County, California, where said road connects with the Central Pacific Railroad, and thence running northerly through the city of Marysville to a point at or near the town of Chico, Butte County, California.

The initial point of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad is near the town of Springfield, Missouri, "upon the west line of the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 12, township 29, range 22 west." As was stated in the last annual report of this Department, work on this road was commenced on the 4th of July, 1868, and fifty miles were completed, equipped, and opened for business on the 13th day of June, 1870. You have accepted said fifty miles, and also an additional section of twenty-five miles reported on since that date.

One hundred and twenty miles of the road and telegraph line constructed by the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company in Nebraska has been accepted by you, and the commissioners for said road were, on the 30th ultimo, instructed to examine another section of twenty miles. The initial point of this road is at Plattsmouth, Nebraska.

The Missouri, Kansas and Texas Pacific Railway Company, (formerly Union Pacific Railroad Company, southern branch,) having been authorized to extend their line through the Indian Territory, the vice-president thereof reported, under date of the 13th instant, that the extension of the road had been completed, and was then in operation from the southern boundary-line of Kansas to the Arkansas River, about ninety miles. He states that the piers for the bridge over said river are all built, and that it will be finished by the end of the present month. The road is graded from the Arkansas to the Canadian River, a distance of forty-three miles. It is definitely located to Red River, and the company intend to have it in running order to that point by the 1st of July next, at which time the Texas Central Company promise to have their road constructed to the same point. When the connection is made, there will be one continuous line of rail from New York City to Galveston. The initial point of this road is at Junction City, Kansas, six miles from Fort Riley, and it runs thence down the valley of the Neosho River to the southern line of the State of Kansas, and extends as above stated.

The act of July 1, 1862, (12 Statutes, 498,) requires an annual report, under certain specified heads, to be made by the following-named railroad companies: Union Pacific, Central Pacific, Western Pacific, Central Branch Union Pacific, Denver Pacific, Sioux City and Pacific, and Kansas Pacific. And the act of June 25, 1868, requires that one shall be rendered by each of the companies named below: Northern Pacific, Atlantic and Pacific, and Southern Pacific. Of these ten corporations, two, the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company have failed to make a report to this Department for the last fiscal year. The 1st section of the act of 25th June, 1868, (15 Statutes, 79,) requires that the "reports shall furnish full and specific information upon the several points mentioned in the twentieth section of the said act of 1862, and shall be verified as therein prescribed, and on failure to make the same as herein required, the issue of bonds or patents to the company in default shall be suspended until the requirement of this act shall be complied with by such company." In each case where additional portions of roads have been completed and accepted during the year, the instructions given by you in regard to the issuance of patents for the lands due the companies have been carried out by this Department.

CAPITOL.

The report of the Architect furnishes details of various improvements and repairs made upon the Capitol extension during the past year. The corridors leading from the Senate chamber to the hall of the House of Representatives have been enlarged, the floor of the hall between the rotunda and the old Representative hall raised to the level of the other floors, and the bronze doors taken from the corridor and placed at the center door of the east front. A steam-engine and two large fans have been placed in the basement of the south wing for the expulsion of vitiated air, and other important improvements have been made in both of the legislative chambers to effect better ventilation. The grounds on the south of the Capitol have been filled in, and a roadway made around the grounds on the north side which marks the line of the proposed street on that side. The Architect recommends that some provision be made by Congress for inclosing, planting and otherwise improving the grounds surrounding the Capitol building which belong to the United States, and also for paving both of the streets and foot-ways around the lower grounds of the building.

The extension of the Government Printing Office building, located on North Capitol street, authorized by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, has been completed, and is now occupied.

That portion of G street, which lies north of the Patent-Office building between Seventh and Ninth streets is being paved with an asphaltic concrete pavement, which has been approved by the Architect, and by the owners of the property lying along the northern side of the said street.

The appropriations asked for make an aggregate of $99,000, viz: Capitol extension, $50,000; Capitol repairs, $10,000; new dome, $4,000; filling and grading Capitol grounds, $10,000; and paving B street northeast, $25,000.

BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS.

The whole number of persons who received treatment in the Government Hospital for the Insane during the year ending June 30, 1871, was 648, a number greater by 153 than were treated the preceding year; 365 were from the Army and Navy; 491 were males. 194 patients were admitted during said year; 63 were discharged as recovered, 24 as improved, and 9 as unimproved. The recoveries were 45 per cent. of the discharges including, and 66 per cent. excluding, deaths. The number of deaths during the same period was 44, leaving under treatment at the close of said year 508, of whom 309 were from the Army and Navy. 2,999 persons, of whom 1,434 were native born, have been treated at the institution since it was opened. The expenditures for the past fiscal year were $116,702 72. The sum of $11,170 65 was received for board of private patients, and $1,016 18 from the sale of live-stock, &c. The estimated value of the products of the farm and garden during the year was $10,186 12; and the live-stock, farm and garden implements, &c., belonging to the institution, are estimated to be worth $14,118 25.

The board of visitors submit the following estimates:

For support of the institution during the year ending June 30, 1873, including $500 for books, stationery, &c., $130,000; erection of additional building, $37,800; erection of two barns and poultry-house, $9,000; new heating boilers and connections, $6,000; and for completion of roads and walks, $2,000; a total of $185,300.

An act of Congress authorizing the prolonged restraint of inebriates, suggested by the board of visitors in their report, seems to be necessary to the effective reformatory treatment of cases of inebriety occurring in this District, and the passage of such an act, with carefully guarded provisions for determining the fact of confirmed inebriety, and the duration and character of the restraint, is respectfully recommended. It is understood that two or three public institutions for the care of inbriates, already in full operation, and having many of the material appliances required for the successful, moral, and hygienic treatment of their inmates, will take patients from a distance at a rate of board but slightly in excess of the current cost of their maintenance, and the suggestion of the board, that an arrangement should be made with the proper authority of one or more such institutions to receive inebriates from the District, under the authority of such an act as Congress may see fit to pass, seems to be the only ready and feasible mode of undertaking the correction of that evil habit, which unquestionably gives rise to a large percentage of the crime and domestic suffering which are fearfully prevalent in this, as in most other large communities. Unless Congress should make a small appropriation for the payment of the board of indigent inebriates, that class might be unable to avail themselves of any legal provision that may be made for their reformation.

It is certainly to be hoped that the moderate cost for which handsome and comfortable additional wards for chronic cases have been erected, furnished, and fitted up during the past year, will be regarded by the State and municipal authorities, upon whom the obligation rests, as affording whatever additional evidence may seem to be required that the expense of properly providing for the chronic indigent does not exceed what they can fairly afford, and, therefore, what they are in duty bound to expend, if it be necessary to effect the humane purpose in view.

On the 30th ultimo there were 104 pupils in the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, 43 of whom were received since July 1, 1870. Sixty-four of them were in the collegiate department, representing twenty-three States and this district, and 119 have received instruction since July 1, 1870, of whom 101 were males. Eight pupils have left the college during the year, and seven have left the primary department, one of whom was removed by death.

In 1867 and 1868, provision was made by Congress for the admission of a limited number of indigent students from the States into the collegiate department free of charge. Twenty-five, the number authorized, were duly admitted, and were pursuing their studies with a view to graduation when Congress, in 1870, repealed the laws under which they entered. Had not the directors been able, with funds derived from sources other than the United States Treasury, to continue to support these young men, they would have suffered the evident injustice of being dismissed from an institution to which they had been sent by the Government to be educated before the term of education for which they were entered was completed. Simple justice would seem to demand that Congress should so amend its action as to allow these youths to complete the course of study upon which they entered as beneficiaries of the United States; and, further, it would seem not improper that Congress, having established the only collegiate school for deaf-mutes in the country, and having provided it with suitable buildings and a competent corps of professors, should make its advantages available to persons of that class in the several States. I would commend the matter to the consideration of Congress, with the suggestion that probably some method of appointment could be devised, similar to that made use of in the military and naval schools of the Government, which should secure to the people of the States an impartial distribution of the benefits of this, the only institution of its grade. The directors urge, and justly, that Congress, having aided largely in the endowment of colleges for hearing-youth, ought, in some way, to provide similar facilities for a class of persons who, though bereft of one sense, have proved themselves capable of receiving and profiting by education as readily and as fully as their more favored brethren.

The receipts for the support of the institution during the last fiscal year exceeded the disbursements $389 40. The disbursements for the erection and fitting up of buildings were $8,380 30 less than the receipts, and the amount received for the improvement of grounds exceeded the disbursements $2,302 01.

The directors have purchased for the institution the estate known as Kendall Green. Eighty-one acres of land, lying within two miles of the Capitol, and adjoining the former premises of the institution on two sides, were secured, together with two dwelling houses and other valuable improvements, for the sum of $85,000. Toward the payment of this the directors are providing by subscription for $15,000, together with the interest that has accrued or may become due up to the 1st of July, 1872. There will then remain to be paid the sum of $70,000, for which they ask Congress to make an appropriation. I have examined the land in question, and consider that a due regard to the interests of the institution demands its retention. Prior to the purchase of Kendall Green, the premises of the institution comprised but nineteen acres, an amount plainly insufficient. The price agreed upon for the new purchase is low, compared with the present market-value of land similarly situated, and its proximity to the old corporate limits of the city insures a prospective rise in value, promising a handsome profit, should it be found desirable hereafter to sell any portion of the land. I therefore recommend that the appropriation be made.

The board of directors submit the following estimate for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873:

Support of the institution, including $500 for books and apparatus	$48, 000
Payments falling due on or after July 1, 1872, on the purchase of the Kendall Green property	70, 000
Improvement of grounds	6, 000
Deficiencies the current year	9, 500
Total	133, 500

During the last fiscal year 2,256 women were treated by the officers of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, of whom 38 were pay-patients. One thousand six hundred and twenty-five were restored to health, 307 relieved, 2 sent to the Government Hospital for the Insane, 18 died, and 304 remained under treatment. The estimates for the ensuing fiscal year are as follows: For subsistence, medicine, salaries, fuel, light, and bedding, $18,300; for rent of building and necessary repairs, $5,000; making an aggregate of $23,300, being $4,800 in excess of those submitted for the current year. The directors report that the utmost economy in the expenditure of the hospital has been observed during the past year, and that the advance over the appropriation made for the current year is necessitated by the rapidly-increasing demands upon the institution.

JAIL AND REFORM SCHOOL.

On the 20th ultimo there were in the custody of the warden of the District jail 83 prisoners, 10 of whom were females. During the year preceding this date 1,335 persons were committed, 184 of whom were females; 896, of whom 136 were females, were convicted of various misdemeanors; 40 were sent to the Reform School; 39 were sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary at Albany, New York; 1,112 were released; and 1 was executed. The expenses of the jail during the year, including the cost of transporting prisoners to Albany penitentiary, salaries, repairs, &c., were $39,583 72, being $4,007 95 less than those of the preceding year.

I deem it incumbent upon me, at this time, to allude to the pressing necessity for a new jail-building for this District. The present structure is utterly unfit for the purposes for which it is used. The arrangement of the cells, the absence of sewerage and proper accommodations, and the poor material of which it is built, render it a most unfit place for the confinement of prisoners, whether their safe-keeping or health be considered; and solitary confinement, classification, beyond that of sex, &c., are impracticable. The insecurity of the building necessitates the employment of a much larger force of guards than would be required were a proper jail-structure to be erected, involving a considerable item of expense which would be thereby avoided.

The subject has been adverted to, at considerable length, in the three last annual reports of this Department, in one of which, that of Mr. Secretary Browning, of November 30, 1868, a full history of the matter is given. I earnestly concur in the suggestion made by Mr. Secretary Cox, in his report of October 31, 1870, that the difficulties which exist in carrying into effect existing legislation be removed by Congress, in order "that the selection of a site for a new jail-building should not be limited to one of the public reservations."

There were 46 boys confined in the Reform School on the 5th of October, 1870, and 58 were received during the year ending on the 5th ultimo, making 104 juvenile offenders who have been cared for during said year. The criminal court committed 3, the police court 43, the board of trustees 10, the mayor of Washington 1, and the mayor of Georgetown 1; 15 had lost both parents, and 24 one. Their ages range from ten to eighteen years, the majority being from twelve to fourteen years old. All but 11 were born in this District and the adjoining States; 45 were of American parentage, and 37 were committed for petit larceny. There were discharged during said year 38, and 1 escaped, leaving 65 in the school on the 5th ultimo, although the board report that but 60 can be properly accommodated at present. Of those discharged, 2 were fully reformed, 27 were released by the expiration of their respective terms of sentence, and 9 were sent away to make room for others committed by the courts, although, in the judgment of the board, these last should have been longer detained, in order to effect a more complete reformation. They, therefore, earnestly recommend that the law governing the courts in the premises be so amended that said courts shall be required to give notice of the sentence, in each case, of juvenile offenders to the president of the board of trustees, and await his order to forward the boy to the school; and, also, that all such offenders shall be committed until fully reformed, or during their minority, giving the board discretionary power to discharge when, in their judgment, a complete reformation has been accomplished.

The board report very favorably upon the general behavior of the boys, the improvement in their morals, and their proficiency in their studies. They are required to work on the farm half the day, and to be in school the other half. Especial care is also taken for their moral and religious education.

No appropriation for the support of the school having been made at the last session of Congress, the board would have been compelled to close the school had not several humane gentlemen, merchants and others, agreed to furnish the necessary supplies, and await an appropriation by Congress for payment of their accounts. The indebtedness, thus contracted, for provisions, clothing, &c., amounts to $3,646 49, and the treasurer of the school having permitted the superintendent to over-check upon him to the amount of $230 97, the total indebtedness of the school on the 5th ultimo amounted to $3,877 46. The cash expenditures for salaries, provisions, clothing, &c., during the year ending on that date, amount to $7,066 62, aggregating, with the indebtedness of $3,646 49, the sum of $10,713 11, as the total expenditure of the school for said year. Unless an appropriation be made by Congress at an early date, the board state that they will be compelled to close the school.

The board report that they have been unable to obtain any money from the city of Washington since the school was commenced. The amount due prior to the recent change of government in this District was $3,345 80, and since then the sum of $1,034 08 has accrued, making a total of $4,379 88. There is also due from parents and guardians the sum of $69 51, making an aggregate of $4,449 39 now due from those two sources.

The experience of the past year has demonstrated the insalubrity of the present location of the school, it being exposed to the malarial atmosphere of the Potomac River. The board, therefore, earnestly recommend that, before permanent buildings for the school are provided, another location, more remote from the river, be selected, the first requirements of which shall be pure air and water, and good soil. That portion of the farm which will not be required for aqueduct purposes might be sold, and the proceeds, with an additional sum to be appropriated by Congress, applied to the purpose of the new location.

In view of the great benefits which this community must derive from an institution of this kind, and also those which would result from it as a model national institution, the board of trustees earnestly hope that Congress will make provision for erecting buildings for it sufficient to accommodate at least 300 boys.

The following are the estimates for the next fiscal year: For support of the school, $12,000, and deficiencies of the current year, $8,000; a total of $20,000.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

The Metropolitan Police force consists of 238 men, of whom 6 are detectives. In view of the fact that the population of this District is one-third greater than when the present number was fixed by law, and is rapidly increasing, the board earnestly recommends that an increase to the force be authorized to the extent of 16 sergeants and 50 privates, or patrolmen.

The members of the force have been active and vigilant in maintaining good order and protecting the rights of persons and property within the District. During the year ending September 30 last, 11,462 persons were arrested, of whom 1,980 were females. Seven thousand one hundred and fifty-two of those arrested were unmarried, and 4,427 could neither read nor write; 4,902 were dismissed, 15 turned over to the military, and 1,277 committed to the jail; 77 were sent to the Reform School, 792 were committed to the work-house, 188 gave security to keep the peace, and 43 cases were undisposed of at that date. In 557 cases minor punishments were inflicted, and fines were imposed in 3,611 cases, amounting to $33,879 32; 4,409 destitute persons were provided with temporary lodgings, 187 lost children were restored to their homes, 323 sick or disabled persons were assisted and taken to the hospital, and 211 horses, cattle, &c., were returned to their owners. Of the number arrested, all but 2,238 were born in the United States; 7,790 were charged with offenses committed upon the person, and 3,672 with offenses against property. During the year, lost or stolen property to the amount of $8,144 35 was recovered by precinct officers, and a large amount of money and property has been recovered, the loss of which was never reported.

The detective force made 296 arrests, recovered lost or stolen property to the amount of $13,948 78, and rendered other valuable and important service.

The sanitary company have been actively employed in the abatement of nuisances and the enforcement of the police regulations for promoting the cleanliness and health of the city. Several important amendments to the law governing the company are submitted for the consideration of Congress.

TERRITORIAL PENITENTIARIES.

The penitentiary at Boise City, Idaho Territory, was completed on the 14th of January last, and, on the 13th of May following was, pursuant to the act of Congress approved January 10, 1871, placed in the custody of the marshal of the United States for that Territory.

The commissioners appointed by the legislative assembly of Washington to select a site for a penitentiary in that Territory selected a tract of land, situate on McNeill's Island, near the city of Steilacoom, and the deed by which the property was conveyed to the United States was submitted to, and approved by, the Attorney General of the United States. The site was approved by this Department, and proposals were invited for the erection of one wing of the building, in accordance with plans and specifications prepared by the Architect of the Capitol Extension. Three proposals were received, but as neither of them came within the amount of the appropriation made for that purpose by the act of Congress approved January 22, 1867, I was compelled to reject them all. Congress appropriated the sum of $40,000 for the erection of penitentiaries in each of the Territories of Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Arizona, and Dakota, and but $20,000 for that in Washington Territory. I am reliably informed that a suitable building for the reception and safe-keeping of convicts cannot be erected for a much less sum in Washington than in any of the other Territories, and therefore recommend that an additional appropriation of $20,000, to be set apart from the proceeds of collections of internal revenue in that Territory, be made by Congress for that purpose.

Commissioners were appointed by the Governor of Wyoming to select a site for a penitentiary in that Territory, and fixed upon a tract of land, one mile square, situate within the Fort Saunders military reservation, near Laramie City. The Commissioner of the General Land Office certified that the location was on land owned by the United States, and the Secretary of War seeing no objection to a penitentiary being located upon said reservation, I approved the site, and caused proposals to be invited for the erection of one wing of the building. Several bids have been received, but none accepted, and, owing to the lateness of the season, it is probable that no active measures looking toward the erection of the building will be taken until the opening of the ensuing spring.

Inasmuch as the fund for defraying the expenses of the courts of the United States, which also includes the cost of keeping prisoners, was transferred to the Department of Justice on the 1st day of July, 1870, the date when the law creating that Department went into effect, I respectfully suggest that additional legislation be had by Congress, with a view of transferring from the Secretary of the Interior to the Attorney General all supervision and control now exercised by the former over such convicts as come within the terms prescribed by the acts of Congress, respectively, approved March 12, 1864, March 3, 1865, March 2, 1867, June 14, 1870, and by the act to establish in the District of Columbia a House of Correction for Boys, approved July 21, 1866.

It appears to me eminently proper that the Department that has the control of the fund out of which the expenses of keeping the United States prisoners are defrayed, should also have the power of making contracts and of exercising all such control over them as is now vested in the Secretary of the Interior; and for that reason the Department of Justice is the proper one to exercise such supervision and control. I hope, therefore, that Congress will, at its next session, take such measures as may be necessary to transfer to the Department of Justice the full control of matters of this nature.

In making appointments in the clerical force of the Department, strict attention has been given to the qualifications of applicants, no appointments being made to clerkships of any grade until the applicant has been subjected to an examination touching his fitness for the position. This course has had a beneficial effect in increasing the efficiency of the working force of the various bureaus, by giving to the service a much better class of clerks. Promotions have also been made for merit and efficiency, with like beneficial results. By a strict enforcement of the system of examinations now in use in the Department, with such improvements, from time to time, as experience will suggest, the service will be improved. This plan will be continued in this Department until a better is suggested.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. DELANO,
Secretary of the Interior.

The PRESIDENT.

OF

THE COMMISSIONER OF AGRICULTURE.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF AGRICULTURE.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., November 15, 1871.

SIR : In accordance with the requirement of the act of Congress establishing the Department of Agriculture, I have the honor to submit my first annual report.

There is scarcely a nation upon earth whose people have not recently been startled into action to promote that great interest in which more than one-half the world is actually employed and upon the success of which the other portion is dependent. The segregated character of the rural population has been such as to forbid that concentration of ideas and consultation of views which are so common to all other professions and occupations. But recently, through the instrumentality of agricultural journals and the establishment of agricultural societies and colleges, farmers have been brought to discover that there is work for them to do outside of the precincts of the farm. They seem to have been startled into a determined purpose to take their place in the race of the world's progress, and to assert for themselves a position which will enable them to keep pace with all others whose goal is success in life.

It is the purpose of this Department to encourage and aid this new spirit of improvement, having due regard to "the general designs and duties" imposed by the act of Congress establishing it, which are, "to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants." No language could be more comprehensive to express the power of this Department, or to enlarge the field of usefulness over which its influence may be extended; but it is this almost undefined power, and the vast expanse of this field, that render the task difficult to determine what shall be done to promote the great agricultural interests of the country. If a power thus concentrated, with agencies in every county of every State, and facilities for correspondence with all the countries of the world, should not be able to collect knowledge essential to the interests of the people, and seeds and products for distribution which are new and valuable, the failure would be traceable to its own inefficiency, and not to its want of means to do good.

There is, perhaps, no occupation in life which so greatly needs the fostering care of the Government as that of farming. There is no principle of political economy, no question of public policy, no consideration of statistical facts, no new development of scientific knowledge, which does not come home to be measured in its influence upon the results of the farm. This Department, as I view it, has been established to care for these interests, and it invokes our anxious study to know how this shall be best done. My experience in observing the workings of the Department has not been long enough to enable me either to pronounce upon its excellence or to hastily dictate points of improvement, but time and zeal in the effort to give efficiency to its work may enable me to extend its usefulness.

It will be remembered that, by the act of the 2d of July, 1862, Congress donated to the States public lands to "provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts." This was a new and important era, and may be said to mark the beginning of scientific knowledge as it pertains to agriculture. It must be conceded that the literary institutions of the country educate boys to a state of total unfitness for the occupations of the farm. The father finds his boy, after his return from an absence of a single year, to have had his thoughts and views centered upon an outside world, and when he has graduated and returns after an absence of four years, he gazes around to conclude that the farm is no place for him; his father and mother and brothers and sisters are no companions for him; his thoughts and theirs have been pursuing different paths; all congeniality of feeling is lost and gone, and he is driven to the nearest county town to prepare himself to make a poor figure in professional life, and perchance to be led into the haunts of intemperance and vice, realizing for his anxious parents not only the loss of the hardly-earned expenses of his education, but the loss of the son himself. But the boy whose acquaintance with natural science and modern languages is accompanied by the study and observation of how plants live and feed and die; how implements are formed, and how their mechanical structure and shape are adapted to the work they do; how the earth itself lives and breathes and dies; and who is accustomed to study and ponder these things as he learns the practical operations of the work itself, returns to his father's home upon the farm, proud of his father's occupation, and happy in the associations of his family and friends; and far more so because of the light which he may shed around him, the position which his education will give him among his fellows, and the success which will be sure to characterize his after life. I speak in no disparagement of, and with no desire to make unfavorable impressions in regard to universities, colleges, and schools, in which youth are trained for professional life, but I claim that the agriculturists of the country shall have a place where their youth may be imbued with the light of science, and thus fitted for agricultural life.

The wisdom of Congress having provided for the endowment of an agricultural college in every State, these institutions are about to perform a most important part in the destinies of the country. They are yet in their infancy; professors and teachers are themselves yet untaught; agricultural education in this land is a new idea which has but now struck the public mind and is yet to be matured, and a curriculum established which shall have for its object the education of youth in the science and art of cultivating the soil. If these institutions will but confer together, and adopt such principles of action as shall be common to them all, and not inconsistent with the habits of the people in their several localities; establish subjects of study and rules of discipline and graduation; and, especially, if they will recognize and act upon the fact that this Department and they are engaged in the prosecution of a common cause, and that the Department may be made the nucleus around which may be collected the knowledge of inventions, statistics and rare facts, new and improved seeds and plants, to be disseminated, distributed, and experimented upon by the instrumentality of agricultural colleges, the farmer will be benefited to a degree which will be felt throughout every vein and artery of our common country. But, to attain this object, agricultural colleges should be distinctive in their character, and should be made to require compulsory labor of at least twelve hours a week from each of their pupils, thus training their tastes and habits, and inuring them to the daily occupation of a farmer's life, and thus, also, answering the objections often made to agricultural colleges, that their graduates at last choose the business of professional life.

An intimate relation between this Department and the agricultural colleges of the country would produce the most profitable information. If the result of their experiments in crops, the value of fertilizers, the nutritive value of various kinds of food, and the mode of planting, cultivating, harvesting, and storing were all concentrated at this Department, and analyzed and published, what a fund of knowledge would be thus collected and disseminated among the people, and how much more likely would that class who are to be benefited by this knowledge be reached through the instrumentality of these institutions than they now are by the course pursued. I do not profess to have matured the subject, and now only introduce it that it may command the consideration of the minds of men who know and feel how important it is that the agricultural improvements of the country should keep pace with the world's progress in all else.

It must be conceded that the course of agriculture in the Southern States has not been conducted with that care, skill, and regard for ultimate results which have characterized the operations of farmers in other States. While their lands are continuously devoted to cotton and tobacco until they have arrived at a state of exhaustion, those of the North are continually improving by rotation of crops, which is absolutely essential to the life of the soil itself, and without which farming and planting had better be abandoned. These impressions have induced me to turn my attention to these States to seek some mode by which the influence of this Department may be directed to benefit them ; to find out whether their implements, and especially their seeds, may not be greatly improved ; and how, in the distribution of seeds and plants, we may best reach those to whom they may be profitably sent.

The agriculture of the Southern States suffers greatly in its interests for want of grasses, in the use of which its productions would be greatly increased, by rendering a rotation of crops necessary. It will be an effort of this Department to introduce this idea, as well as the seeds by which it may be carried out. Clover, with its deep roots, and rye-grass, a strong grower, will well endure the hot sun of the South ; and, if preceded by an application of lime, they are sure to grow luxuriantly.

The report of the superintendent of the seed division, and our correspondence with practical farmers, strongly impress my mind with the immense benefit which the distribution of seeds confers upon the country. I do not hesitate to assert that the increased production of wheat, oats, and grasses, by reason of the distribution of new and improved seeds, pays more than ten times the whole amount expended by the Government in this Department, and such is the appreciation of this by the farmers of the country that the demands upon us are daily increasing to a degree beyond our ability to supply. It is very desirable that the efforts of the Department should be especially directed to obtain the most approved cereals, grasses, and plants which the world affords, that they may be put into the hands of our enterprising people. Jute, ramie, and many other exotics may be grown here as well as in any part of the world, and they give great promise of adding very much to our agricultural productions and profits. But in the distribution of seeds I am satisfied that the mode heretofore pursued is erroneous. The quantity sent is entirely too small for even an experiment. A pint or a quart of wheat, oats, or other cereal, cannot be successfully grown, and such experiments almost uniformly fail because the quantity is too small. I need not here discuss the reasons for this, but the result is manifest to those who have tried the experiment. It would be far better to put a half or whole bushel of seed into the hands of one conscientious and careful person than to divide the same quantity among ten or twenty.

I regard, also, the mode of distribution of our annual report as very objectionable. Indeed, in my judgment, it should not be published at all, but should be entirely superseded by the monthly reports which it is now the practice of the Department to issue. These may contain all the information that should emanate from the Department during the year, and the last one, containing the Commissioner's report, should be a condensed summary of the operations of the year. But if it be the pleasure of Congress to continue the annual publication, I suggest that a much smaller number than has been customary be delivered for gratuitous distribution, and that the greater part of the edition be deposited with the Public Printer, to be sent to all persons who would order the books and pay their first cost and postage for delivery. This, I am advised, would be 66½ cents a volume, making an allowance of 10 per cent. for the expense of wrapping and posting. The daily applications for this book, which the Department has not, convince me that thousands would gladly pay so small a sum to obtain that which they so much desire to have.

The annual report for the year 1870 has been greatly delayed by an effort to obtain statistical facts which were deemed important; but there is no reason why this publication, if it is expedient to make it at all, should not be issued as early as the month of March in each year. It will not be delayed again.

I have been so short a time in the Department that I have not yet discovered all its results nor all its powers of usefulness, and especially have I not yet been able to devise the ways and means by which these powers may be most profitably exercised for the public good. But if a natural fondness for agriculture, and a zealous interest in its success, shall enable me to give tone and character to the Department, it will not suffer in my hands. I am the more satisfied of this because I am surrounded by men of the very highest character and attainments in the several divisions to which they belong. Hence, I am never at a loss for an intelligent and satisfactory answer to any inquiry made of the Department.

DIVISION OF HORTICULTURE.

The laying out of the grounds of the Department according to the original design is progressing as rapidly as means will allow. The classified arrangement of trees in the arboretum is also very far advanced toward completion. This part of the improvement promises to be of much interest, and will, no doubt, soon be followed by the formation of similarly arranged collections in public parks, and in the grounds of public institutions, colleges, and schools.

In the exotic department a very large collection of economic and useful plants is under cultivation, and valuable accessions are constantly being received, either by purchase or through exchanges with foreign governments. It is proposed to encourage the formation of similar interesting collections in connection with the agricultural colleges, several of which have already availed themselves of the assistance of the Department in establishing conservatories, where the principal representative, medical, oil-producing, and other plants that furnish valuable commercial products may be seen and studied.

One of the most promising of fiber plants now being extensively propagated is the so-called New Zealand flax, (Phormium tenax.) This plant possesses a strong fiber, well fitted for cordage and similar purposes. Whether this fiber can be successfully separated from the leaves will be a question for chemical determination. The plant is adapted to cultivation in all the Southern States, and flourishes in undrained, swampy, and low lands which are unfitted for cotton or corn crops.

STATISTICAL DIVISION.

The operations of the statistical division, including the editing and issue of all the publications of the Department, have been conducted with industry and intelligence, and are becoming more systematic and comprehensive, embracing wider areas and a broader range of information. No effort will be spared to insure accuracy and completeness in this important branch of Department services.

One of the most important items of special work now engaging the attention of this division is the collection of facts illustrating the agricultural status of the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Slope, showing the progress of settlement and colonization, the yield and quality of production, the peculiarities and profit of agricultural labor, and the wants and capabilities of that great continental area. I propose to accomplish what may be done this year, with means and facilities at command, at a beginning of such a statistical and agricultural survey; and suggest that, if it be the pleasure of Congress to make a small special appropriation for the continuance of the work in the coming year, the country would be greatly benefited.

CHEMICAL DIVISION.

Two extensive investigations in the chemical division were commenced early in the year. One of these, the analysis of several hundred specimens of cereals, carefully selected from the whole production of the country, and accompanied by full information in regard to the methods and conditions of cultivation, it is hoped will prove of general value and interest. The examination of the leaf, stem, and fruit of the grapevine, at every week of its growth, has also been undertaken, and is nearly completed. By this work it is expected that new analogies in animal and vegetable physiology will be established, and information gained which bears directly upon the diseases of the vine. Several hundred determinations of the most accurate sort are required, and the time of one assistant is entirely occupied by them.

To enable the chemist to devote himself to those important subjects in agricultural science which await and demand chemical research, I am strongly of the opinion that the public privilege should be restricted to the employment of the laboratory for such purposes only as relate to agriculture. It is evident that if the laboratory were to continue to be held subject to all the miscellaneous demands which have heretofore been made upon it, not only would original investigation be prevented, but an increase of force would be required. The law at present provides only for the employment of a chemist and an assistant.

The apparatus and fixtures of the laboratory have received a few additions, and, with the exception of occasional special needs in original research, may now be considered to be complete.

ENTOMOLOGICAL DIVISION AND MUSEUM.

During the last year the correspondence of the entomological division has largely increased, letters having been received and answered concerning injurious insects, birds, quadrupeds, and other branches of natural history, and fruits, fibers, and such subjects as relate to the museum. Investigations have been made into the habits of insects in respect to their food, transformations, &c., and into the best remedies now used to destroy those that are particularly injurious to the farmer. Full experiments have been made in rearing the silk-worm (Bombyx mori) on the leaves of the Osage orange, (Maclura aurantiaca.) The worms fed greedily, were perfectly healthy, and spun large-sized cocoons of very fair silk.

Cases are much needed for the special reception of the valuable and growing collection of insects now in boxes, and accessible only to entomologists. When such cases are provided, the entire collection will be arranged and labeled, so that the beneficial and the injurious species may be pointed out at a glance. A collection has been commenced with the design of showing the nature of the injuries by insects upon various substances, together with the economic products made by them, as cochineal, gums, &c., and their nests and cocoons. Such a collection is of special value in a cabinet of entomology, as the farmer or fruit-grower can at once identify any insect by comparison of the injury caused by it with the specimen in the cabinet.

During the year large collections of fruits and vegetables have been received from many localities. All these have been modeled and properly labeled and placed in the museum, together with a fine collection of tropical fruits from South America, done in papier-maché. Many other valuable additions have been made to the museum during the year, prominent among which may be mentioned the fine collection of fibers made by Dr. H. Perrine, in Florida, several years ago, and presented by the Smithsonian Institution, and a similar collection made by the botanist of the Department while in Santo Domingo; collections of insects from the Smithsonian Institution and from geological surveys; a collection of foreign game-birds by the curator; Chinese and Japanese papers, cocoons, silk, &c.; and contributions in other departments.

THE LIBRARY.

The number of volumes now in the library is 6,012, of which there have been added during the year 1,064, inclusive of 500 volumes received from the Secretary of the Interior. About one-half of the whole number added relate to agriculture and the allied sciences of pomology, entomology, agricultural geology, microscopy, and natural history, all valuable for reference on questions continually discussed in the correspondence and reports of the Department. Those donated by the Secretary of the Interior are composed principally of public documents.

The library continues to receive the journals and reports of the leading agricultural and scientific associations of the world, many of which are in exchange for the annual and monthly reports of the Department. Some of the French journals have been suspended by the war with Germany, but doubtless their publication will soon be resumed and the exchange continued. All of these works are carefully preserved, and in themselves form a useful collection for reference in the scientific and statistical investigations of the day. Many of them are probably not accessible in any other library in the country. They furnish the results of the very latest investigations in entomology, botany, agricultural geology, and microscopy, as well as experiments in agriculture, which could be abridged and published in the monthly reports of the Department before they are reproduced by the agricultural journals of the country.

Many of the sets of State agricultural reports and periodicals being incomplete, steps have been taken to supply the volumes and numbers that were missing. This has been accomplished in nearly every instance without expense to the Department. The library now contains sets, generally complete, of the transactions of the boards of agriculture of all the leading States of the Union for the last twenty years.

There are now nearly 500 volumes of miscellaneous agricultural publications at the Government bindery for binding or rebinding.

A catalogue of the library is being prepared, in which will be classified the most important subjects, so that persons wishing to investigate any particular topic can see at a glance the titles of all the works relating to it.

EXCHANGE OF SEEDS.

Since the plan of international exchanges of seeds and plants was inaugurated by my predecessor, the Department has continued the system, having found the results to be highly advantageous in adding to our collection seeds of many valuable species of useful and ornamental plants that could not be readily procured through the ordinary channels of trade, except at a very heavy outlay. Since the last report referring to these exchanges, the Department has sent two collections of tree seeds, one containing ninety-five species, and the other one hundred and sixteen, to the Royal Botanic Gardens, at Kew, England; Royal Botanic Gardens, at Edinburgh, Scotland; Royal Botanic Gardens, at Glasnevin, and Royal Dublin Society, at Dublin, Ireland; Horticultural Society of Bremen, North German Union; Botanic Gardens, at Melbourne, Australia; Royal Minister of Agriculture, at Berlin; government of Switzerland, through Mr. John Hitz, consul general; Imperial and Royal Ministers of Agricultural Affairs, Austria and Hungary; University of Christiania, Norway; Royal Gardens, Portugal; Imperial Botanic Gardens, at St. Petersburg, Russia; and the Kingdom of the Netherlands. From many of these correspondents the Department has received some valuable contributions, of which special mention may be made of those from the Kew Gardens, the Royal Gardens at Melbourne, and the Imperial and Royal Ministers of Agricultural Affairs of Austria and Hungary. Exchanges have also been effected through the courtesy of our ministers and consuls in South America, Europe, Asia, and the Hawaiian Islands, and through these sources some of the most rare and valuable seeds and plants have been received.

During the present year correspondence has been opened with the ministers of agriculture of the South American governments for the purpose of effecting exchanges of the agricultural and other useful products of those countries which are known to be prolific of numerous medicinal and other economic plants. The result of this correspondence has been the receipt of many rare plants, consisting of palms, &c., as also donations of cereals and vegetable-seeds of rare perfection, among which may be mentioned a contribution of cereals from the president of the National Society of Santiago, Peru, embracing some of the finest specimens of wheat I have ever seen, which, with other similar contributions, will be carefully experimented with, for the purpose of testing their adaptability to our soil and climate. These South American correspondents are located in Brazil, Ecuador, Venezuela, Nicaragua, Mexico, Guatemala, and United States of Colombia. Exchanges continue with the Chinese and Japanese governments, and some valuable contributions have been received, especially from the latter.

An arrangement for exchange has been made with the colonial governments of Jamaica, which will result largely to the advantage of this Department, the colonial secretary having promised a donation of over three thousand plants of the cinchonas, embracing all the valuable varieties. This acquisition will enable the Department, at an early period, to encourage experiments in those sections of the South where there is a reasonable prospect of the successful culture of this invaluable plant, which, in the past, has been exclusively confined to certain localities in South America, but the cultivation of which has recently been commenced by the British government in the East and West Indies at a large outlay.

The international courtesies that are inaugurated and fostered by a system of mutual exchanges of the products of the soil are prolific of most valuable results. Following the successful introduction of our seeds into foreign countries, especially those in which the ruder systems of agriculture prevail, come inquiries regarding the best modes of culture, the introduction of improved machinery for the husbanding and utilizing of crops, and questions of similar import, thus extending the benefits of our improved mechanism and labor-saving farm-implements. While the advantages which must naturally flow from this source redound to the immediate benefit and permanent advancement of the important mechanical interests of this country, improved systems at the same time are introduced into those countries with which we exchange, thereby hastening their development, increasing their productions, and adding to their wealth.

THE SEED DIVISION.

The following tabular statement shows the quantity and kind of seeds issued from the seed division of this Department from November 1, 1870, to October 31, 1871, inclusive.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTIONS OF THE YEAR.

In its meteorological aspects the season has been marked by local droughts, high winds, and floods. In the later months of summer continued dry weather became rather general than local throughout a large portion of the Ohio Valley, the Missouri Valley, and the Southwestern States; and in the Rocky Mountain sections drought was more severe than usual. It is to be feared that the destruction of forests by devastating fires, and in supplying lumber and timber, will render drought, winds, and floods more frequent and severe. Heavy frosts, which proved very injurious to winter grain, were general throughout the West from April 21 to 23; and autumn frosts, which arrested the growth and maturity of crops, occurred generally from 21st to 30th of September. The month of September was cooler than the corresponding month for many years, but the high temperature of the preceding months, and especially of August, had advanced corn and other crops beyond the point of material damage from frosts.

The injury resulting from these unfavorable meteorological conditions is mainly seen in the poorer soils, or in those in inferior mechanical condition—those in the highest cultivation and of the richest character having a power of resistance and a recuperative energy which insure good crops under circumstances apparently adverse. The records of the Department, verifying the observation of all intelligent cultivators, attest the value of perfect drainage and good culture in warding off dangers from drought and excessive moisture. Such has been the experience of the present year, which promises a moderate abundance for the supply of man and his dependent creatures of the farm. The area planted with corn was largely increased, and a larger breadth of wheat was sown. While the crop of corn will not equal the great yield of 1870, nor that of wheat the unparalleled crop of 1869, there will be an ample supply of both for the wants of this country, and tens of millions of bushels to supplement the short crops of Europe. While the product of hay is somewhat less than usual, its quality is good, and coarse forage in all sections and winter pasturage in the South and distant West are never-failing resources. Cotton will be gathered in smaller quantity, and sold at a higher price. Other crops, as a whole, promise very nearly average returns, giving moderate rewards to labor and ample supplies for necessary consumption.

FINANCIAL.

At the time I assumed the duties of Commissioner, on the 1st day of August last, the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871, were exhausted, except the appropriation for the "purchase and distribution of new and valuable seeds," of which there remained a balance unexpended of $7,508 96, with unsettled bills for seeds purchased in Europe, under this appropriation, amounting to about $7,300. Of the appropriations for the current fiscal year, the following statement exhibits the amounts disbursed and the unexpended balances, under their respective heads, on the 1st of August last :

Title of appropriation.	Amount disbursed to July 31, 1871.	Amount unexpended August 1, 1871.
Salaries	$6,207 92	$68,962 08
Collecting statistics	884 50	14,115 50
Purchase and distribution of seeds		45,000 00
Experimental garden	707 96	9,292 04
Contingent expenses	344 90	12,555 10
Furniture, cases, and repairs	185 50	4,514 50
Museum		2,000 00
Library	140 31	1,909 69
Laboratory	420 35	2,969 65
Improvement of grounds	7,500 00	19,300 00
Total	16,451 44	180,618 56

Showing a balance unexpended at that date of $180,618 56, which, with strict economy, will be sufficient for the successful operations of the Department during the current year.

By a late act of Congress the financial operations of the Department for each fiscal year are to be kept entirely separate. I deem it proper, therefore, to defer until the expiration of the present fiscal year a report of these operations during the three months I have had control of the Department, when a complete report will be made.

My estimates for the appropriations necessary for this Department during the fiscal year of 1873 were made and transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury on the 17th of October. They were based on the appropriations for the present year; reduced in some respects when it could be done without injury to the successful operations of the Department, and slightly increased in other items when the necessities of the case seemed to require it, and in all respects with reference to the most rigid economy consistent with an efficient administration of the legitimate objects of the Department. The aggregate amount estimated is less than the appropriations for the current year.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FREDERICK WATTS,

Commissioner of Agriculture.

President.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

To the Senate and House of Representatives :

In addressing my third annual message to the law-making branch of the Government, it is gratifying to be able to state that during the past year success has generally attended the effort to execute all laws found upon the statute-books. The policy has been, not to inquire into the wisdom of laws already enacted, but to learn their spirit and intent, and to enforce them accordingly.

The past year has, under a wise Providence, been one of general prosperity to the nation. It has, however, been attended with more than usual chastisements in the loss of life and property, by storm and fire. These disasters have served to call forth the best elements of human nature in our country, and to develop a friendship for us on the part of foreign nations which goes far toward alleviating the distresses occasioned by these calamities. The benevolent, who have so generously shared their means with the victims of these misfortunes, will reap their reward in the consciousness of having performed a noble act, and in receiving the grateful thanks of men, women, and children whose sufferings they have relieved.

The relations of the United States with foreign powers continue to be friendly. The year has been an eventful one in witnessing two great nations, speaking one language and having one lineage, settling, by peaceful arbitration, disputes of long standing, and liable at any time to bring those nations into bloody and costly conflict. An example has thus been set which, if successful in its final issue, may be followed by other civilized nations, and finally be the means of returning to productive industry millions of men now maintained to settle the disputes of nations by the bayonet and the broadside.

I transmit herewith a copy of the treaty alluded to, which has been concluded, since the adjournment of Congress, with Her Britannic Majesty, and a copy of the protocols of the conferences of the commissioners by whom it was negotiated. This treaty provides methods for adjusting the questions pending between the two nations.

Various questions are to be adjusted by arbitration. I recommend Congress at an early day to make the necessary provision for the tribunal at Geneva, and for the several commissioners, on the part of the United States, called for by the treaty.

His Majesty the King of Italy, the President of the Swiss Confederation, and His Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, have each consented, on the joint request of the two powers, to name an arbitrator for the tribunal at Geneva. I have caused my thanks to be suitably expressed for the readiness with which the joint request has been complied with, by the appointment of gentlemen of eminence and learning to these important positions.

His Majesty the Emperor of Germany has been pleased to comply with the joint request of the two governments, and has consented to act as the arbitrator of the disputed water boundary between the United States and Great Britain.

The contracting parties in the treaty have undertaken to regard as between themselves certain principles of public law, for which the United States have contended from the commencement of their history. They have also agreed to bring those principles to the knowledge of the other maritime powers and to invite them to accede to them. Negotiations are going on as to the form of the note by which the invitation is to be extended to the other powers.

I recommend the legislation necessary on the part of the United States to bring into operation the articles of the treaty relating to the fisheries, and to the other matters touching the relations of the United States toward the British North American possessions, to become operative so soon as the proper legislation shall be had on the part of Great Britain and its possessions. It is much to be desired that this legislation may become operative before the fishermen of the United States begin to make their arrangements for the coming season.

I have addressed a communication, of which a copy is transmitted herewith, to the governors of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin, urging upon the governments of those States, respectively, the necessary action on their part to carry into effect the object of the article of the treaty which contemplates the use of the canals, on either side, connected with the navigation of the lakes and rivers forming the boundary, on terms of equality by the inhabitants of both countries. It is hoped that the importance of the object and the benefits to flow therefrom will secure the speedy approval and legislative sanction of the States concerned.

I renew the recommendation for an appropriation for determining the true position of the forty-ninth parallel of latitude where it forms the boundary between the United States and the British North American possessions, between the Lake of the Woods and the summit of the Rocky Mountains. The early action of Congress on this recommendation would put it in the power of the War Department to place a force in the field during the next summer.

The resumption of diplomatic relations between France and Germany have enabled me to give directions for the withdrawal of the protection extended to Germans in France by the diplomatic and consular representatives of the United States in that country. It is just to add that the delicate duty of this protection has been performed by the minister and the consul general at Paris, and the various consuls in France under the supervision of the latter, with great kindness as well as with prudence and tact. Their course has received the commendation of the German government, and has wounded no susceptibility of the French.

The government of the Emperor of Germany continues to manifest a friendly feeling toward the United States, and a desire to harmonize with the moderate and just policy which this Government maintains in its relations with Asiatic powers, as well as with the South American republics. I have given assurances that the friendly feelings of that government are fully shared by the United States.

The ratifications of the consular and naturalization conventions with the Austro-Hungarian Empire have been exchanged.

I have been officially informed of the annexation of the States of the Church to the Kingdom of Italy, and the removal of the capital of that kingdom to Rome. In conformity with the established policy of the United States, I have recognized this change. The ratifications of the new treaty of commerce between the United States and Italy have been exchanged. The two powers have agreed in this treaty that private property at sea shall be exempt from capture in case of war between the two powers. The United States have spared no opportunity of incorporating this rule into the obligation of nations.

The Forty-first Congress at its third session made an appropriation for the organization of a mixed commission for adjudicating upon the claims of citizens of the United States against Spain growing out of the insurrection in Cuba. That commission has since been organized. I transmit herewith the correspondence relating to its formation and its jurisdiction. It is to be hoped that this commission will afford the claimants a complete remedy for their injuries.

It has been made the agreeable duty of the United States to preside over a conference at Washington between the plenipotentiaries of Spain and the allied South American republics, which has resulted in an armistice, with the reasonable assurance of a permanent peace.

The intimate friendly relations which have so long existed between the United States and Russia continue undisturbed. The visit of the third son of the Emperor is a proof that there is no desire on the part of his government to diminish the cordiality of those relations. The hospitable reception which has been given to the Grand Duke is a proof that on our side we share the wishes of that government. The inexcusable course of the Russian minister at Washington rendered it necessary to ask his recall, and to decline to longer receive that functionary as a diplomatic representative. It was impossible with self-respect, or with a just regard to the dignity of the country, to permit Mr. Catacazy to continue to hold intercourse with this Government after his personal abuse of Government officials, and during his persistent interference, through various means, with the relations between the United States and other powers. In accordance with my wishes, this Government has been relieved of further intercourse with Mr. Catacazy, and the management of the affairs of the imperial legation has passed into the hands of a gentleman entirely unobjectionable.

With Japan we continue to maintain intimate relations. The cabinet of the Mikado has, since the close of the last session of Congress, selected citizens of the United States to serve in offices of importance in several departments of government. I have reason to think that this selection is due to an appreciation of the disinterestedness of the policy which the United States have pursued toward Japan. It is our desire to continue to maintain this disinterested and just policy with China as well as Japan. The correspondence transmitted herewith shows that there is no disposition on the part of this Government to swerve from its established course.

Prompted by a desire to put an end to the barbarous treatment of our shipwrecked sailors on the Corean coast, I instructed our minister at Peking to endeavor to conclude a convention with Corea for securing the safety and humane treatment of such mariners.

Admiral Rodgers was instructed to accompany him, with a sufficient force to protect him in case of need.

A small surveying party sent out, on reaching the coast, was treacherously attacked at a disadvantage. Ample opportunity was given for explanation and apology for the insult. Neither came. A force was then landed. After an arduous march over a rugged and difficult country, the forts from which the outrages had been committed were reduced by a gallant assault and were destroyed. Having thus punished the criminals, and having vindicated the honor of the flag, the expedition returned, finding it impracticable, under the circumstances, to conclude the desired convention. I respectfully refer to the correspondence relating thereto, herewith submitted, and leave the subject for such action as Congress may see fit to take.

The republic of Mexico has not yet repealed the very objectionable laws establishing what is known as the "Free Zone," on the frontier of the United States. It is hoped that this may yet be done, and also that more stringent measures may be taken by that republic for restraining lawless persons on its frontiers. I hope that Mexico, by its own action, will soon relieve this Government of the difficulties experienced from these causes. Our relations with the various republics of Central and South America continue, with one exception, to be cordial and friendly.

I recommend some action by Congress regarding the overdue installments under the award of the Venezuelan claims commission of 1866. The internal dissensions of this government present no justification for the absence of effort to meet their solemn treaty obligations.

The ratification of an extradition treaty with Nicaragua has been exchanged.

It is a subject for congratulation that the great empire of Brazil has taken the initiatory step toward the abolition of slavery. Our relations with that empire, always cordial, will naturally be made more so by this act. It is not too much to hope that the government of Brazil may hereafter find it for its interest as well as intrinsically right to advance toward entire emancipation more rapidly than the present act contemplates.

The true prosperity and greatness of a nation is to be found in the elevation and education of its laborers.

It is a subject for regret that the reforms in this direction, which were voluntarily promised by the statesmen of Spain, have not been carried out in its West India colonies. The laws and regulations for the apparent abolition of slavery in Cuba and Porto Rico leave most of the laborers in bondage, with no hope of release until their lives become a burden to their employers.

I desire to direct your attention to the fact that citizens of the United States, or persons claiming to be citizens of the United States, are large holders, in foreign lands, of this species of property, forbidden by the fundamental law of their alleged country. I recommend to Congress to provide, by stringent legislation, a suitable remedy against the holding, owning, or dealing in slaves, or being interested in slave property in foreign lands, either as owners, hirers, or mortgagers, by citizens of the United States.

It is to be regretted that the disturbed condition of the island of Cuba continues to be a source of annoyance and of anxiety. The existence of a protracted struggle in such close proximity to our own territory, without apparent prospect of an early termination, cannot be other than an object of concern to a people who, while abstaining from interference in the affairs of other powers, naturally desire to see every country in the undisturbed enjoyment of peace, liberty, and the blessings of free institutions.

Our naval commanders in Cuban waters have been instructed, in case it should become necessary, to spare no effort to protect the lives and property of bona-fide American citizens, and to maintain the dignity of the flag.

It is hoped that all pending questions with Spain growing out of the affairs in Cuba may be adjusted in the spirit of peace and conciliation which has hitherto guided the two powers in their treatment of such questions.

To give importance, and to add to the efficiency of our diplomatic relations with Japan and China, and to further aid in retaining the good opinion of those peoples, and to secure to the United States its share of the commerce destined to flow between those nations and the balance of the commercial world, I earnestly recommend that an appropriation be made to support at least four American youths in each of those countries, to serve as a part of the official family of our ministers there. Our representatives would not even then be placed upon an equality with the representatives of Great Britain and of some other powers. As now situated, our representatives in Japan and China have to depend, for interpreters and translators, upon natives of those countries who know our language imperfectly, or procure for the occasion the services of employés in foreign business houses, or the interpreters to other foreign ministers.

I would also recommend liberal measures for the purpose of supporting the American lines of steamers now plying between San Francisco and Japan and China, and the Australian line—almost our only remaining lines of ocean steamers—and of increasing their services.

The national debt has been reduced to the extent of eighty-six million fifty-seven thousand one hundred and twenty-six dollars and eighty cents during the year, and by the negotiation of national bonds at a lower rate of interest, the interest on the public debt has been so far diminished that now the sum to be raised for the interest account is nearly seventeen million dollars less than on the 1st of March, 1869. It was highly desirable that this rapid diminution should take place, both to strengthen the credit of the country, and to convince its citizens of their entire ability to meet every dollar of liability without bankrupting them. But in view of the accomplishment of these desirable ends; of the rapid development of the resources of the country; its increasing ability to meet large demands, and the amount already paid, it is not desirable that the present resources of the country should continue to be taxed in order to continue this rapid payment. I therefore recommend a modification of both the tariff and internal tax laws. I recommend that all taxes from internal sources be abolished, except those collected from spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, tobacco in its various forms, and from stamps.

In re-adjusting the tariff, I suggest that a careful estimate be made of the amount of surplus revenue collected under the present laws, after providing for the current expenses of the Government, the interest account, and a sinking fund, and that this surplus be reduced in such a manner as to afford the greatest relief to the greatest number. There are many articles not produced at home, but which enter largely into general consumption through articles which are manufactured at home, such as medicines compounded, &c., &c., from which very little revenue is derived, but which enter into general use. All such articles I recommend to be placed on the "free list." Should a further reduction prove advisable, I would then recommend that it be made upon those articles which can best bear it without disturbing home-production, or reducing the wages of American labor.

I have not entered into figures, because to do so would be to repeat what will be laid before you in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The present laws for collecting revenue pay collectors of customs small salaries, but provide for moieties (shares in all seizures) which, at principal ports of entry particularly, raise the compensation of those officials to a large sum. It has always seemed to me as if this system must, at times, work perniciously. It holds out an inducement to dishonest men, should such get possession of those offices, to be lax in their scrutiny of goods entered to enable them finally to make large seizures. Your attention is respectfully invited to this subject.

Continued fluctuations in the value of gold, as compared with the national currency, has a most damaging effect upon the increase and development of the country in keeping up prices of all articles necessary in every-day life. It fosters a spirit of gambling prejudicial alike to national morals and the national finances. If the question can be met, as to how to give a fixed value to our currency, that value constantly and uniformly approaching par with specie, a very desirable object will be gained.

For the operations of the Army in the past year, the expense of maintaining it, the estimate for the ensuing year, and for continuing sea-coast and other improvements conducted under the supervision of the War Department, I refer you to the accompanying report of the Secretary of War.

I call your attention to the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1869, which discontinues promotions in the staff corps of the Army until provided for by law. I recommend that the number of officers in each grade in the staff corps be fixed, and that whenever the number in any one grade falls below the number so fixed, that the vacancy may be filled by promotion from the grade below. I also recommend that, when the office of chief of a corps becomes vacant, the place may be filled by selection from the corps in which the vacancy exists.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy shows an improvement in the number and efficiency of the naval force, without material increase in the expense of supporting it. This is due to the policy which has been adopted, and is being extended, as fast as our material will admit, of using smaller vessels as cruisers on the several stations. By this means we have been enabled to occupy at once a larger extent of cruising-ground, to visit more frequently the ports where the presence of our flag is desirable, and generally to discharge more efficiently the appropriate duties of the Navy in time of peace, without exceeding the number of men or the expenditure authorized by law.

During the past year the Navy has, in addition to its regular service, supplied the men and officers for the vessels of the Coast Survey, and has completed the surveys authorized by Congress of the Isthmus of Darien and Tehuantepec, and under like authority has sent out an expedition completely furnished and equipped to explore the unknown ocean of the north.

The suggestions of the report as to the necessity for increasing and improving the materiel of the Navy, and the plan recommended for reducing the personnel of the service to a peace standard, by the gradual abolition of certain grades of officers, the reduction of others, and the employment of some in the service of the commercial marine, are well considered and deserve the thoughtful attention of Congress.

I also recommend that all promotions in the Navy above the rank of captain be by selection instead of by seniority. This course will secure in the higher grades greater efficiency and hold out an incentive to young officers to improve themselves in the knowledge of their profession.

The present cost of maintaining the Navy, its cost compared with that of the preceding year, and the estimates for the ensuing year, are contained in the accompanying report of the Secretary of the Navy.

The enlarged receipts of the Post-Office Department, as shown by the accompanying report of the Postmaster General, exhibits a gratifying increase in that branch of the public service. It is the index of the growth of education and of the prosperity of the people, two elements highly conducive to the vigor and stability of republics. With a vast territory like ours, much of it sparsely populated, but all requiring the services of the mail, it is not at present to be expected that this Department can be made self-sustaining. But a gradual approach to this end, from year to year, is confidently relied on, and the day is not far distant when the Post-Office Department of the Government will prove a much greater blessing to the whole people than it is now.

The suggestions of the Postmaster General for improvements in the Department presided over by him are earnestly recommended to your special attention. Especially do I recommend favorable consideration of the plan for uniting the telegraphic system of the United States with the postal system. It is believed that by such a course the cost of telegraphing could be much reduced, and the service as well, if not better, rendered. It would secure the further advantage of extending the telegraph through portions of the country where private enterprise will not construct it. Commerce, trade, and, above all, the efforts to bring a people widely separated into a community of interest, are always benefited by a rapid intercommunication. Education, the ground-work of republican institutions, is encouraged by increasing the facilities to gather speedy news from all parts of the country. The desire to reap the benefit of such improvements will stimulate education. I refer you to the report of the Postmaster-General for full details of the operations of last year, and for comparative statements of results with former years.

There has been imposed upon the Executive branch of the Government the execution of the act of Congress approved April 20, 1871, and commonly known as the Ku-Klux law, in a portion of the State of South Carolina. The necessity of the course pursued will be demonstrated by the report of the Committee to Investigate Southern Outrages. Under the provisions of the above act, I issued a proclamation calling the attention of the people of the United States to the same, and declaring my reluctance to exercise any of the extraordinary powers thereby conferred upon me, except in case of imperative necessity, but making known my purpose to exercise such powers whenever it should become necessary to do so for the purpose of securing to all citizens of the United States the peaceful enjoyment of the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution and the laws.

After the passage of this law, information was received from time to time that combinations of the character referred to in this law existed, and were powerful in many parts of the Southern States, particularly in certain counties in the State of South Carolina.

Careful investigation was made, and it was ascertained that, in nine counties of that State, such combinations were active and powerful, embracing a sufficient portion of the citizens to control the local authority, and having, among other things, the object of depriving the emancipated class of the substantial benefits of freedom, and of preventing the free political action of those citizens who did not sympathize with their own views. Among their operations were frequent scourgings and occasional assassinations, generally perpetrated at night by disguised persons, the victims in almost all cases being citizens of different political sentiments from their own, or freed persons who had shown a disposition to claim equal rights with other citizens. Thousands of inoffensive and well-disposed citizens were the sufferers by this lawless violence.

Thereupon, on the 12th of October, 1871, a proclamation was issued, in terms of the law, calling upon the members of those combinations to disperse within five days, and to deliver to the marshal or military officers of the United States all arms, ammunition, uniforms, disguises, and other means and implements used by them for carrying out their unlawful purposes.

This warning not having been heeded, on the 17th of October another proclamation was issued, suspending the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus in nine counties in that State.

Direction was given that, within the counties so designated, persons supposed, upon creditable information, to be members of such unlawful combinations should be arrested by the military forces of the United States, and delivered to the marshal, to be dealt with according to law. In two of said counties, York and Spartanburgh, many arrests have been made. At the last account, the number of persons thus arrested was one hundred and sixty-eight. Several hundred, whose criminality was ascertained to be of an inferior degree, were released for the present. These have generally made confessions of their guilt.

Great caution has been exercised in making these arrests, and, notwithstanding the large number, it is believed that no innocent person is now in custody. The prisoners will be held for regular trial in the judicial tribunals of the United States.

As soon as it appeared that the authorities of the United States were about to take vigorous measures to enforce the law, many persons absconded, and there is good ground for supposing that all of such persons have violated the law. A full report of what has been done under this law will be submitted to Congress by the Attorney General.

In Utah there still remains a remnant of barbarism, repugnant to civilization, to decency, and to the laws of the United States. Territorial officers, however, have been found who are willing to perform their duty in a spirit of equity and with a due sense of the necessity of sustaining the majesty of the law. Neither polygamy nor any other violation of existing statutes will be permitted within the territory of the United States. It is not with the religion of the self-styled Saints that we are now dealing, but with their practices. They will be protected in the worship of God according to the dictates of their consciences, but they will not be permitted to violate the laws under the cloak of religion.

It may be advisable for Congress to consider what, in the execution of the laws against polygamy, is to be the status of plural wives and their offspring. The propriety of Congress passing an enabling act authorizing the territorial legislature of Utah to legitimize all children born prior to a time fixed in the act might be justified by its humanity to these innocent children. This is a suggestion only, and not a recommendation.

The policy pursued toward the Indians has resulted favorably, so far as can be judged from the limited time during which it has been in operation. Through the exertions of the various societies of Christians to whom has been intrusted the execution of the policy, and the board of commissioners authorized by the law of April 10, 1869, many tribes of Indians have been induced to settle upon reservations, to cultivate the soil, to perform productive labor of various kinds, and to partially accept civilization. They are being cared for in such a way, it is hoped, as to induce those still pursuing their old habits of life to embrace the only opportunity which is left them to avoid extermination.

I recommend liberal appropriations to carry out the Indian peace policy, not only because it is humane, Christian-like, and economical, but because it is right.

I recommend to your favorable consideration also the policy of granting a territorial government to the Indians in the Indian Territory west of Arkansas and Missouri and south of Kansas. In doing so, every right guaranteed to the Indian by treaty should be secured. Such a course might in time be the means of collecting most of the Indians now between the Missouri and the Pacific and south of the British possessions into one Territory or one State. The Secretary of the Interior has treated upon this subject at length, and I commend to you his suggestions.

I renew my recommendation that the public lands be regarded as a heritage to our children, to be disposed of only as required for occupation and to actual settlers. Those already granted have been in great part disposed of in such a way as to secure access to the balance by the hardy settler who may wish to avail himself of them, but caution should be exercised even in attaining so desirable an object.

Educational interest may well be served by the grant of the proceeds of the sale of public lands to settlers. I do not wish to be understood as recommending, in the least degree, a curtailment of what is being done by the General Government for the encouragement of education.

The report of the Secretary of the Interior, submitted with this, will give you all the information collected and prepared for publication in regard to the census taken during the year 1870; the operations of the Bureau of Education for the year; the Patent Office; the Pension Office; the Land Office; and the Indian Bureau.

The report of the Commissioner of Agriculture gives the operations of his Department for the year. As agriculture is the ground-work of our prosperity, too much importance cannot be attached to the labors of this Department. It is in the hands of an able head, with able assistants, all zealously devoted to introduce into the agricultural productions of the nation all useful products adapted to any of the various climates and soils of our vast territory, and to giving all useful information as to the method of cultivation, the plants, cereals, and other products adapted to particular localities. Quietly, but surely, the Agricultural Bureau is working a great national good, and if liberally supported, the more widely its influence will be extended and the less dependent we shall be upon the products of foreign countries.

The subject of compensation to the heads of Bureaus and officials holding positions of responsibility, and requiring ability and character to fill properly, is one to which your attention is invited. But few of the officials receive a compensation equal to the respectable support of a family, while their duties are such as to involve millions of interest. In private life services demand compensation equal to the services rendered. A wise economy would dictate the same rule in the Government service.

I have not given the estimates for the support of Government for the ensuing year, nor the comparative statement between the expenditures for the year just passed and the one just preceding, because all these figures are contained in the accompanying reports, or in those presented directly to Congress. These estimates have my approval.

More than six years having elapsed since the last hostile gun was fired between the armies then arrayed against each other—one for the perpetuation, the other for the destruction of the Union—it may well be considered whether it is not now time that the disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment should be removed. That amendment does not exclude the ballot, but only imposes the disability to hold offices upon certain classes. When the purity of the ballot is secure, majorities are sure to elect officers reflecting the views of the majority. I do not see the advantage or propriety of excluding men from office merely because they were, before the rebellion, of standing and character sufficient to be elected to positions requiring them to take oaths to support the Constitution, and admitting to eligibility those entertaining precisely the same views, but of less standing in their communities. It may be said that the former violated an oath, while the latter did not. The latter did not have it in their power to do so. If they had taken this oath it cannot be doubted they would have broken it as did the former class. If there are any great criminals, distinguished above all others for the part they took in opposition to the Government, they might, in the judgment of Congress, be excluded from such an amnesty.

This subject is submitted for your careful consideration.

The condition of the Southern States is, unhappily, not such as all true patriotic citizens would like to see. Social ostracism for opinion's sake, personal violence or threats toward persons entertaining political views opposed to those entertained by the majority of the old citizens, prevents immigration and the flow of much-needed capital into the States lately in rebellion. It will be a happy condition of the country when the old citizens of these States will take an interest in public affairs, promulgate ideas honestly entertained, vote for men representing their views, and tolerate the same freedom of expression and ballot in those entertaining different political convictions.

Under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 21, 1871, a territorial government was organized in the District of Columbia. Its results have thus far fully realized the expectations of its advocates. Under the direction of the territorial officers, a system of improvements has been inaugurated, by means of which Washington is rapidly becoming a city worthy of the nation's capital. The citizens of the District having voluntarily taxed themselves to a large amount for the purpose of contributing to the adornment of the seat of Government, I recommend liberal appropriations on the part of Congress in order that the Government may bear its just share of the expense of carrying out a judicious system of improvements.

By the great fire in Chicago, the most important of the Government buildings in that city were consumed. Those burned had already become inadequate to the wants of the Government in that growing city, and, looking to the near future, were totally inadequate. I recommend therefore that an appropriation be made immediately to purchase the remainder of the square on which the burned buildings stood, provided it can be purchased at a fair valuation, or provided that the legislature of Illinois will pass a law authorizing its condemnation for Government purposes; and also an appropriation of as much money as can properly be expended toward the erection of new buildings during this fiscal year.

The number of immigrants ignorant of our laws, habits, &c., coming into our country annually has become so great, and the impositions practiced upon them so numerous and flagrant, that I suggest congressional action for their protection. It seems to me a fair subject of legislation by Congress. I cannot now state as fully as I desire the nature of the complaints made by immigrants of the treatment they receive, but will endeavor to do so during the session of Congress, particularly if the subject should receive your attention.

It has been the aim of the Administration to enforce honesty and efficiency in all public offices. Every public servant who has violated the trust placed in him has been proceeded against with all the rigor of the law. If bad men have secured places it has been the fault of the system established by law and custom for making appointments, or the fault of those who recommend for Government positions persons not sufficiently well known to them personally, or who give letters indorsing the characters of office-seekers without a proper sense of the grave responsibility which such a course devolves upon them. A civil service reform which can correct this abuse is much desired. In mercantile pursuit, the business-man who gives a letter of recommendation to a friend, to enable him to obtain credit from a stranger, is regarded as morally responsible for the integrity of his friend, and his ability to meet his obligations. A reformatory law which would enforce this principle against all indorsers of persons for public place would insure great caution in making recommendations. A salutary lesson has been taught the careless and the dishonest public servant in the great number of prosecutions and convictions of the last two years.

It is gratifying to notice the favorable change which is taking place throughout the country in bringing to punishment those who have proven recreant to the trusts confided to them, and in elevating to public office none but those who possess the confidence of the honest and the virtuous, who, it will always be found, comprise the majority of the community in which they live.

In my message to Congress one year ago, I urgently recommended a reform in the civil service of the country. In conformity with that recommendation, Congress, in the ninth section of "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, gave the necessary authority to the Executive to inaugurate a civil service reform, and placed upon him the responsibility of doing so. Under the authority of said act I convened a board of gentlemen, eminently qualified for the work, to devise rules and regulations to effect the needed reform. Their labors are not yet complete, but it is believed that they will succeed in devising a plan that can be adopted to the great relief of the Executive, the heads of Departments, and members of Congress, and which will redound to the true interest of the public service. At all events, the experiment shall have a fair trial.

I have thus hastily summed up the operations of the Government during the last year, and made such suggestions as occur to me to be proper for your consideration. I submit them with a confidence that your combined action will be wise, statesmanlike, and in the best interests of the whole country.

Foreign letters.

Washington, December 12, 1870.

The frequent requests to the Department of State to transmit private letters through Government dispatch-bags render it necessary to give notice that no private, unofficial letters will be transmitted through such bags, except those to or from persons actually in the diplomatic or consular service of the United States, or to or from members of their families.

All other unofficial letters received at the Department, from or for any foreign country, will be sent to the General Post-Office.

HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

Circular No. 6.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 13, 1871.

To the several diplomatic and consular officers and dispatch agents of the United States :

The following matter, only, may be hereafter transmitted in the Government pouches to the United States :

1st. Official correspondence, and all other matter addressed to the President or Vice-President of the United States, or to either of the Executive Departments of this Government, or the heads thereof, or to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

2d. Letters, newspapers, and printed matter intended for either of the Assistant Secretaries, the Assistant Postmasters General, or the Assistant Attorneys General, or for any of the clerks of this Department.

3d. The private correspondence of the officials of the United States abroad, and of the members of their families, addressed as provided in paragraph 346 of the Consular Regulations.

4th. Matter transmitted at the request of any foreign government to its representative in the United States.

Except as above, no matter will be sent in the pouches.

From the United States nothing will be sent in the pouches except through this Department.

HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

Circular No. 8.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, May 1, 1871.

SIR: Abuses which have heretofore occurred in granting protection from the local authorities in eastern countries, and especially in the Turkish dominions, to persons who, in the opinion of this Department, had no claim thereto, render it advisable that the legations and consulates in that quarter should, once in six months, report the number, names, and occupations of the persons to whom, during the six months preceding, such protection may have been given, or by whom it may have been claimed. You will so report accordingly, immediately upon the receipt of this circular, in regard to the _____ at _____. Such report will in future be expected to be made at the beginning of every January and July.

It is believed that sound policy dictates the utmost scrutiny and caution in extending the protection of this Government to any persons abroad who may not be citizens of the United States. Should that policy be adopted and scrupulously adhered to, those to whom protection may really be due may expect it to be efficient.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH,

Secretary of State.

To _____,

Circular.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, May 2, 1871.

The United States have concluded treaties regulating the rights persons who have emigrated from the dominions of one of the contracting parties, and have been naturalized in those of the other party, with the following powers: Austria and Hungary, Baden, Bavaria, Belgium, Great Britain, Hesse Darmstadt, Mexico, the North German Union, and Wurtemberg.

These treaties provide, in general, that subjects of these powers, respectively, who have become naturalized citizens of the United States, and who have resided, uninterruptedly, within the United States for five years, shall be held to be citizens of the United States, and shall be treated as such.

The treaties with Belgium and Great Britain do not require a residence of five years within the United States, but recognize citizenship where under our laws it has been acquired after a shorter period.

The exceptions to the requisition of five years' residence, under our laws, are: 1. That of soldiers who have been honorably discharged from the armies of the United States. Such persons, being of the age of twenty-one years and upward, may be naturalized without any previous declaration of intention to become citizens, and without being required to prove more than one year's residence in the United States previous to their application. (See section 21 of act of Congress of July 17, 1862, 12 Statutes at Large, page 597.) There is an erroneous impression prevalent, to some extent, that the mere facts of service and discharge operate as a naturalization, whereas they are only part of the evidence on which naturalization may be granted. 2. The children of persons duly naturalized, being under twenty-one years of age at the time of their parents being so naturalized, are, if dwelling within the United States, considered as citizens. (Act of April 14, 1802.) 3. Persons born out of the United States, whose fathers, at the time of such birth, were citizens of the United States; and, 4. Women married to citizens of the United States. (Act of February 10, 1855.) It has been decided (7 Wallace, 496) that the state of marriage confers citizenship on the wife, whether the citizenship of the husband existed at the time of the marriage or was acquired subsequently. With the exception of Belgium and Great Britain, both naturalization and five years' continuous residence are required by the treaties as necessary conditions to the character and privileges of American citizenship.

In the explanatory protocols annexed to some of the treaties, it is expressly stated that the words "resided uninterruptedly, are to be understood, not of a continued bodily presence, but in the legal sense; and therefore a transient absence, a journey or the like, by no means interrupts the period of five years" contemplated by such treaties. It is presumed that this construction will be accepted by the other powers which have not in terms announced their assent thereto. On the other hand, where a minor of Prussian birth had enlisted in our Army, been honorably discharged, and then returned to Germany, resided in the house of his father (being still a minor) nearly a year, having during that time accepted a German passport for the purpose of enabling him to go to another province to perfect himself in his trade, it was recently (January 21, 1871) held by the Attorney General that this was such an interruption of his residence as to deprive him of protection from military service, notwithstanding his naturalization in the United States. Each case must be judged upon its own circumstances.

It is material to observe that according to the opinion of the Attorney General in the case above mentioned, the recitations contained in the record of naturalization, as to residence, &c., are not conclusive upon either this or a foreign government; but that when such recitals are shown, by clear evidence, to be erroneous, they are to be disregarded.

The treaties referred to generally contain a provision that "the declaration of an intention to become a citizen of one or the other country, has not, for either party, the effect of naturalization." Independently of the treaties, and long before them, the issuing a passport to a person who has not completed his naturalization was and remains prohibited under penalties by act of Congress.

The treaties in general provide that if a subject of the respective powers who has been naturalized in the United States renews his residence in the country of his original allegiance, without the intent to return, he shall be held to have renounced his naturalization in the United States. The intention not to return may be held to exist when the person naturalized in the one country resides in the other country more than two years, but this presumption may be rebutted by evidence to the contrary.

The treaties in general further provide that "a naturalized citizen of the one party on return to the territory of the other party remains liable to trial and punishment for an action punishable by the laws of his original country, and committed before his emigration—saving always the limitation established by the laws of his original country;" some of them, for example, Baden, Bavaria, and Wurtemberg, add "or other remission of liability to punishment." This Department cannot undertake to give information in respect to the statutes of limitation on prosecutions for criminal or military offenses, or other remissions of punishment allowed by the domestic jurisprudence of foreign powers, or any of them. Citizens interested in the question must seek such information elsewhere.

The ministers of justice and of the interior, of the North German Union, announced by circular that the punishable action committed by the unauthorized emigration of a subject shall not be made the ground for a penal prosecution upon the return of such person to his former country, after an absence of not less than five years and his naturalization in the United States. A similar intention is declared in the explanatory protocol accompanying the treaty with Bavaria, and it may reasonably be expected that the other powers with whom we have treaties on this subject will construe them with the same liberality.

In respect to prosecutions for the failure to discharge military obligations—which are the principal cause of apprehension to naturalized citizens visiting their native country—the following provisions, in substance, with but slight verbal variations not regarded as material, are contained in the treaties with Austria and Hungary, Baden, Hesse Darmstadt, and Wurtemberg, or in the explanatory protocols accompanying the same, viz :

A naturalized citizen of the United States is liable to trial and punishment for the non-fulfillment of military duty according to the laws of those countries, respectively—

"1. If he has emigrated after he, on the occasion of the draft from those owing military duty, has been enrolled as a recruit for service in the standing army.

"2. If he has emigrated after he stood in service under the flag or had a leave of absence only for a limited time.

"3. If, having a leave of absence for an unlimited time, or belonging to the reserve or to the militia, he has emigrated after having received a call into service, or after a public proclamation requiring his appearance, or after war has broken out."

With these exceptions the powers last enumerated have in effect pledged themselves that their former subjects, naturalized in the United States, will not, on visiting their original country, be held, subsequently, to military service nor remain liable to trial and punishment for non-fulfillment of military duty.

While this Government can give no guaranty on the subject, it may reasonably be expected that the other powers with whom we have treaties, will be desirous of conforming, so far as practicable to the rule last stated.

It is to be observed, however, that the superserviceable zeal or ignorance of local officials, civil and military, may often tempt them to cause arrests, and institute prosecutions which they suppose to be justified, if not required, by the laws of their country. Such proceedings may necessitate an appeal to the judicial tribunals, a necessity which is not the ground for national complaint or reclamation. They may even require the invocation of the dispensing or pardoning power of the supreme government. In either case our citizens are exposed to the hazard of arrest and military confinement, delay, and the expense of legal proceedings.

In respect to those countries with which we have no treaty stipulation on citizenship and naturalization, this Department must speak with much reserve. It cannot undertake to give an interpretation to foreign laws, even if the entire text of them was in its possession. The construction of those laws belongs to the judicial tribunals of the countries in which they are promulgated. It must be understood, therefore, that what follows is collected from authors of good repute and other unofficial sources, and is given only as probably authentic, but without affirming its accuracy. With this qualification it may be stated:

FRANCE.—It seems to be the better opinion of French jurists that a French subject can at any time, by his own act, and without express permission of his government, transfer his allegiance to any country which consents to naturalize him. By so doing, or by acceptance, unauthorized by the head of the state, of public functions conferred by a foreign government, or taking military service under a foreign government without such authorization, he, as the Code Napoleon terms it, “loses the quality of a Frenchman.” 2d. No foreigner can serve in the armies of France; a Frenchman, therefore, naturalized in the United States cannot be held to the performance of military service in France. 3d. After three years from the date of the naturalization of a Frenchman in the United States, any liability to military service is considered removed by lapse of time. If, therefore, a Frenchman is conscripted, and fails to respond to the requirement, he will not be held to accountability for such dereliction of duty (insoumission) after the lapse of three years from his naturalization. 4th. To obtain exemption, however, the late imperial government required, (see dispatch of Mr. Dix to Mr. Fish, No. 344, May 14, 1869.) a. That a Frenchman naturalized abroad, if charged with a failure to perform military service, should go before a civil tribunal and show by properly-authenticated papers that his naturalization was in conformity with the laws of the country in which it was effected. If the tribunal is satisfied on this point it declares him to have lost “the quality of a Frenchman.” b. This decision of the court must be presented to the council of war of the department, and if three years have elapsed subsequently to naturalization, the accused is to be discharged; otherwise he may be punished by imprisonment, said rarely to exceed thirty days. In any event he may be subjected to the costs of the proceedings. These rules are not known to have been changed since 1869.

Italy, Spain, Norway, and Greece follow substantially the Code Napoleon, and treat nationality as lost by naturalization in a foreign country, or by entering without royal license into its civil or military service.

In the ultra-marine provinces of Spain no one considered a foreigner by its law is subject to military service, and foreigners, except the domiciled who have their own houses, are exempt from personal service in the municipal guards, but the latter are subject to the charges for furnishing lodging and transportation. (Decree of the Constituent Cortes, proclaimed July 4, 1870.)

In Italy, by the army law of 1855, naturalization abroad, without the King's permission, does not exempt from conscription. The son of an alien who was born within the kingdom, and established his domicile uninterruptedly for ten years, is considered a citizen, and must inscribe his name on the levy list of the commune in which he resides; but residence for commercial purposes is not sufficient to constitute a domicile. The sons of a citizen, naturalized in a foreign country, born in such country before the naturalization of the father, must be inscribed on the levy list of their last place of residence in Italy.

A Russian subject cannot emigrate nor become naturalized in a foreign country without the permission of the Emperor. If he does so, he commits an offense for which he may be banished forever from the Russian dominions. If this penalty is applied he may thus of course escape conscription. If not, there is no guaranty against his being compelled to stand the chances of the lot for the annual supply of recruits.

A subject of the Ottoman Empire cannot divest himself of that character without the authority of the imperial government. If, without such authority, he accepts a foreign naturalization, it is treated as of no effect, and he is still considered and dealt with as in all respects an Ottoman subject. Every person who obtains naturalization abroad, or enters a foreign military service, without the permission of the Emperor, may be declared to have forfeited his character of Ottoman subject, and in that case is altogether interdicted from returning to the Ottoman Empire. The children, even minors, of an Ottoman subject naturalized abroad do not follow the condition of the father, but remain Ottoman subjects. (Law of January 19, 1869; see dispatch of Mr. Morris, No. 299, February 10, 1869.)

A naturalized citizen desiring a passport may address State Department, Passport Bureau, Washington, D. C., transmitting his certificate of naturalization, (it will be returned with the passport,) and he must state, under oath, that he is the identical person described in the certificate presented.

The application should be accompanied by a description of the person, stating the following particulars, viz:

Age, — years; stature, — feet — inches, (English measure;) forehead, —; eyes, —; nose, —; mouth, —; chin, —; hair, —; complexion, —; face, —.

When husband, wife, and minor children expect to travel together, a single passport for the whole will suffice. For any other person in the party a separate passport will be required. Passports are now issued without charge.

The oath of allegiance to the United States, as prescribed by law, will be required in all cases. It may be taken before a notary public under his signature and official seal. When there is no notary in the place, the affidavit may be made before a justice of the peace, or other officer authorized to administer oaths.

Circular No. 11.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 16, 1871.

GENTLEMEN: His Excellency, the President of the Swiss Confederation, has expressed to this Department, through the minister of the United States accredited to that government, a wish that you would severally extend your protection to Swiss citizens who may desire it and who may be sojourning at places where there are no diplomatic or consular representatives of that republic.

This Government has, on more than one occasion, upon the request of friendly powers, given to its diplomatic and consular representatives permission to take upon themselves, with the consent of the government within whose jurisdiction they reside, the function of representing those powers at places where the latter had no such officers. It has understood this to amount simply to the granting of the services of our agents, with their own consent, to meet what has ordinarily been a fortuitous and temporary exigency of the friendly government. When this function is accepted, the diplomatic or consular officer becomes the agent of the foreign government as to the duties he may perform for its citizens or subjects; he becomes responsible to it for his discharge of those duties; and that government is alone responsible for his acts in relation thereto.

With this understanding of the obligations, you are authorized, with the consent of the authorities of the country or place where you officially reside, to extend such protection to Swiss citizens whenever it may be required or needed. It is expected, however, that, in complying with this authority, you will exercise due discretion, and will be careful not to give just cause of offense in any quarter.

I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

SIR: *

The policy of Prussia toward Rome had been changed, he said, within the last six weeks. The change was due to Prince Bismarck. It was now decided to resist strongly the Ultramontane party, and they had accordingly secured for Bavaria, in place of Count Bray, a minister who sided with Dr. Döllinger. Of what the future of the protesting movement might be, he had not been able to form an opinion. It required great faith and earnestness to secede from an established church and form a new sect, and he was inclined to doubt whether, of such faith, the supply in these times was over-abundant. He intimated that the success of the Austrian policy of Count Hohenwart would be a misfortune, not alone in its influence on the Roman question, but in its bearings upon the Germans of Austria. On both of these questions Count Beust's position was approved by the German government. I may here remark that the importance of the pending election seems to be acknowledged alike by the German centralists, who hold sacredly to the existing constitution as involving their supremacy, although in a minority, and by the disaffected nationalities whom President Hohenwart is endeavoring to unite, with the view of amending the constitution in a constitutional way; with the view of combining an extension of provincial legislative autonomy with an increased centralization of national power in a Reichsrath where all shall be equally represented.

Hitherto the immovable resolution of the Czechs and the disaffection of the Poles have defeated all efforts at success in this direction; but Count Hohenwart has had the assistance in this cabinet of Messrs. Jirecek and Habietinek, as representatives of Bohemia, and of Grocholski, on the part of Galicia. Of seventeen provincial diets or landtags, eight have been dissolved by Count Hohenwart, the Emperor having the right to dissolve any diet at his pleasure, and after these new diets have been chosen, the entire number will elect deputies to the new Reichsrath.

Should any landtag refuse or omit to elect deputies, the Emperor can order a direct election by the original election. The seeming skill, caution, and confidence with which Count Hohenwart has quietly developed this policy, has aroused the fears and temper of his opponents; and the supposed effects of a two-third majority able to amend the constitution upon the German supremacy in Austria, may explain the anxiety exhibited by the Baron, when the subject was alluded to. It may also explain the desire of Count de Beust, as the foreign minister, to stand aloof from such a contest, and to aspire, as he said, to at least a temporary ignorance of the interior politics of the Austrian half of the empire.

The opposition to the Count of the Czecks and clericals, to which he alluded, may perhaps dispose him to regard without displeasure the strong desire on the part of Prussia that he should not be displaced from his post. * * *

The general impression among the diplomats seems to be, that whatever may have been the propositions made to the Count de Beust, looking towards a closer alliance, the Prince Bismarck's diplomacy in this direction has not as yet been a success, whatever may be accomplished at Salzburg; and the Baron's remarks gave me the same impression, with an additional idea, that, while they had nothing to complain of as regards the Count's friendliness and courtesies, they were still in doubt, perhaps not unreasonably, of his devotion to Prussia and of what might be his foreign policy.

The relations of Austria and Russia are, as every one feels, not cordial; but then, as Count Beust cheerfully remarked some two months ago, "they are no worse than usual;" and Austria is so accustomed to external complications and internal muddles, that even if they chanced to be rather worse than usual, it would not necessarily cause a sensation. There appears, however, to be at this moment a general feverishness, a want of confidence, and an indefinite expectation of another great war, without knowing when or whence it will come. A rumor, whether true or false, that the Prince Gortschakoff was to meet Thiers in Switzerland, and another, that the Italian minister had been invited to Salzburg, have tended to increase the excitement. A belief obtains that France is burning for revenge and will seek to elude the payment of the balance of the indemnity; that Russia is arming with the greatest rapidity and on an immense scale; and I am told that the Russian people are awakening to the fact that the policy of Prince Gortschakoff in standing guard for Prussia, while France was being crushed and dismembered, was at once a crime and a blunder; that she now finds she has assisted to destroy her natural ally, and to convert into a giant her natural foe; that what she has gained in the Black Sea was gained in a manner that has impaired the moral prestige of her diplomacy, while it affords no sort of compensation; and that, in fact, Russia stands to-day towards Prussia as France stood towards the same power, when she saw, as the result of her intrigues, the defeat of Sadowa. * * *

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Vienna, September 10, 1871. (Received September 27.)

SIR: In my No. 346, of September 6, * * * I quoted the remarks of a diplomat in regard to the marked change in the policy of Germany on the Romish question, which during the last few weeks had been inaugurated by the Prince Bismarck; and to the substitution, in consequence, of a new prime minister for Bavaria, of the Döllinger school, in place of the Count Bray, who has just returned to his post as the representative of Bavaria at this court. An official communication lately made by the Bavarian minister of public worship to the archbishop of Munich exhibits the cold character of this new policy against the clerical party, and throws light upon the views then expressed on the importance to Germany of a corresponding policy on the part of the Austrian ministry, and the anxiety lest the clericals should secure a predominance in the then pending elections. The Bavarian government, in this document, assume, as did the Count de Beust in his correspondence on the Roman question, both before and after the adoption of the dogma of papal infallibility, that the dogma introduced a new doctrine into the church, at variance alike with the rights of sovereign governments and with the rights of Catholics; a doctrine which, if acquiesced in, would change entirely the olden relation between Church and State, and which would inevitably compel, on the part of Austro-Hungary, the repeal of the concordat. The Bavarian government, following the example set by Austria, upholds the principle that the archbishops and bishops are subject to the laws of the State, and that they have violated these laws in the publication of the dogma. The importance attributed to this document as throwing the whole force of the government of Bavaria, with the approval of the court of Berlin, against the papal party, and in favor of that headed by Dr. Döllinger, who have assumed the title of "Old Catholics," as indicating their opposition to the new dogma, that I append a translation of its more essential passages as I find them in the "German Correspondent" of Berlin of the 6th September. There are indications that the "Old Catholics" do not propose to act simply on the defensive, but that they are thinking seriously of attempting the inauguration of a series of reforms, which, if carried out by combined efforts in Austria, Germany, Switzerland, and Belgium, would result in a new reformation, and perhaps open the way for their qualified union with the Church of England. Among the reforms proposed and accepted at a meeting at Linz, again approved at Heidelberg, and which are to be presented for final approbation at a great meeting soon to be held at Munich, are the following:

1. Each community to have the right to choose its own priests.
2. Priests to be sufficiently paid by the community.
3. Compulsory celibacy must cease.
4. The chapters must be dissolved.
5. Masses and the service of the church to be spoken and read in the common language of the province.
6. No separate payments for masses, burials, or baptisms.
7. Inequalities between the burials of rich and poor must cease.
8. Auricular confession must cease.

9. Pilgrimages, processions, and begging missions must cease.
10. The worship of pictures, statues, and images must cease.
11. The relic swindle (religmin schwindel) must be discontinued and be proceeded against by the State.

Should this programme be accomplished, by the assistance of the Prince Bismarck, it would go far to establish the parallel suggested by the German minister between that diplomat and Martin Luther. The result of the Austrian elections is announced in favor of the Hohenwart ministry, securing for that minister the necessary two-thirds in the new Reichsrath to accomplish the amendments of the constitution. This result has been obtained by an alliance between the clerical party and the Czechs, promoted, as it is freely charged by the German press, by the active influence of the government, through its officials and bureaux; and the dissatisfaction of the Austro-Germans is intense. It seems to me not improbable, that the completeness of Count Hohenwart's success may naturally incline him to a policy rather more conciliatory than has been expected, and that the last imperial conference at Salzburg may not be without its influence in deciding his course. To that conference the minister president was invited, as was also the Count Andrassy, neither of them having attended at Gastein.

* * * * *

One thing would seem quite clear, and that is, that the Prussian Emperor and his suite have returned to Berlin, fully persuaded that the Austrian court are prepared to forget that there ever was a battle of Sadowa, or a treaty of Prague, with secret conventions, making it a dead letter. The general impression is, that Russia has looked with jealousy upon the two conferences. The Russian minister, Mr. Novikoff, paid me a visit on the 7th instant, to thank me for a newspaper-slip I had sent him, announcing the preparations in New York for the reception of the Prince Alexis. He had returned to Vienna only the night before, after an absence of some weeks, and asked me whether there was much excitement in Vienna about the conferences. I said that there seemed to be much less anxiety on the subject than I had found on my return to Vienna a week before, and that the impression was gaining ground that, on the part of Austria, it was a matter of courtesy, and that Beust had not entered into any agreement. He said, not in writing.

[Translation.]

Documents from the Minister of Worship in Bavaria against the dogma of infallibility.

BERLIN, September 6, 1871.

The intentions of the new Bavarian government, in their dealings with the partisans of the dogma of papal infallibility, are succinctly and perspicuously explained in the official communication lately made by the Bavarian minister of public worship to the archbishop of Munich. This document opens with some introductory observations, showing the complete unanimity which reigns among the different members of the government as to the demeanor imposed on the state by the most recent proceedings in the Catholic Church; after which it proceeds to reply to the complaints addressed by the archbishop to the King of Bavaria. The prelate had maintained that the design of the parties who opposed the resolutions of the Vatican council on 18th July, 1870, was solely to excite public opinion against the Church and her exercise of the sacred office of instructress, thus provoking a general apostasy, to be followed in due time by a persecution of the faithful; and that such assaults on the rights of the church would at the same time endanger social order in the country and the safety of the state. To these declarations of the archbishop the official communication in question makes the following reply:

"Though the Bavarian government fully appreciates the value of perfect harmony between the state and the church, and lays the greatest stress on the maintenance of friendly relations between them, its paramount duty nevertheless is to safeguard the rights of the state. These rights would be undoubtedly infringed were the resolutions of 18th July, 1870, to be published, in disregard of the constitutional provisions touching the placetum regium. Though the archbishop, in his pastoral of 14th April, energetically insists on the innocuousness of the Vatican resolutions, it is the conviction of the government that they cannot be treated with indifference, and that the creed of the Catholic Church is essentially altered by the promulgation of the dogma of infallibility. It is, indeed, alleged by the episcopate that the conciliar decrees have only elevated into a dogma what had been always believed in the Catholic Church, but against this allegation the voices of many eminent Catholics have been raised. It admits of no doubt that the important modification in the teachings of the church, which the acceptance of the new doctrine implies, totally changes the relations of the church to the state; and the question which now awaits solution is to know what the attitude of the government to the new dogma shall be. In normal circumstances the State sedulously refrains from all interference in matters of faith, but in the case before us it is incumbent on the government to come to a decision. With the mere declaration of the bishops (some of whom have recanted their previous opinions) that papal infallibility was always taught and believed in the church, that the truth of the dogma was not called in question in Rome, but merely the opportuneness of the definition, and that the infallibility of the Pope implies no danger to the State, the government cannot rest satisfied; it must not and dare not subordinate the political administration to the judgment of the church, especially as it has to protect the interests of its other subjects who hold a different faith. After a conscientious examination of the copious materials at its disposal, the government is convinced that those judge rightly who contend that a great innovation has been introduced into the doctrine of the Catholic Church, and that the state must take its measures accordingly. To do this the government has an incontestable right, since the innovation is of such a character as not only to affect the internal relations of the Catholic Church and alter its position to the State, but even to menace the fundamental principles of the Bavarian constitution, and the civil rights of non-Catholic citizens. It may be objected that the same danger formerly existed when the infallibility of the church was exercised in œcumenical councils, in conjunction with the Pope; but it was really a very different case. As infallibility was considered an attribute belonging to the collective church alone, and having for its exponent the more or less unanimous opinion of the prelates assembled for free deliberation and discussion in an œcumenical council, there was much less danger of its perversion and abuse, than when it is independently and exclusively wielded by the head of the church. It may, of course, be maintained that the Popes will restrict themselves to the domain of faith and abstain from encroaching on the sphere of the state; but this we have no right to assume. The dogma of infallibility directly threatens the concordat existing by law, and with it the constitution of the state. Hence, it is the duty of the government to obviate the mischievous consequences of this ecclesiastical innovation, and the placetum regium places the legal means in its hands. The bishops have already transgressed the laws of the country, by disregarding the special provisions of the constitution, when the placetum was expressly refused them. But the direct tendency of such an open manifestation of contempt for the Bavarian laws is to diminish their authority in the eyes of the people; and the declaration of the archbishops and bishops on this point cannot weaken or alter this fact. They arrogate to themselves a sort of sovereign position—the position of an equal and independent power; they assume the character of a contracting party in a state treaty, and place themselves on a footing which the state can never concede to them. As to the pretense that the placetum regium is required only for ecclesiastical ordinances which concern the affairs of the state, but not for such as treat of mere matters of belief, the constitution provides that all laws and ordinances emanating from the ecclesiastical authorities, whether they regard matters of faith or matters of discipline, shall in no case be promulgated till the royal authorization has been obtained. The document terminates with the following words:

"The menace against the fundamental rights of the Bavarian state, which is implied in the dogma of the personal infallibility of the head of the church, and the violation of the constitution involved in the disregard of the placetum regium, force the Government to resort to measures which it would willingly have avoided. It will therefore refuse its aid and co-operation in the promulgation of the new dogma, and in the execution of injunctions issued by the spiritual authorities with regard to its recognition and establishment. The Government will firmly abide by the principle that the steps which the ecclesiastical authorities may decide on taking against those members of the Catholic Church who reject the new dogma will affect in no degree the civil and political rights of the parties concerned. Should it be deemed necessary, further measures will be adopted by the state to protect the independence of the civil jurisdiction from ecclesiastical coercion."

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Vienna, September 18, 1871. (Received October 4.)

SIR: I have already advised you of the result of the recent elections in favor of the policy of the Count Hohenwart, looking to an extension of the rights of the provinces, and such a revision of the cases of representation as would increase the electoral power of the various nationalities, and diminish, proportionally, that of the Austro-Germans. It was announced that an analysis of the votes in the new Diets showed that the new Reichsrath would be composed as follows, those marked "federalists" belonging to the ministerial party, in favor of amending the constitution, and those designated as "constitutionalists" being chiefly, if not altogether, Germans, in favor of retaining it as it is.

Provinces.	Federalists.	Constitutionals.

An amendment of the constitution, requiring a vote of two-thirds, or 134, this estimate gave the government five votes more than was requisite.

The dissatisfaction, forcibly expressed by the Austro-German press, had rather prepared the public to be but slightly surprised at learning, upon the assembling of the new Diets at Brünn, Linz, and Laibach, that the German delegates had absented themselves, but the country seemed scarcely prepared for the bold course upon which they have decided at Prague, and the issue of which is still in the future.

The Diet of Prague was opened on the 14th September by the Count Chotek, the late Austro-Hungarian envoy at St. Petersburg, and now temporary governor of Bohemia, who presented to the assembly the Prince George Loblowitz, the new grand marshal, who concluded an address in the Czechish language with these words:

"May the resolution of this assembly contribute to the well being of our country and to that of all the other countries united under the scepter of our Emperor and King."

The prince then said in German:

"In saluting this assembly in the two languages, I do not think I am observing an idle formality, but I think it a duty thus to act because I regard the observance of the equality of rights of the two peoples inhabiting this country, in the course of the deliberations of this assembly, as the first and the most important duty of him who presides at these sittings. I do not deny that I have belonged to a political party, but I promise henceforth to belong only to the service of my country."

The governor then read the imperial message, of which I append a translation. The passage in which the Emperor recognized the rights of the Kingdom of Bohemia, and promised to sanction them anew by the oath of his coronation, called forth enthusiastic and prolonged applause. The imperial message renewed in increased force the displeasure of the so-called constitutional press, and the sheets that sustain the ministry declare that their articles exhibit more of passion than of calm, serious, and impartial judgment. The Freundenblatt, for instance, is quoted as saying :

The Count Hohenwart should not be astonished if his projects of laws relating to modification in the provincial statutes and the electoral law are condemned and rejected without any examination.

The day after the delivery of the imperial message the German delegates developed their plan of operations.

They quitted the assembly, having addressed a declaration to the president, which contained these expressions :

The text of the imperial rescript places the Kingdom of Bohemia outside of the framework of the constitution, since according to the text itself, it no more imposes obligations on this country, but only upon the other kingdoms and countries of the monarchy, and consequently the constitutional rights of the inhabitants of Bohemia cease to be recognized. In view of this inadmissible basis that the government takes as its point of departure, we have reason to fear that it may be the desire to encroach upon the constitution in order to favor a policy which is not founded upon history, and that we can never recognize a policy the effect of which will be to break the national bands that unite the Germans in Austria; a policy, in fine, which compromises the force of the empire in giving to this country an exceptional situation, and places in danger the peace and the prosperity of the country in troubling the national equilibrium. We will never approve, and we cannot approve, a policy which is in contradiction with our Austrian convictions, with our sentiments and our national interests, and with our most sacred duties.

According to the newspaper reports, the declaration of the Germans was received in the Diet with bursts of laughter by the Czechs and Federalists. Three German deputies, one of them the Curé Platzer, declared that they were present by the votes of the electors, and they protested against the declaration of the centralists. The secession or abstention from the Diets and Reichsrath in past years by the Czechs and Poles was not too favorably regarded by the country, although it found a partial justification in the apology that the Czechs certainly had had no part in shaping the constitution, and had uniformly declined to recognize it.

"With the Austro-Germans," said a distinguished German to me, "the case is different; they have claimed to be the founders in Austria of constitutional government; they have enlogized it as a sacred thing; they have demanded acquiescence in the will of the majority, as the foundation of constitutional government, and the first time there is a constitutional majority against them they betray their own principles, and do the very thing they have condemned in others."

What the result is to be is doubtful; possibly some compromise, assisted by the influence of the German Empire, although how any compromise can now be proposed acceptable to the Czechs, who have the power in their own hands, and the pledged word of the Emperor, it is not easy to foresee. It is announced that Prince Hohenlohe is charged with the ceremonial preparations for the coronation at Prague, in the early part of the winter. What seems, for the time at least, an unfortunate feature of this procedure is, that it tends to revive, in all its narrowness and all its bigotry, that bane of Austrian politics, the doctrine of nationalities. The Germans, who were divided into conservatives and liberals, appear to be almost a unit against the other nationalities, and the lines are drawn, not according to principles, but to race. The greatest interest excited by the election is shown by the statement, that the number of votes cast was 23 per cent. larger than usual. Of the electors who voted in Vienna, 89 per cent. are announced as against the government.

The simple and straightforward policy for the Germans would seem to be, according to our American ideas, to accept the situation and then proceed to prove their superior intelligence and culture by raising issues upon which they could, in a little while, divide the national votes and secure for themselves a majority. This, as an eminent German admitted to me, would be their true course; but he did not think it would be adopted. He hoped for some satisfactory solution of the difficulty by the aid of the great proprietors in Bohemia, who, with Czechs estates and adopted Czechish names, are in fact German in their ideas and sympathies. I annex a translation of an article from the National Zeitung at Berlin, which appeared while the elections were still pending, and which shows the importance there attached to the policy of the ministry, as involving a continuance of the friendly relations between the empires established at Gastein and at Salzburg. It seems a curious exemplification of the remark sometimes made, that political crises constitute the normal state of Austria, that the money-market is not at all disturbed by the proceedings at Prague. Indeed, I am told that some of the stocks showed an upward tendency just after the announcement of the German secession, and that Austrian paper is rising in value, but the Austrian lottery loans have somewhat declined.

APPENDIX No. 1.

The imperial message to the diet of Prague.

TO THE DIET OF OUR KINGDOM OF BOHEMIA!

When by our ordinance of the 30th July, 1870, we convoked the diets of our kingdoms and countries, we were thereto decided by the grave events of which Europe had become the theater, and the development and incalculable bearing of which had demanded all our attention. Thanks to the Divine protection, we have succeeded in preserving in the midst of those events the blessings of peace, and now we can in all security devote ourselves to the task of consolidating the interior peace of the empire. Our first desire is to regulate in a manner just and satisfactory to all, the relations of our kingdom of Bohemia with the rest of the monarchy, of which the revision was promised by our rescript of the 25th of August, 1870. Considering the constitutional position of the crown of Bohemia, the glory and the power which it has afforded to us and our predecessors, considering besides the unshaken fidelity with which the population of Bohemia have always sustained the throne, we recognized willingly the rights of the kingdom, and we are ready to renew their acknowledgment by the oath of our coronation. We can no longer exempt ourselves from the solemn obligations which we have contracted in regard to our other kingdoms and countries by our diploma of the 20th October, 1866, by the fundamental laws of the 26th February, 1861, and of the 21st December, 1867, in fine by the oath taken on the occasion of our coronation to our kingdom of Hungary. We, therefore, take cognizance with satisfaction of the disposition expressed in the respectful addresses of the diet of the kingdom of Bohemia (of the 4th September and the 5th October, 1870) to place the demands of the country in harmony with the power of the empire, and with the legitimate exigencies of the other kingdoms and countries. It is in this sense that we invite the diet to devote itself to the work. We invite it to discuss in a spirit of moderation and of conciliation the manner in which it is advisable to regulate our kingdom of Bohemia, and to furnish us with a possibility of terminating, without violating the rights of our other kingdoms and countries, a constitutional conflict, the prolongation of which would gravely menace the interests of the faithful populations of our empire.

In charging our government to submit to the diet the new electoral system and a law for the protection of the two nationalities, we send to the diet our imperial and royal salutations.

FRANCIS JOSEPH.

APPENDIX No. 2.

[National Zeitung, Berlin.]

The elections in Austria.

The electoral movements in the German provinces of Austria are daily increasing in interest. The aggressive policy of the Hohenwart ministry is fulfilling a mission not intended by its authors; it is uniting the statesmen of the constitutional party, and purifying their policy from the petty secondary objects and constant collisions which have hitherto been the misfortune of that party, and have rendered fruitless the days of its rule.

We cannot yet see clearly the result of the elections, but if any gain should accrue to the government, it would only come from parties in whose eyes the open production of unconstitutional plans would not have injured the ministry; for beyond the Imperial House, and the nobility dependent upon it, the ministry can only count upon the support of those feudalists and ultramontanes, who are more inclined to assist the government in proportion to its hostility against Germanism and the constitution; there was no need for Count Hohenwart to conceal any of his plans from them. But the Germans are stirred up by the hostility of the ministry against them, and are united as they never were before. It is impossible to conceive a greater contrast than that between the last and the present elections; the uniting community of endangered interests has taken the place of personal wrangling, the finer shades of political opinion have disappeared; Rechbauer and Giskra, Kaisersfeld and Skene, the candidates of the towns, of landed property, and of the chambers of commerce, all solicit the suffrages of the electors under the same conditions and on the same programmes; and the electoral speeches of all the constitutional candidates exhibit a delightful harmony.

Full of significance are the words in which the old Deputy Skene again solicits the votes of his constituents. He says: "I am an Austrian, and abhor the policy of nationalities; but I must, unfortunately, expect that the conspiracy formed by the ministry against Germanism will have this consequence, that the Germans will be only national. When the time has come that the Germans are only national, then all parties in Austria will be outside the state." From the stand-point of the good Austrian patriot, the indictment against the "conspiracy" of the Hohenwart ministry could not be more strikingly formulated; but these words become still more important in the mouth of Deputy Skene, because they show in what way the opposite shades of opinion in the formerly divided party of the constitutional Germans arrive at the same point of union. We in Germany can very well understand the peculiar anxieties of the good Austrian patriots.

We, too, in the common interests of both empires, have most earnestly wished that the question of German nationality should not be stirred up in Austria. Whatever the more distant future may bring to pass, at present friendly relations between the two empires would be most serviceable to peace. We have, therefore, done all in our power to prevent a German nationality question in Austria from becoming the burning question immediately after the conclusion of peace with France. The Hohenwart ministry has deliberately, or from want of insight, introduced the dreaded question into politics at a very unsuitable time, for Europe is not yet sufficiently restored to peace to be able to bear without apprehension even a passing game with the dangerous question.

The most zealous efforts of diplomatists have little power over the national sympathies of peoples, which the present Austrian ministry so lightly inflames.

Whatever the foreign ministers may agree upon in their repeated interviews, for some time to come the relations between the two empires will be determined by the internal policy of Austria. Should the Hohenwart ministry succeed, with the aid of "successful" elections, in uniting the Germans of Austria into a national party outside the constitution, jealousy will be created which will be a bar to any friendship with Germany. The result of the elections will be decisive, not only as to the next stages of the constitution, but also as to the foreign relations of Austria.

BOLIVIA.

No. 4.

Mr. Markbreit to Mr. Fish.

No. 121.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Cochabamba. April 11, 1871. (Received June 13.)

SIR: Before leaving La Paz I received a letter dated London, February 16, from Colonel George E. Church, the manager of the Bolivian Steam Navigation Company for the navigation of the Marmore and Madeira Rivers and their tributaries, informing me that he was about to return to the United States, to make arrangements for the transportation to Bolivia of two iron steamboats and one steam-launch, (built in the United States.) At the time of writing, Colonel Church, although aware of the revolution which had broken out in this country, had not yet learned its result.

In view of the importance of this enterprise, not only to Bolivia and Brazil, but to the commerce of the world in general, and remembering the interest demonstrated by the Department, where in dispatch No. 6, of October 7, 1869, it instructed me to use my good offices (unofficially) with the Brazilian charge d'affaires in furtherance of said enterprise, I deemed it expedient to ascertain, if possible, the intentions of the new government relative to the same. Accordingly on the 31st ultimo, with this purpose in mind, I had an unofficial interview with Colonel Morales and his secretary general, in which the former expressed himself most heartily in favor of that enterprise, and of every undertaking tending to the development of the country.

At my request Colonel Morales directed his secretary general to address me an official note, which, although not in such strong terms as had been agreed upon, may nevertheless be of considerable service to Colonel Church, as it will convince his associates that the new Bolivian administration is disposed to lend its assistance in carrying out this undertaking. I may add that all the prominent men in the republic are earnest advocates of this navigation scheme, looking upon it as the natural outlet for the immense productions of their country, and as the only means of ridding themselves of constant revolutions and political disturbances.

I inclose herein a translation of the note referred to.

I am, &c.,

L. MARKBREIT.

SECRETARIATE GENERAL FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
La Paz, March 31, 1871.

SIR: In virtue of the verbal conference which has taken place between the undersigned and yourself, (U. S. H.,) relative to the inquiry which you were pleased to make concerning the intentions entertained by the (excelentísimo) government of Bolivia in reference to the protection of the enterprises for the fluvial navigation of the eastern territory, His Excellency the Provisional President of the Republic has directed me to reply to you that he finds himself (que se halla) animated by the most patriotic sentiments to protect, with all his force, (con todas sus fuerzas,) all enterprises tending to the development of the riches of Bolivia, and the navigation of her vast rivers; and Colonel Church, being among this number, (y en contrandose el Sr. Coronel Church su el numero de ellos,) may rest persuaded of the philanthropic intentions of his excellency Colonel Morales, the undersigned being able to assure you that he (Colonel Church) will not be prejudiced in his interests.

In this manner I reply to you, subscribing myself your attentive, sincere servant,
CASIMIRO CORRAL.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Cochabamba, May 15, 1871. (Received July 3.)

SIR: Inclosed I have the honor to transmit a decree (inclosure No. 1) issued by the provisional government of Bolivia, together with a note (inclosure No. 2) from the secretary general, defining the course which the Bolivian government intends to pursue in all cases of claims presented by foreigners, and declaring in how far the government will admit of diplomatic intervention on behalf of such claimants. I beg to call your attention to article 4 of said decree. I also inclose a copy of my reply (inclosure No. 3) to the secretary general's note.

I am, &c.,

L. MARKBREIT.

[Inclosure No. 1.—Translation.]

Augustin Morales, Provisional President of the Republic, invested by the people with ample faculties, considering—

1. That the equality of all persons before the law is the basis of a republic;
2. That the government cannot invade nor usurp the attributes of judicial power, which has the mission to judge and decide upon all claims of a private nature;
3. That various diplomatic agents have presented certain claims—which may be just or unjust—directly to the government, in favor of their subjects, thereby involving diplomatic discussion, without having previously invoked, on the part of those interested, the intercession of the courts and tribunals charged with the administration or justice for all citizens;

4. That such proceedings are contrary to the rules of international law;

5. That it is necessary to determine a general rule, in order that all claims of foreign subjects may be adjudicated in accordance with the laws of Bolivia and the usage of international law:

It is therefore decreed:

ARTICLE I. The government of Bolivia will not admit diplomatic reclamations, nor the interposition nor good offices (personeria) of the public agents of other nations, in questions of private interests, unless such questions have been previously submitted for adjudication to the courts and tribunals of the republic.

ARTICLE II. Only in cases of refusal or delay of justice will the government admit the intervention of foreign public agents.

ARTICLE III. The government will not admit reclamations in questions which have already been disposed of in accordance with the laws of the country, nor in cases which have been finally adjudicated, in accordance with such laws, by the tribunals.

ARTICLE IV. The government, however, will accept direct reclamations in cases permitted by international law.

The secretary general is charged with the publication of this decree, and will communicate the same to all concerned.

Done at the city of Cochabamba, this 8th day of May, 1871.

SECRETARIATE GENERAL, SECTION FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Cochabamba, May 9, 1871.

SIR: The secretary general of state, in charge of the department for foreign affairs, has the honor to transmit herewith to the honorable Colonel L. Markbreit a decree issued by this government, declaring the conduct which it intends to observe in respect to demands and claims presented by foreign subjects against the state, cases of intervention in the same by diplomatic agents, and the right of the government to accept such intervention in cases permitted by international law, or not to admit the same in cases where the subject of controversy appertains exclusively to the courts and tribunals of the republic.

Colonel Markbreit, in his high illustration, (alta ilustración), will comprehend that the declaration contained in the aforementioned decree is simply a line of conduct which the government has imposed itself, as all are equal before the law, and because the executive of the country cannot arrogate unto himself a knowledge of questions belonging exclusively to the judicial power, which has the mission to administer impartial justice without distinguishing nationalities nor the quality of individuals.

Moreover, the honorable Colonel L. Markbreit knows that it is a universal principle of international law that the demands and controversies of foreign subjects cannot be subjected to a better or worse condition than those of native subjects or citizens. (nacionales), and that, consequently, if they are, or believe themselves, damaged in their interests, they have the means at their disposal of invoking the laws of the country and solicit their enforcement.

This is in accordance with the demands of universal justice, of civilization, and of public law.

In noting the contents of the declaration alluded to, the honorable Colonel Markbreit will please judge, from its true standpoint, the frank, friendly, and circumspect conduct which the government of Bolivia proposes to follow in all questions of a private nature, in order to prevent and avoid any difficulties that might arise in his diplomatic relations, which so happily are being cultivated, (que tan felizmente se cultivan), and which it is vehemently desired to draw closer and closer with the (excelentísimo) Government of the United States of North America, so worthily represented by the honorable Colonel L. Markbreit.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to assure the honorable Colonel Markbreit of the high esteem and respect with which he has the honor to subscribe himself his attentive and sincere servant,

PEDRO GARCIA.

Hon. Colonel L. MARKBREIT,
Minister Resident of the United States of North America in Bolivia.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Cochabamba, May 12, 1871.

SIR: The undersigned, minister resident of the United States, in acknowledging the receipt of your excellency's esteemed note of the 9th instant, and the decree therein transmitted, in which the government of Bolivia defines the conduct which it intends to observe in reference to all demands and claims from foreign subjects against the state, has the honor to say, in reply, that he will take pleasure in communicating the same to his Government.

The undersigned is exceedingly gratified at the sentiments expressed in your excellency's communication relative to the laudable desire entertained by the government of Bolivia, to draw closer and closer the friendly relations which happily subsist between the two republics, and begs to assure your excellency that nothing shall be wanting on his part to contribute toward that end.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to offer to your excellency the assurances of his most profound and distinguished consideration with which he has the honor to remain,

Your excellency's obedient servant,

No. 142.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Sucre, August 28, 1871. (Received October 14.)

SIR: I have the honor to report to you the arrival in this city, on the 30th ultimo, of Colonel George E. Church, president of the "National Bolivian Navigation Company."

In view of the importance of his enterprise, I believe that a brief detail of his operations during the last three years may be of interest to the Department, as showing the political relations existing between this country and its neighbors, and the great delicacy it has required to place Colonel Church's navigation and railway schemes in such condition as may insure their early realization.

The Department is well aware that the sword-point relations existing for three centuries between old Spaniard and Portuguese lost but little of their bitterness at the date of the independence of these countries, and their formation into empire and republics.

The vast valley of the Amazon, in Brazil, was found by the empire to be of very unwieldy management, and in the opening of the great river to all flags, before the settlement of frontier questions with the states at the headwaters, there was fear that imperial border might lose something of its proportions.

This was probably the principal cause for the policy of Brazil up to 1866 and 1867.

At this date, however, Brazil was engaged in a war with Paraguay, ostensibly to open the Paraguay River, that perfect freedom of communication might be had with the Brazilian province of Mato-Grosso.

It attracted much attention among the liberal party of the empire that war was waged in the Plata Valley for freedom of navigation, while Brazil herself denied this freedom to the republics at the headwaters of the Amazon.

This contradictory position of the imperial government probably forced the opening of a part of the Amazon at least ten years sooner than it would have taken place in normal times.

Knowing the policy of Brazil in the Amazon, Colonel Church stipulated, on the part of his company, that Bolivia should negotiate with Brazil the right to build a railway past the rapids of the Madeira River, and transfer it to the company. Moreover, that perfect freedom of navigation for all flags should be decreed from Borba to San Antonio. Up to the former point, as the Department is aware, this freedom exists, according to the Brazilian decree of December, 1867.

Bolivia made every effort to comply with its contract with Colonel Church. Two different legations were accredited to the court of Rio de Janeiro, but retired without results; and a year and a half was uselessly consumed. The Bolivian government then requested Colonel Church to undertake the negotiation. To this he consented and reached Rio de Janeiro, from Bolivia, in the midst of the great yellow fever season, in February, 1869. The result of a seventy days' negotiation was a concession made to him personally (see dispatch No. 55) by the empire, allowing the construction of a railway at the rapids, and a verbal assurance that in a short time the Madeira from Borba to San Antonio would be opened to all flags. At present this stretch of four hundred miles is only navigable for the Brazilian and Bolivian flags, by the treaty of March 27, 1867, between the two governments.

It appears that Colonel Church has organized the "Maderia and Mar-more Railway Company" in London, (see dispatch No. 125,) and that the one hundred and seventy miles of road is already under contract with one of the most powerful associations of contractors in Europe, the Public Works Construction Company, of London. The whole line is to be in working order on the 1st of January, 1874.

In aid of the National Bolivian Navigation Company, the Bolivian government, in December of 1868, made a contract with Colonel Church for the negotiation of a loan of £2,000,000 sterling, the company offering as a guarantee its three-fourths of the import duties conceded to it as a subsidy, and its net earnings; while the government, giving the other fourth or import duties, was to enjoy, in consequence, seventeen per centum of the net products of the loan.

At the request of the government, Colonel Church undertook the negotiation of this loan, and was commissioned special agent for the purpose. It appears that he carried it to a great success in London and on the continent of Europe—so great, that it is virtually taken "firm" by a very prominent banking-house, namely, by Messrs. Emile Erlanger & Co. The company will thus find themselves in possession of several millions of gold, which will enable them to carry out their plans on a very large scale. Their custom-house subsidy alone must, in the course of time, give them immense returns. They have, in fact, in their hands almost complete commercial control over four-fifths of the 2,500,000 inhabitants of the Amazon Valley, and there is good reason to believe that their enterprise is destined to attract great attention.

All these operations have been undertaken and pushed ahead under the most extraordinary difficulties.

None of these, not even the Franco-Prussian war, the recent revolution in this republic, Peruvian and Chilian opposition to the loss of Bolivian trade by the Pacific coast, &c., have been able to impede the steady march forward of the National Bolivian Navigation Company.

It is evident that great political changes are to result in South America from the turning of Bolivian commerce from the Pacific to the Atlantic front of South America. Henceforth the commercial and friendly relations of Bolivia and Brazil must necessarily become very closely interwoven. For the first time, in fact, since the occupation of this continent by the Europeans, is a real solid effort being made to turn Portuguese American and Spanish American interests into a common channel, and make South America more homogeneous.

In solving this problem between Bolivia and Brazil, Colonel Church is doing a great service to every republic at the headwaters of the Amazon, and also to civilization.

His operations as special agent of Bolivia have, since his arrival, been submitted by the government to the national assembly, now in session in this city; which body, after a strong debate of eight days, has approved them in all their parts by a vote of forty-five in favor against seven in contra.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

L. MARKBREIT.

SIR: I now have the honor to state, in reply to your dispatch No. 39, that I have inquired particularly about the American emigrants at Para supposed to be in destitute circumstances, without obtaining any information concerning them. No complaint has been addressed me in any way by them, and I therefore indulge the hope that by some good providence they have been enabled to return to the United States. The principal American colony remaining in Brazil is engaged in the culture of cotton, and claims to be doing well, though most of the members are dissatisfied, living frugally, and will doubtless return to their old homes as soon as their means will permit.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 31, 1871.

Sir: I transmit a copy of a letter of the 21st instant addressed to this Department by C. A. Washburn, esq., late minister of the United States to Paraguay, relative to certain property, the most valuable part of which was placed in his custody by residents of Asuncion, and which, on leaving there, he says remained at his place of abode. That building was taken possession of by the Brazilian forces on their entrance into Asuncion, and the property adverted to is alleged to have been seized as booty by soldiers in the service of that empire.

Mr. Washburn also says that he warned the depositors that, in accepting the trust which they thought proper to confer upon him, neither his Government nor himself personally was to be held accountable for the safe-keeping of the property. This Government claims no right to interfere for the recovery of the value of such part of it as did not belong to itself or to citizens of the United States, but it may be supposed that, under the circumstances attending the trust, and in view of the standing of the depositors, that government might of its own accord make amends to them. So far as appears, the owners of the foreign property were women, helpless non-combatants, whom a powerful and generous enemy would not voluntarily or unnecessarily injure. Their property, too, was lodged in a house which was the legation of the United States, and though the minister himself was absent at the time of the seizure, it is understood that the flag of the United States was still flying there. The capture of the property of merely technical enemies so situated, seems not to be in harmony with the rule of the freedom of enemy's property at sea, which is understood to be respected by the Brazilian government.

You will consequently sound the minister for foreign affairs upon this subject. If you should find him not averse to entertaining the complaints of the Paraguayan ladies, measures may be adopted toward obtaining such proof as to the extent of their losses as may be attainable. You will, in any event, give him to understand that reparation will be expected for the seizure of the property of this Government, of Mr. John A. Duffield, and of Mr. Washburn himself.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 22, 1871.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch (without number) of the 10th, with inclosure, relating to the complaint of Mr. Thomas Rainey against certain action of the authorities of Brazil. I have examined these voluminous documents sufficiently to ascertain that Mr. Rainey's grievances, real or supposed, arise out of one or more contracts into which he voluntarily entered with the Brazilian government, as well in his private capacity as that of the representative of a corporation or joint-stock association, organized under the laws of Brazil.

The following extract from instructions recently addressed to Mr. De Long, minister to Japan, and which, in substance, have been repeatedly addressed to other ministers, will apprise you of the views of this Department in relation to such cases. The considerations which forbid public intervention have peculiar force where the parties asking it are the members of a foreign corporation:

"Another class of claims is those against the government of Japan, not springing from torts, but founded on contract, express or implied. In respect to such claims, the policy and practice of this Government has been in accordance with the principle stated by John Quincy Adams, then Secretary of State, in a letter to the Spanish minister at this capital, dated April 29, 1823, in these terms: 'With regard to contracts of an individual born in one country with the government of another, most expressly when the individual contracting is domiciliated in the country with whose government he contracts, and formed the contract voluntarily for his own private emolument, and without the privity of the nation under whose protection he had been born, he has no claim whatever to call upon the government of his nativity to espouse his claim, this government having no right to compel that with which he voluntarily contracted to the performance of that contract.'

"Such cases have accordingly not been regarded as proper subjects of public intervention, but have, when the merits of the claim appeared clear, been commended to the attention of our diplomatic representatives, with a view to the exertion, unofficially, of his friendly influence to procure an examination and equitable adjustment by the government concerned."

You would appear from the papers to have given to Mr. Rainey's case all the attention to which it is entitled.

In my dispatches Nos. 167 and 169 I had the honor to inform you of the action I had deemed it best to take, under the instructions conveyed to me by your dispatch No. 52, above referred to; that I had placed an extract from your dispatch in the hands of the minister of foreign affairs, and was awaiting a promised solution. Some weeks having passed without my having received any definite reply from the minister, I considered that the time had arrived to present the matter in a more formal shape, and to press the subject a little upon his attention.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Rio de Janeiro, May 4, 1871.

The undersigned, acting chargé d'affaires of the United States of America, presents his compliments to his excellency Mr. Manoel Francisco Correia, and has the honor to state that he placed in the hands of his excellency, some weeks since, an extract from a dispatch of the honorable Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State of the United States, dated January 31 last, referring to certain property of Paraguayans, of the Government of the United States, of Mr. John H. Duffield, and of Mr. Washburn, which was left by Mr. Washburn at the legation of the United States, at Asuncion, upon his retiring therefrom.

That legation, as appears from the dispatch referred to, was taken possession of by the Brazilian forces upon their entrance into Asuncion, and the property adverted to is alleged to have been seized as booty by soldiers in the service of the empire.

His excellency will have seen that, while the Government of the United States claims no right to interfere for the recovery of the value of such part of this property as did not belong to itself or to citizens of the United States, it nevertheless appeals to the magnanimity of the imperial government in behalf of those Paraguayans who had deposited their property at the American legation. The Government of the United States goes further, and submits to the government of Brazil whether the position of this Paraguayan property, on deposit at the legation of the United States, was not analogous to that of an enemy's property on board a neutral ship at sea, which is exempt from seizure, under a principle understood to be respected by the Brazilian government. As regards the property of the United States, the property of Mr. John A. Duffield, and of Mr. Washburn, for this the Government of the United States will, in any event, expect reparation.

The object of the undersigned in now placing these matters in their present form before his excellency Mr. Manoel Francisco Correia is that he may make it the occasion of requesting that his excellency will have the kindness to inform him what may be the views of the imperial government in regard to the property of the Paraguayans, which was deposited at the United States legation at Asuncion, the claimants for which are believed to be mostly helpless and destitute women. If the government of Brazil, responding to the appeal made so confidently to its magnanimity by the Government of the United States, shall favorably entertain the claims of those unfortunate Paraguayan women, steps will be taken to lay before the imperial government such proof as to the extent of their losses as may be attainable.

The undersigned solicits the early attention of his excellency Mr. Manoel Francisco Correia to this matter, and avails of the occasion to renew to his excellency the assurances of his high respect and distinguished consideration.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 169, of the 19th ultimo, reporting an interview with the minister of foreign affairs of Brazil, in regard to the invasion of the legation of the United States at Asuncion, by Brazilian soldiers, has been received. The objection of the minister of foreign affairs to the complaint cannot be regarded as by any means conclusive.

The mere fact that some time may have elapsed between the departure of Mr. Washburn and the entrance of the Brazilian forces into Asuncion does not admit a presumption that the legation could have been sacked by Paraguayans.

The obvious probabilities are so much the reverse, that we may deem ourselves warranted in stating that the whole burden of showing that the robbery was committed by Paraguayans must be assumed by Brazil.

Of course, if this can be satisfactorily done, the accountability of Brazil in the matter will be at an end.

On the 29th of June, 1870, however, Congress passed an act incorporating the National Bolivian Navigation Company. [Translation.]

*Mr. Correia to Mr. Wright.*RIO DE JANEIRO, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, May 30, 1871.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note which Mr. Robert Clinton Wright, chargé d'affaires of the United States, addressed to me on the 4th instant.

The senior chargé d'affaires refers to the extract from the dispatch of Mr. Hamilton Fish, dated 31st January last, which he delivered to me some days since, and in which his excellency refers to articles belonging to Paraguayans, to the Government of the United States, and to Messrs. A. Duffield and Washburn, left by the latter at the American legation at Asuncion when he retired thence.

Mr. Wright observes that from the dispatch referred to, it appears that the Brazilian forces, upon entering that capital, took possession of the said legation, and that the enemy's property was seized by the said forces. The senior chargé d'affaires states that his government makes no claim for any property not belonging to it or to American citizens; it appeals, nevertheless, to the magnanimity of the imperial government in favor of the Paraguayans who deposited their effects in the American legation. The Government of the United States, adds Mr. Wright, goes farther, and submits to that of Brazil the following question: Whether the Paraguayan property deposited in the said legation was not in analogous circumstances to that of the enemy's property on board of a neutral ship at sea, which is not subject to seizure, under a principle admitted by Brazil. As regards the property of the United States and that of Messrs. Duffield and Washburn, the American Government, in any event, expects reparation.

The question being placed in this form, the senhor chargé d'affaires concludes by requesting that I will communicate to him the views of the imperial government in reference to the property deposited at the American legation, which, for the most part, belongs to poor and helpless women. That if the government of Brazil, according to the appeal which is confidently made to its magnanimity by that of the United States, shall entertain favorably the claims of the unfortunate Paraguayan women, the proofs of the losses sustained by them, which it may be possible to obtain, would be submitted to its consideration.

With this résumé of the note of the senhor chargé d'affaires, I proceed to give him due answer, which will be preceded by a narrative of what occurred in connection with this matter.

Mr. Kirkland, commander of the steamer "Wasp," addressed, on the 25th February, 1869, to the commander-in-chief of the Brazilian forces operating in Paraguay, a dispatch which closes as follows: "I have also to call your excellency's attention to the fact that, since the occupation of the city of Asuncion by the Brazilian army, the house which was occupied by the legation of the United States has been visited and sundry boxes, some of which were sealed, opened by force, and their contents taken away; besides this, the official archives of the legation have been removed. I request that your excellency will issue orders to those under your command, that they shall deliver to me, on board this vessel, all property belonging to the legation of the United States which may be in their possession." On the 7th March the Brazilian general received another dispatch, in which Mr. Kirkland makes the following communication: "I have the honor to inform you of my departure, and to notify you that I have named Commander Frank MacNevin as agent of the United States pro tempore at this port, to receive and keep, until they shall be claimed by the proper authorities, all property and papers, of whatsoever kind or nature they may be, belonging to the Government of the United States, and which may be delivered to him by you in virtue of my request of the 25th February, or which may come into his hands through any other channel." In a dispatch of the 8th March, Marshal Guilherme Xavier de Souza, after stating that he could not admit the claim of the commander of the "Wasp," as this was a matter which belonged to the governments and their diplomatic agents, set forth the motives which obliged the Brazilian military authorities to take possession of the property found in the house No. 95 Justice street, where, it is stated, Mr. Washburn had lived.

This statement is indispensable to my answer, and therefore I must transcribe it here.

"The city of Asuncion was converted into a 'peace forte' by General Lopez, who, at the same time, obliged the unfortunate inhabitants, natives and foreigners, to retire to the interior, taking with them whatever they could carry.

"Many months after this forced emigration, and when the city was abandoned even by the Paraguayan forces which had garrisoned it, the allied armies, victorious in various battles, in December entered it.

"It is true that the Brazilian forces were the first that entered, and it is also true that they found many houses open, others without roofs. This took place on the 1st January, at night. The first care of the Brazilian colonel, Hernes Ernesto da Fonseca, commander of that brigade which preceded by a few days the body of the allied armies which marched by land, was to cover the interior line of the city, availing himself of the entrenchments of the enemy to distribute patrols to police the city, and to place guards in those houses which had the shields of the French and Italian consulates as well as in other buildings where he could see or might presume that they contained objects of value.

"One of the houses in which the latter precaution was taken was that of No. 95, Justice street, where, it is said, the senhor ex-minister of the United States, Washburn, had lived. The motive of the precaution taken by the Brazilian military authority being known, it is proper to state the manner in which the articles found in the said house were taken possession of.

"The articles found in this house, says Marshal G. X. de Souza, in his above-cited dispatch, were inventoried and placed in security by a commission of officers from the military and civil department of the Brazilian army, named for this purpose by Marshal Marquis, of Caxias, all of which appears from the respective reports made in the most precise, authentic, and trustworthy manner."

These reports were published at pages 107 to 109 of the report of this Department for the year 1869, and in them is stated the amount of jewels and other articles found at the said house. Some furniture was also found, and a box fastened with screws, which were already apparently injured, having on the top a label which stated that it contained the archives of the American legation. Neither externally nor internally did the said house indicate that it had been the habitation of the minister of the United States, who had retired months before the events which delivered Asuncion into the possession of the allies.

Furthermore, it did not appear natural, as the Brazilian general observed, that he should fail to take with him the archives of the legation, or to confide them to the care of the consular agents residing at Asuncion. And the circumstance of the American minister having occupied the house in reference was not of itself sufficient to determine the true origin of the deposits alluded to.

It may be added that with the withdrawal of Mr. Washburn from Paraguay, the privileges enjoyed by his residence ceased. "From the moment a public minister," says H. Wheaton, Elements International Law, compiled by Dana, section 224, "enters the territory of the State to which he is sent, during the time of his residence, and until he leaves the country, he is entitled to an entire exemption from the local jurisdictions, both civil and criminal." These weighty considerations, as well as the want of authority of Mr. Kirkland, gave rise to the refusal of the Brazilian general to deliver to that commander the articles found in the house which Mr. Washburn had occupied.

But, in the same dispatch in which the Brazilian general conveyed this refusal to Mr. Kirkland, he declared that the restoration should be made as soon as it should be proved that the articles referred to belonged to Mr. Washburn or to persons who had not served the cause of the enemy.

In taking possession of them, Brazilian authority had no other object than to place them in safety that they might be delivered in proper time to the legitimate owners. Of this purpose irrefragable testimony is borne by the fact that large sums of money were scrupulously delivered to the provisional government of Paraguay, which under constitutional right might have been considered as prize to the victor. The imperial government has therefore resolved, in accordance with its previous action, to deliver to the Government of the United States all the articles found at the house in which Mr. Washburn had resided, without making any distinction between those which belonged to American citizens and which belonged to Paraguayans. This resolution does away with the necessity of any discussion as to the analogy between enemy's property deposited at the aforesaid house, and that which may be found on board a neutral vessel at sea. As a consequence of the said resolution, I shall ask the war department to issue the necessary order to deliver to the persons designated by the senhor chargé d'affaires, the articles taken possession of by the Brazilian military authorities which were found in the house, at the city of Asuncion, occupied by the American minister. The delivery will be made in conformity with the reports made upon the occasion of the taking possession of the property. I avail myself of the occasion to renew to Mr. Wright the assurances of my very distinguished consideration.

MANOEL FRANCISCO CORREIA.

No. 2.

Mr. Wright to Mr. Correia.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Rio de Janeiro, June 3, 1871.

The undersigned, acting chargé d'affaires of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note addressed to him by his excellency Mr. Manoel Francisco Correia, under date of the 30th May, in reply to his note of the 4th of the same month, in reference to certain property of Paraguayans, of the Government of the United States, and of Mr. John A. Duffield and Mr. Washburn, alleged to have been seized as booty by soldiers in the service of the empire of Brazil, upon the occupation by them of the city of Asuncion. His excellency refers, in the first place, to a demand made by Commander Kirkland, of the United States steamer Wasp, upon the commander-in-chief of the Brazilian forces operating in Paraguay, Marshal Guilherme Xavier de Souza, for the delivery to him of the property which had been seized at the United States legation, and observes, citing Marshal Souza's dispatch of the 8th March, in reply to Commander Kirkland, that the Marshal, after stating that he could not admit the claim of the commander of the Wasp, as this was a matter which belonged to the governments and their diplomatic agents, sets forth the motives which obliged the Brazilian military authorities to take possession of the property found in the house No. 95 Justice street, where it was stated Mr. Washburn had lived. This statement of Marshal Souza, his excellency considers indispensable to his reply, and consequently transcribes it. From this statement it appears that Asuncion was converted by General Lopez into a "place forte," who, at the same time, obliged the inhabitants, natives and foreigners, to retire to the interior, taking with them whatever they could carry; that many months after this forced emigration, and when the city was abandoned even by the Paraguayan forces which had garrisoned it, the allied armies, victorious in various battles in December, entered it; that it is true that the Brazilian forces were the first that entered, and it is also true that they found many houses open and others unroofed; that this took place on the 1st January at night; that the first care of the Brazilian Colonel Hermes Ernesto da Fonseca, commander of the brigade which preceded by a few days the body of the allied armies which marched by land, was to cover the interior lines of the city, availing himself of the entrenchments of the enemy, to distribute patrols for the policing of the city, and to place guards in those houses which bore the shields of the French and Italian consulates, as well as in other buildings where he could see or might presume that they contained objects of value; that one of the houses in which the latter precaution was taken was that of No. 95 Justice street, where, it is said, the ex-minister of the United States had lived.

His excellency continues: "The motive of the precaution taken by the Brazilian military authority being known, it is proper to state the manner in which the articles found in the said house were taken possession of," and for this purpose quotes further from the statement of Marshal Sonya, as follows: The articles found in this house were inventoried and placed in security by a commission of officers from the military and civil departments of the Brazilian army, named for this purpose by Marshal Marquis, of Caxias, all of which appears from the respective reports made in the most precise, authentic, and trustworthy manner.

His excellency next observes that these reports were published at pages 107 to 109 of the report of the department of foreign affairs for the year 1869, and that in them is stated the amount of jewels and other articles found at the said house; that some furniture was also found, and a box fastened with screws, which were already apparently injured, having on the top a label which stated that it contained the archives of the American legation; that neither externally nor internally did the said house indicate that it had been the habitation of the minister of the United States, who had retired months before the events which delivered Asuncion into the possession of the allies; that furthermore, as Marshal Sonya observed, it did not appear natural that the minister should fail to take with him the archives of the legation, or to confide them to the care of one of the consular agents residing at Asuncion, and that the circumstance of the American minister having occupied the house in reference was not of itself sufficient to determine the true origin of the deposits alluded to. "It may be added," says his excellency, "that with the withdrawal of Mr. Washburn from Paraguay the privileges enjoyed by his residence ceased." "From the moment a public minister," says H. Wheaton, (Elements of International Law compiled by Dana, section 241) "enters the territory of the state to which he is sent, during the time of his residence and until he leaves the country, he is entitled to an entire exemption from the local jurisdiction, both civil and criminal. These weighty considerations, as well as the want of authority of Commander Kirkland," continues his excellency, "gave rise to the refusal of the Brazilian general to deliver to that commander the articles found in the house which Mr. Washburn had occupied; but that in the same dispatch in which the Brazilian general conveyed this refusal to Commander Kirkland, he declared that the restoration should be made as soon as it should be proved that the articles referred to belonged to Mr. Washburn or to persons who had not served the cause of the enemy; and that, in taking possession of them, the Brazilian authority had no other object than to place them in safety, that they might be delivered, in proper time, to the legitimate owners, of which purpose irrefragable testimony is borne by the fact that large sums of money were scrupulously delivered to the provisional government of Paraguay, which, under constitutional right, might have been considered as prize to the victor."

His excellency concludes by informing the undersigned that the imperial government has resolved, in accordance with its previous action, to deliver to the Government of the United States all the articles found at the house in which Mr. Washburn had resided, without distinction between those which belonged to Americans and those which belonged to Paraguayans; that this resolution does away with the necessity of any discussion as to the analogy between enemy's property deposited at the aforesaid house, and that which may be found on board a neutral vessel at sea; and that, as a consequence of this resolution, his excellency would ask the War Department to issue the necessary orders to deliver to the person designated by the undersigned the articles taken possession of by the Brazilian military authorities, and which were found in the house, at the city of Asuncion, occupied by the American legation, which delivery will be made in conformity with the reports or schedules made upon the occasion of the taking possession of the property. This, the undersigned believes, is a clear résumé of his excellency's note, to which he has the honor to reply.

In justification of the demand addressed by Commander Kirkland to Marshal Sonya, the undersigned would state that it is a sanctioned practice under his government that the commanders of national ships, where the interests of their country may seem to require it, and they may find no diplomatic or consular representative of their government present, may exercise consular or even quasi-diplomatic functions.

Touching the observation of Marshal Sonya, that it did not appear natural that Mr.

Washburn should have failed to take the archives of the legation away with him, or to confide them to the care of one of the consular agents residing at Asuncion, the undersigned begs to say that Mr. Washburn asserts that he delivered the keys of the house he had occupied to the Italian consul, Mr. Lorenzo Chapperon; but even had he not done this much there would have been nothing unnatural in the omission, nor in his not removing the archives, for it must be remembered, and this can scarcely have been unknown to Marshal Souya, that this American minister, Mr. Washburn, was flying, as it were for his life, from a savage who knew no law but his own brutal and malignant will and instincts. As regards the immunity to which the house that had been occupied by Mr. Washburn was entitled, and concerning which his excellency quotes from the distinguished Wheaton, it is doubtless true that diplomatic immunities and privileges, under a strict construction of international law, live only during the presence of the minister in the country to which he is sent; but these immunities, the undersigned is persuaded, would not be withheld, either by Brazil or any other civilization, from the residences of ministers which they might have been forced to abandon temporarily upon the bombardment or storming of a capital. And if so much may be assumed in regard to the residences of ministers in capitals taken by bombardment or storm, the undersigned respectfully submits that it was hardly expecting too much of Brazil that, when her forces entered, without opposition, into the capital of Paraguay, they should respect a house which was still technically the legation of the United States, containing its archives, and which the minister had been forced to abandon under circumstances notoriously involving great risk to his life. The undersigned entertains no doubt that his government will duly appreciate the magnanimity of the imperial government in having surrendered to the provisional government of Paraguay large sums of money to which, under the laws of war, it considered itself entitled, as well as the promptness with which it has responded to its appeal in behalf of those Paraguayans who had deposited property at the American legation at Asuncion.

The undersigned accepts the proposition of his excellency to deliver, to the person who may be designated by him, the property taken possession of by the military authorities of Brazil, at the legation of the United States at Asuncion, in conformity with the schedules or reports heretofore referred to, and requests that the delivery may be made to the Hon. John L. Stevens, minister resident of the United States to Paraguay, or to his representative. But the Government of the United States having been informed that Mr. Chapperon, the Italian consul heretofore referred to, asserted to Mr. Worthington, late minister of the United States to the Argentine Confederation, that at the time the city of Asuncion was entered by the Brazilian forces there was still remaining property at the American legation of the value of $200,000; that Mr. Worthington asserts that the Brazilian authorities at Asuncion acknowledged that they had taken $30,000, which they offered to pay over to him, but that he declined to receive it, for the reason that it was but a small part of what they had taken; that Mr. John A. Duffield, an American citizen, had property on deposit at the legation of the value of $15,000; that there was also at the legation a large box marked "archives of the legation of the United States," containing the archives of the former United States consulate at Asuncion, and a large number of books, a flag, letter-press, and other things belonging to the legation, many of the books having "U. S. legation" lettered on the backs of them, being found scattered about the town after the occupation; and that Mr. Washburn himself left personal property of his own at the legation to the value of $500 or $600, the undersigned must reserve to his government the right to take such further action in the matter as it may seem proper. The undersigned would still beg of his excellency, Mr. Manoel Francisco Correia, the favor that he will furnish him with two copies of the printed reports or schedules above referred to, and has the honor to renew to his excellency the assurances of his high respect and most distinguished consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Rio de Janeiro, July 13, 1871. (Received August 22, 1871.)

SIR: In my dispatch No. 178, of the 10th ultimo, I had the honor to report to you what had occurred up to that date in reference to the claim made upon this government in connection with the alleged sacking of the legation of the United States at Asuncion by troops in the service of the empire of Brazil.

I have since received no communication from this government on the subject. In my said dispatch I ventured the hope that you might judge it best to take no further action in this matter * * * until I should be able to send you the report of the Brazilian minister of foreign affairs. This I have now the honor to do, under separate cover, as well as to transmit herewith a translation which I have made of an interesting memorandum presented by the minister of foreign affairs to the Italian minister. * * *

I have, &c.,

ROBT. CLINTON WRIGHT.

Memorandum accompanying the note of Mr. Manoel Francisco Correia, minister of foreign affairs, to the Italian minister, dated 11th of May, 1871.

[Translation.]

Baron Cavalchini, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of His Majesty the King of Italy, at a conference on the 19th of April, 1869, stated, by order of his government, that his government had received from Mr. Chapperon, consul in Paraguay, a report upon the entry of the Brazilian forces into Asuncion and Luque, and consequent outrages embracing the sack of his houses and the consulate itself, and damages to many Italian subjects. Mr. Cavalchini added that his government was obliged to give the greatest attention to this matter, but that it awaited a second report from Mr. Chapperon that it might again address itself to that of Brazil. In a note of the 1st of June, Mr. Cavalchini observed that from the documents annexed to the report of this department in the said year 1869, it is seen that the complaints he had presented at the conference of the 19th of April were not devoid of foundation, as in fact Asuncion and Luque had been sacked. In the first of these cities the Italian consulate was sacked on the 5th of January, notwithstanding it had been occupied by the Brazilian army since the 1st, and in the second the event occurred also on the 5th, upon the entry of a force commanded by Colonel Vasco Alves. Finally, with his note of the 6th of December, Mr. Cavalchini presented, by order of his government, a statement of the damages which the royal consulate and some Italian subjects resident in Asuncion and Luque allege that they have suffered when those cities were occupied by the Brazilian troops.

Before presenting the information and evidence which nullify the complaints made, it is necessary to consider the arguments upon which they are based. Mr. Chapperon, as well in the documents accompanying the said note of the 1st of December, 1869, as in his dispatch of the 6th of February, of the same year, addressed to Marshal Guilherme Xavier de Souza, presents only, in support of his claim, his own assertions. In opposition to these appear statements of the general and other officers of the Brazilian army. In view of two contradictory statements, and without regard to the greater or lesser credit which each one may merit, it becomes necessary for the discovery of the truth to make a vigorous analysis of both. Mr. Chapperon states that the alleged sacking of his houses in Asuncion and Luque took place on the 5th of January.

Mr. de Cuverville, ex-consul of France in Paraguay, who occupied at Luque part of the house in which Mr. Chapperon resided, and who also made accusations against the Brazilian troops similar to those under consideration, disagreeing in an essential point, asserts that the alleged sacking of his house, at the said city, took place on the 6th, and that of his house in the capital on the 7th. In a memorandum of the 2d instant, the imperial government shows that the imputation of Mr. de Cuverville is unfounded, confronting it with notorious facts, and taking into consideration dates cited by the Brazilian generals.

The same system will be pursued in this memorandum. One cannot but feel surprise that he who mentions the date of the alleged sacking at Luque and in the capital should not state, at the same time, why he did not remain there, whither he retired, and what the motive of his not being present at those points in which he could have watched over his own interests and those which had been confided to him, and of his being where there was nothing to protect. "The absence of the consular agents from Asuncion, at a moment when it was about to be subjected to military rule," said the Duke of Caxias, in his reply of the 26th January, 1869, to Mr. de Cuverville, "was naturally a grave difficulty in the way of the regular and orderly occupation of the enemy's capital, because there was wanting even those who might point out the residences of the said agents, and in general the houses which, containing merchandise or objects of value, might demand special protection."

Mr. Chapperon knew, and argues therefrom, that the Brazilian general, as soon as he entered the place, began to police it, posting guards at certain houses, and taking other measures for the protection of life and property. Nothing more natural, therefore, than that Mr. Chapperon, consul of a friendly nation, should seek military authority, point out his own residence and those of his fellow-countrymen, asking such measures as he might deem best adapted for the protection of those habitations. Thus proceeding, Mr. Chapperon would have maintained the strict neutrality of his government, and, at the same time, would have fulfilled his duty in watching over Italian interests. But that agent only appeared when he thought it opportune to accuse the Brazilian troops of having sacked his residences. And this grave accusation rests alone upon the assertion of the claimant, who did not take a single step for the protection of the interests under his charge. And the responsibility of the Brazilian army for the alleged sacking is deduced precisely from the facts of its generals and officers, immediately upon entering Asuncion, having taken all the precautions humanly possible to protect the houses where it was supposed there might be objects of value. How could the Brazilian chiefs know which were the houses of the consular agents, and of the subjects of neutral nations, and those which contained objects of value and of commerce?

In the entire absence of information from the parties interested, or from any other source, the military authority, when exploring the place, had to post sentinels, not at the houses where they knew articles of value existed, but at those which it seemed might contain them. Of course, under such circumstances, the precautions taken could not be complete, above all considering that the Brazilian army entered a city which was entirely unknown to it, and where no one was to be found to furnish the indispensable information needed to enlighten it as to the protection of neutral property. It was thus arguing, that Baron Cotegipe, in the said conference on the 19th of April, 1869, repelled the responsibility imputed to the Brazilian troops for the alleged sacking, whether this occurred before or after the occupation of the Paraguayan capital. Neither the belligerent who occupies a "place forte" nor he who abandons it to another belligerent can be responsible for the losses which may be suffered by the subjects of neutral nations, during the interval which intervenes between the retiring of one and the regular establishment of the other. It can be understood that during this interval the place may remain at the mercy of unscrupulous adventurers. This was precisely what occurred in Asuncion, abandoned by the Paraguayans a long time before the Brazilian troops entered it. When one of the belligerents occupies any "place forte," or city which may be under a proper administration, little inconvenience can arise from this fact so long as the principles of modern international law shall be observed. But if the occupant, as in the present case, finds everything disorganized and does not meet any one who can enlighten him or furnish the information necessary under such circumstances, irregularities must occur, which will be repeated at all times, in all countries, in all wars, the same causes being present. The Brazilian army cannot, therefore, be responsible for the criminal or reprehensible acts perpetrated whilst it did not control the place, or whilst, after having entered it, it was not possible for the Brazilian generals and officers to carry into effect the measures which they considered indispensable. The first care of the Brazilian generals upon entering Asuncion was to take measures for the protection of property.

It is therefore strange that this worthy procedure, in place of praise, should provoke accusations that these generals should not have prevented depredations committed without their knowledge, and which, moreover, occurred, as everything would induce the belief, before the army had occupied the capital and the city of Luque. He who, in a city, in a normal condition, charges himself with the safe-keeping or deposit of certain property, does not hold the local administration responsible, if by chance such property shall be stolen, he has rather to prove before the tribunals that there was no want of due care on his part, without which he is not relieved of responsibility for the loss of the property, even in the case of vis major, "Depositarius omnis qui dicit se rem amicisse, probare id debet." Doneau upon law, 7th Cod. Deposit. Such is also the doctrine laid down in note No. 5 to the art. 1845 of the Italian civil code, with notes by Vincenzo Cattaneo, vol. 2, page 1451. The alleged sacking might have been one of the accidents of vis major, of which the cited article 1845 treats; but inquiry must be made if the depositary took measures to guard what was confided to his safe-keeping, or if he abandoned without just cause the places where the deposits existed.

In a dispatch of the 12th February, 1869, published at page 98 of the report of this department of the same year, Colonel José Pereira da Silva, jr., says: "After our battalions had entered, I passed along some of the streets, and observed that in front of the houses which showed the arms of foreign consulates guards had been posted by order of Colonel Hermes Ernesto da Fonseca, who, on the night of the 1st January, had landed at this port, and asking why they were there, the respective commanders replied that it was to prevent those houses from being violated; afterwards, it was known that from the interior of adjoining houses they had been entered and robbed, but it could not be discovered by whom, because on the said night of the 1st a Paraguayan force was here, and since the said night a multitude of sutlers and adventurers who accompany the expedition by sea and land, were already here." In dispatches of the 17th January, 10th February, and 4th March, published at pages 89, 95, and 104 of the cited report, Colonel Hermes da Fonseca states the precautions he took to police the place as soon as he arrived there, and the difficulties he encountered in the execution of this commission from the total absence of any one who could furnish him with the necessary information. In these dispatches the purpose to repress any attack upon private property is clearly demonstrated.

As regards the measures taken at Luque, Colonel Vasco Alves Pereira states them in the following manner, in a dispatch of the 5th February, published in the said report, at page 91: "His excellency the marquis, marshal and commander-in-chief having ordered me to occupy this point, and that I should carefully examine all the houses in order to ascertain if they contained any material of war, as soon as I received this order I sent Major Ioão Baptista Barreto Seite, assistant deputy adjutant general, attached to this command, to examine the whole settlement, with the view of ascertaining if he could find any houses showing any indication or sign that they belonged to any other nationality than that of the country, and if he should find any such to post guards at them. Upon his return he reported that he had executed my order, and had found no houses of such description. At the same time that I sent Major Barreto Seite, I dispatched a police force of two officers and twenty men to prevent the touching of any article, even belonging to the people of the country." It is thus seen that the Brazilian authorities occupying Asuncion and Luque, notwithstanding they had no knowledge of what existed in those cities, took every precaution for the protection of private property. Mr. Chapperon, who did not appear in time to watch over the property and interests of Italians, nor furnished from the place of his residence any information, holds, nevertheless, the Brazilians responsible for losses which, if they could have been prevented, certainly would have been if the depositary had fulfilled his duty. The Brazilian army enters Asuncion and Luque, and giving another proof of the constant regularity of its procedure, seeks with zeal to preserve the property existing there. As, notwithstanding the precautions taken, it did not succeed in preventing the robbery of all that is alleged to have existed in the said cities, this is laid to its charge. But it would be extraordinary that, precisely on account of these praiseworthy precautions, it should have to answer for crimes or abuses preceding or succeeding these precautions, which may by possibility have been perpetrated. From the argument adduced by the claimant, it is deduced that if the Brazilian army, making no account of the disorganized condition in which it found the administration of those two cities, had left them in the same deplorable state, it would not be responsible for the alleged losses. Its responsibility, therefore, arises exactly from the fact of its having sought to save property which had been abandoned by its owners or depositaries. It is known that the dictator, Lopez, in the war with the allied nations, adopted the system of reducing to complete abandonment every place, city, or settlement which he could no longer defend. The city of Asuncion being abandoned in February, 1868, by order of the dictator, he issued the decree of the 1st December of the same year, ordering the removal of all personal property of every kind and description which might still have been kept there. This determination, like all the orders of Marshal Lopez, would not fail to meet an immediate and complete execution, even on the part of Mr. Chapperon and his countrymen. But if this was not so, as regards that consular agent, why did he abandon his own interests and those which had been confided to him, and did not take any of the precautions required by his character of depositary? Mr. Chapperon cannot exempt himself from the responsibility inherent to every depositary with the simple allegation of vis major. It would be necessary to prove that, on his part, there was not the least want of care, but this demonstration has not been and cannot be made.

Such is the doctrine sustained by jurists, and established in decisions by the French courts in the cases of Sourdis et Boiesy, and Coudraye et Cousseau de Montreau, Dallor's Rep. de Leg., volume 15, pages 459 and 460. Mr. Chapperon does not say when he arrived at Asuncion and Luque, nor explain his absence from those cities where he kept the deposits, but states that the alleged sacking took place on the 5th. Up to the 6th the house had sentinels posted at the door. How, then, could Mr. Chapperon certify himself that the house was sacked on the 5th, without the sentinels having any knowledge of his entrance there, or that of any other person? On the 1st of January the first Brazilian troops (6th brigade) arrived at the capital. Nevertheless, the Italian consul, who had constituted himself the depositary of many private individuals, and who says the property confided to him was deposited in his two houses at Asuncion and Luque, did not request of the Brazilian generals any precaution for the safe keeping of the deposits, when naturally this should have been his first step. Who would presume that Mr. Chapperon, charged with the safe keeping of property, not residing habitually at Asuncion, and knowing that this city was completely abandoned, would there make a deposit of such property? It is proper still to note that notwithstanding the consul resided habitually in Luque, neither did he remain there from the moment the Paraguayan troops withdrew from it. Mr. Chapperon selected for his residence a place where there were no interests of his nation to defend, where he did not keep the property which had been confided to him; and notwithstanding that this place was but a short distance from the said cities, that consular agent up to the 5th, the day on which he says the alleged sacking occurred, had not been at Asuncion to confer with the Brazilian generals. Thus, while no account is made of the entire abandonment in which Mr. Chapperon left the interests confided to him officially and privately, it is expected, although no request was addressed to it, that the Brazilian army should have constituted itself the guardian of deposits, of which the existence was not even presumed. It could not be conjectured that, known as the condition of Asuncion and Luque was to Mr. Chapperon, he having to keep property in safe keeping, he should have preferred for that purpose those two cities. What indications could induce the Brazilian chiefs to suppose that in the houses abandoned by Mr. Chapperon there existed deposits of valuable property? How could it be presumed that he who possessed three houses in different localities should keep those deposits precisely in that one in which he did not intend to reside?

These considerations show evidently that Mr. Chapperon either did not attach great importance to the deposits existing, as he says, in the two houses at Asuncion and Luque, or did not give due weight to the duties of a depositary, up to the moment of throwing the blame of their disappearance upon the Brazilian army, which could not believe that deposits, of which no one gave it any notice, would be kept in abandoned cities.

If the word of the Italian consul, the only evidence presented by him, has value with his government, that of the Brazilian generals can have no less value with the imperial government, above all considering that the said generals refer to dates and circumstances known, whilst the said consular agent presents simply the fact of the entry of the Brazilian troops. The two cities referred to having been abandoned by the Paraguayans, the Italian consul, who had in both important deposits, withdrew from them and refused to confer with the Duke of Caxias on the 4th, when he fell in with him at S. Lourenço on his march to Asuncion and Luque, thus renouncing the opportunity which was presented to him of requesting from that general measures for the protection of the interests which it was his duty to watch over. These are the terms in which the duke relates this incident: "Upon arriving at the parish of S. Lourenço, where I encamped on the 4th, the commander of the advance posts reported to me that at a few paces from our sentinels there was an isolated house in a field, having a flag flying which he did not know. I immediately ordered one of my aids-de-camp to go to the said house and ascertain by whom it was inhabited, and that if its occupant was a foreigner, he should invite him, in my name, to come and speak with me. The officer to whom I confided this commission returned in half an hour, telling me that the flag was Italian, and that the consul of that nation was there, who said he had fled from Luque to that point, so as not to accompany the Paraguayan forces, which had withdrawn from that point as soon as they heard of the defeat which Marshal Lopez had sustained at Lomas Valentinas; but that he would not leave that house where he was protected by his flag to come to speak with me. I immediately sent the officer back, and again ordered him that he should seek by all friendly means to persuade the consul that he ought to come and have an understanding with me, as he was within a military encampment, and that I might suspect him if he did not. To nothing would Mr. Chapperon assent, and maintained his position, saying that only by force would he come to speak with me."

What circumstances obliged Mr. Chapperon, consul of a friendly nation, to accompany President Lopez, even on the fields of battle, and not to present himself, under the pretext of not having his uniform with him, to the Duke of Caxias, who was about to occupy the cities in which it is alleged the deposits existed? This fact, in the absence of others, would reveal the breach of neutrality on the part of Mr. Chapperon, showing at the same time that his claim is without foundation. "It was my intention," said the Duke of Caxias, in a letter of 1st July, 1869, "to inform myself from the consuls as to the condition of the city which the enemy had abandoned, in order to take precautions for the security of property which might exist there, belonging to private individuals, and especially to the subjects of their nations."

How, in view of the incontestable facts above stated, can Mr. Chapperon, who was not in the capital, fix the date of the alleged sacking of his houses at Asuncion and Luque? Upon what basis does he sustain himself in attributing the sacking to the Brazilian army—in asserting that the act did not occur during the abandonment of those two cities by the Paraguayans? As regards the sacking of the house at Luque, Colonel Vasco Alves Pereira states as follows:

"When I was performing this service I was informed that there was a house which had been broken into in the rear, and that within it existed a shield with the arms of the consulate of His Majesty the King of Italy, and that in its yard there was a box which had been broken open. I immediately named Major José Lourenço Vieira Souto and two other officers to go to the said house and ascertain what the box contained. He, complying with this order, found the contents of the note, which, in the original, I have the honor to transmit to your excellency, and that in the box there existed some articles of domestic use and some liquor, as well as an iron chest, which had been broken open, and other articles which, being numerous, are not stated. Withal I had a guard posted that nothing might be taken away."

It appears that it is to this dispatch, published at page 91 of the report of this department for 1869, that Baron Cavalchini refers when he asserts that from the documents annexed to that report it was seen that the complaints presented at the conference of the 19th April were not devoid of foundation. Mr. Cavalchini is, however, mistaken; his assertion finds no foundation in that dispatch, nor in any other published in the report, as will be demonstrated.

Mr. Chapperon alleges that his house was robbed on the 5th January, that is, on the day of the entrance of the Brazilian forces. But the said house had already been violated at that time, as was verified simultaneously with the arrival of the imperial army. This is what Colonel Vasco Alves asserts in the cited dispatch.

In another dispatch of the 12th February, published at page 96 of the cited report, the same officer, replying to the accusations of Mr. Chapperon, states as follows:

"I guarantee you that the Italian consul is not able to prove what he has asserted, for when the forces under my command arrived at this point, (Luque,) the house referred to had already been broken open, not by the front, but in the rear, which was inclosed by a brick wall.

"Externally it had no signs of having been broken into, as may still be seen to-day, nor had it any flag or shield of any nation."

After this formal and well-founded denial, Colonel Vasco Alves explains the accusations of Mr. Chapperon in this manner:

"Appearances induce me to believe that the Italian consul desires to impute to the Brazilian soldiers what was doubtless done by the Paraguayans themselves, near whose government he was accredited; but that, in his spite against the Marquis of Caxias, as is seen from his dispatch addressed to the general-in-chief, he seeks a way of indisposing his nation toward the empire by accusing her soldiers of crimes which they did not commit."

It is to be observed that Mr. Chapperon, only on the 6th February, addressed the Brazilian general, reclaiming for acts which he alleges to have occurred on the 5th January. That consular agent explains the delay, saying that he had not yet in his possession his uniform, and, for this reason, was unable to present himself to the Duke of Caxias; but Mr. Chapperon, who, on the 6th February, presented his reclamation, not verbally, but in writing, could have employed at once the same means which he used a month later to denounce the acts of which he complained.

From what Mr. Chapperon says, it would appear that his uniform was neither at the capital nor at Luque nor at Campo Grande, (S. Lourenço.) Where, then, would it be? Nor was it an essential condition, above all, when treating of so urgent a matter, that the consul should present himself in uniform, that the Brazilian general should have heard him, and taken precautions in accordance with the circumstances of the case. It suited Mr. Chapperon to proceed in the manner indicated, as he might avoid the imputation which, as appears from documents hereafter cited, were made against him by the depositors, of only having thrown the blame of the disappearance of those deposits upon the Brazilian forces, when many of the said depositors, who were supposed to be dead, began to appear in Asuncion, and to claim the property confided to his keeping. From the dispatch of Mr. Chapperon, it is seen that he, since February, 1868, had provisionally established the Italian consulate at the house in Luque; from the same dispatch, it is also seen that in Asuncion there was another house where was also the consulate. There were, therefore, two houses—one in the capital and the other in Luque—appropriated to the Italian consulate. In neither of them, however, was Mr. Chapperon before or after the entry of the Brazilian forces; and as he says it was only after the 11th that he could examine the state of his house at Luque, how does he assert that the sacking took place on the 5th? As respects his house in the capital, he affirmed, as has already been stated, that it also was sacked on the 5th.

Nevertheless, many days after the arrival of the Duke of Caxias at the capital—that is, much after the 5th—Mr. Chapperon's secretary, having called upon the general-in-chief, only complained of the sacking of the house at Luque. Of the Italian consul, the Duke of Caxias, in a report of the 1st July, 1869, says: "I only had notice, many days after I was in the capital, through a man who presented himself, and told me he was the secretary of the said consul, and that he came in his behalf to make a verbal complaint to me of the sacking of the consulate of his nation in Luque by the Brazilian troops. I answered this man that the complaint must be addressed to me in writing, that I might act upon it, seeing that up to that date the consul had not presented himself." Mr. Chapperon has said in his cited dispatch that, since February, 1868, he had established, provisionally, at Luque, the Italian consulate, but he does not state the motive of his procedure. It is important to make this clear, that we may the better recognize the want of foundation for his accusations as regards the sacking in the capital. The Italian consulate was removed at that time to Luque, in consequence of Marshal Lopez having ordered, on the same occasion, the abandonment of the capital, and the establishment of the seat of government at the said city. This being so, could Mr. Chapperon have kept valuable property in Asuncion until January, 1869, considering, above all, that, in December of the preceding year, the dictator had determined that everything should be withdrawn thence? The consulate being in Luque, and Mr. Chapperon residing there, why leave in Asuncion important deposits? All these circumstances, as well as the dates and facts cited by the Brazilian generals, render it evident that the declarations of Mr. Chapperon cannot be admitted as proof in themselves of the complaints made against the Brazilian army. To corroborate the argument adduced, a sketch will be made of the interrogatories, depositions, and reports of persons resident in Paraguay when the facts occurred to which Mr. Chapperon refers. Many of the informants are Italians. Their testimony ought not to be suspected by the Italian government. The complaints of these Italian subjects against Mr. Chapperon, who never reclaimed or interceded with Marshal Lopez when they were the victims of the most iniquitous spoliation and of the most cruel persecutions, will be a new motive why we should not accept the statements of that consular agent. By these same documents, it is fully proven that the reclamation of Mr. Chapperon is tainted with partiality for the cause of President Lopez, in whose interest he served to the last moment, not always respecting the duties of neutrality. The documents here mentioned are appended in integrum, and by authentic copies, to the present memorandum, and are accompanied by a schedule signed by the chief clerk of this department.

First document.—Clippings from the Journal Regeneracion, in which will be found published grave accusations made by Italian subjects against Mr. Chapperon. From these publications, it will be seen that the Italians do not agree with their consul in imputations made by him to the Brazilian army; they accuse him, on the contrary, with having made away with their deposits.

Second document.—A letter from the Paraguayan citizen, Eduardo Aramburm, owner of the house in which Mr. Chapperon lived at Asuncion. From this letter, it appears that the Italian consul had promised to deliver sundry titles of property and various articles, which the mother of Mr. Aramburm had confided to his keeping.

Third document.—Another letter from Mr. Aramburm, in which he states that he had received the said titles. It is not natural that these titles should have been found, if Mr. Chapperon's house had been sacked.

Fourth document.—Is a long exposition from the French subject, Dorothée Laserre, which relates to the misfortunes endured by foreigners during the dictatorship of Marshal Lopez, without the slightest effort on the part of the consular agents to mitigate these sufferings.

Fifth document.—A deposition of the Italian subjects, Catalina Buero de Achinelli, João Estevão Chiapula, José Penzio, Domingos José Bertholi, and other foreigners. All declare in severe terms, that to Messrs. Chapperon and Cuverville must be attributed the making away of their deposits, and not to the Brazilian troops.

Sixth document.—Information given by D^a Francisca Lopez de Leite Pereira and D. Mariana Dolores Pereira, mother of the Paraguayan bishop, Manuel Antonia Palacias.

These ladies relate the torments through which they and many foreign subjects passed after the dictator determined upon the removal to the interior, of the populations of places he could not defend. The first informant relates the conduct of Mr. Chapperon toward her, when her husband began to be persecuted. In this sad and painful conjuncture, as in others, even when the lives of Italians were in question, Mr. Chapperon showed himself to be the rabid partisan of the dictator.

Seventh document.—A report by name of the foreigners who were barbarously assassinated by order of Marshal Lopez. From this report it will be seen that the number of Italians executed amounts to 29.

Eighth document.—Depositions of thirty foreigners, among whom some Italian subjects. The deposition of the Italians, Dr. Jerónimo Becchi e Domingos Parodi, merit special mention, which relate the cruelties practiced by Lopez against their countrymen, with the connivance of Mr. Chapperon.

Ninth document.—Deposition of the Italian, Antonio Montero, which confirms all that his countrymen had stated in the aforementioned depositions.

Tenth document.—Deposition of Angelo Benitz, sergeant of marines, and employed in the commissariat of the dictator. He declares that at Angostura there was shipped on board the Italian gun-boat "Veloce," a sum of money destined for the agent of Lopez in France, Gregorio Benitez.

Eleventh document.—Deposition of other residents in Paraguay, which confirms the preceding statements.

Twelfth document.—A letter in which D. Rosalia Domeg Concepcion Decond claims deposits from the Italian consul; and a letter from the latter acknowledging the deposit, and stating that his house was sacked in October, 1868, much before the entry of the Brazilian forces.

Thirteenth document.—Declarations of Madame Laserre, from which it is seen that the houses in Asuncion were forced by the Paraguayan authorities immediately after the abandonment of the said capital in February, 1868.

Fourteenth document.—Report made by the Duke of Caxias, on the 1st July, 1869. This report is accompanied by two letters, written by Luiz Caminos, minister of the dictator.

From these documents and others mentioned in the schedule annexed, which, as has already been stated, is signed by the chief clerk of this department, and an abstract of which is not made, that this memorandum may not be too much extended, it is seen that Mr. Chapperon is accused by his countrymen of not having respected the neutrality which his government had imposed upon itself in the war with Paraguay, of having served as a docile instrument in the hands of President Lopez and Madame Lynch, in the persecutions and spoliations of which they were the victims; of not having opposed the least resistance to the execution of many Italians, being declared responsible for all the calamities which they suffered in Paraguay. It is his compatriots who dispute the sacking, by him attributed to the Brazilian troops.

Among the Italians interrogated were some who had deposited property at the consulate.

In one of the documents annexed to the note of Mr. Cavalchini of the 6th December, 1869, are read the names of thirty-nine Italians, who, according to the statement of Mr. Chapperon, suffered losses by the Brazilian forces. The imperial government ordered an inquest in reference to the complaints set forth in that document. The result of this inquest confirms all that has been stated in this memorandum, as well as the replies of the commander-in-chief of the Brazilian forces and of the imperial government. Of the Italians referred to, some have died and others were executed after having suffered unheard-of tortures. It is impossible to discover, notwithstanding the efforts made, the fate of many; but those who escaped the wrath of the dictator were interrogated by the Brazilian authorities, and their depositions are annexed to the present memorandum.

Document No. 22 shows the Italians deceased, those whose fate is unknown, and those who deposited.

To make evident the irregularity with which the statement under consideration was prepared, when other proofs were wanting, the deposition of the Italian, Catilina Buero de Achinelli, would suffice. She states: "That the withdrawal of families from the city having been decreed, and she, the informant, finding herself much embarrassed in regard to the transportation of her property, as her mother, being very old, could not live much longer, she applied to the consul to take charge of a trunk for her; that the informant not being able, however, to go beyond Luque, where she afterward met the said consul, she received again from him the said trunk intact, paying only as a fee for that deposit the sum of ninety-seven dollars and six reales and a half, more or less, for which the consul did not hesitate to pass a receipt." Nevertheless this lady figures in the aforesaid statement as a claimant for $2,270 for deposits made at the consulate on the 22d February, 1868. Giacomo Columbino and José Ponzo, also mentioned as claimants, deny the allegations of Mr. Chapperon, who is designated by them as the author of all the misfortunes of their compatriots. The statements of these three Italian subjects form part of the document No. 5. In another statement, also annexed to the said note of the 6th December, Mrs. Suzanna Aramburm is presented as a claimant. From document No. 3, it will be seen that this lady does not impute to the Brazilian army the disappearance of the articles deposited by her at the Italian consulate. In fine, there is not one single evidence in support of Mr. Chapperon; while the Brazilian government presents not only incontestable dates and facts, but also valid documents which destroy them. From the information given by all the Italian subjects found at Asuncion, it is shown that Mr. Chapperon never gave the least protection to his countrymen, who, on the contrary, bring against him grave accusations even as to his conduct with reference to the property which was confided to him. Very different was the conduct of the Brazilian army. Being fortunate enough to rescue from the power of the dictator some Italians, it furnished them clothing, food, &c. Nevertheless the blame of having sacked the property of Italian subjects is thrown upon the liberating army to so many unfortunates, and which, as is shown by documents Nos. 15 and 16, delivered to the provisional government of Paraguay property taken from the enemy on battle-fields and in fortresses. What more generous or more noble conduct could have practiced the army of the most civilized nation, under like circumstances?

On the occasions of the abandonment of Asuncion and Luque, the Italians residing in those cities suffered great outrages; and what defense had they? The statements of the Italian subjects, who escaped from the hands of the dictator, give a sad, very sad answer to this question. It must not be forgotten that large sums which might have been considered, under consular right, as prize to the victor, were scrupulously delivered to the provisional government; and that all claims for damages, alleged and proven, in consequence of the operations of the Brazilian army, were immediately paid by the respective chiefs, who always made it their pride not to give cause for acts of their subordinates, for any the most insignificant representation.

When the enemy by treachery invaded the Brazilian territory, he devastated everything, sacked everything, sacrificed everybody, respecting neither children nor young girls, neither the old, the sick, nor the clergy. The Brazilians, from the moment they trod the enemy's soil, protected all they encountered without respect to nationality. Of this noble proceeding, which cannot be contested, the empire is proud. After the most bloody battles, the first care of the Brazilian generals was to succor those who were dying from destitution, from cruelty and torture, the narrative of which causes horror and surprise; the solicitude of the Brazilians in this human endeavor being attested by Italian subjects and other foreigners.

The narrative of the misfortunes of the Italians resident in Paraguay, deprived of all protection until the arrival of the Brazilian army at the places of their sufferings, must necessarily interest the government of His Majesty the King of Italy.

The government of Brazil, full of confidence in the impartiality and rectitude of that of Italy, awaits the judgment of this, after the reading of the present memorandum and the examination of the documents annexed.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Rio de Janeiro, August 26, 1871. (Received Sept. 21.)

SIR: Inviting your reference, in connection herewith, to Mr. Wright's Nos. 164, 167, 174, 178, and 185, I beg to send you, annexed hereto, a translation of a note received from the foreign office here, dated July 22, 1871, in reply to Mr. Wright's last note to this government, of the 3d of June, in reference to the property found in the house (No. 95 Calle de Justicia) at Asuncion, and which had been occupied by the United States minister to Paraguay.

It will be seen that the Brazilian government, while declining to admit responsibility for the articles stated to have been left in that house, of which they had no knowledge until their troops entered the place, and their officers had a few days afterward taken account thereof, nevertheless renew their offer, previously made in the note of the 31st of May, to restore the box (labeled "Legation of the United States") as soon as found, "together with the other objects found in that house."

Mr. Correia has since informed me, in conversation, that the box has been found; but he added he could not say at that moment what "other objects" were embraced in that term, or what sum of money would be included, since it appeared from other proofs that the money and jewels found there (as set forth in the official lists, of which a translation is annexed and marked B) belonged to those who could have no right to reclaim them from this government.

I presume, however, from the last paragraphs of the annexed note, that they will surrender everything now existing here, and which they admit, from their list, was found in that house.

I will in a few days request Mr. Correia to deliver to the consul, for me, all such property; and will send such books, boxes, papers, &c., among them, as belong to the United States legation in Paraguay, to Mr. Stevens at Montevideo, by the Ticonderoga, or the first vessel which goes there.

I am, &c.,

JAMES R. PARTRIDGE.

No. 1.

Report of what was found in the house No. 95 of Rua da Justica, in Asuncion.

On the 6th of January, 1869, in this city of Asuncion, at the government palace of the republic of Paraguay, were present the commission, composed of Colonel Hermes Ernesto de Fonseca, Lieutenant Colonels Antonio Joaquim Bacellar and Joaquim Cavalcanti de Albuquerque Bello, Majors Joaquim Antonio Dias, Pedro Alves de Alencar, Manuel Antonio Rodrigues, and José Libanio de Souza, charged with the delivery of money and jewels found in the house No. 95 of Rua da Justica.

There were also present the commission appointed by his excellency the marshal of the army, Marques de Caxias, embracing intendant of the departments of finance João Baptista de Figueiredo, chief of the fiscal department, Sebastião Marques de Souza, of the pay department, Joaquim Antonio Varques, major assistant to chief of staff Luiz Eduardo de Carvalho, and the first officer to the intendant Frederico Augusta de Menezes Lara, charged with the receiving of the said money and jewels. Proceeding to an examination they found in two trunks the value of 29,612$780 in the following pieces:

12,859 silver patacas, valued at.....	2$000 reis each.
1,235 silver coins, (5 francs,) valued at.....	1$800 reis each.
774 Bolivian pieces, valued at.....	1$600 reis each.
33 coins, valued at.....	1$000 reis each.
15 coins, valued at.....	0$500 reis each.
260 coins, valued at.....	0$400 reis each.
243 coins, valued at.....	0$200 reis each.
32 Bolivian coin, valued at.....	0$800 reis each.
1 dollar coin, valued at.....	1$900 reis each.
1 coin, valued at.....	1$280 reis each.

and Brazilian silver coin to the amount of 211$500 reis—all of which was turned into the military chest of the army, as well as the jewels which still remain there deposited; and inventories will be made of them as of any other articles which may be hereafter found.

The work of the day being ended, I, Frederico de Menezes Lara, first officer to the intendant of finance, serving as secretary of the commission, have framed this present report, signed by the members of the above-mentioned commissions.

No. 2.

Report of an examination made of some packages and a chest found in the house No. 95 of Rua da Justica, in Asuncion.

On the 7th of January, 1869, in the city of Asuncion, in the house No. 95 of Rua da Justica, were present the commission, embracing the following officers: Colonel Hermes Ernesto da Fonseca, Lieutenant Colonel Antonio Joaquim Bacellar, Lieutenant Colonel Joaquim Calvacanti de Albuquerque Bella, Major Joaquim Antonio Dias, Major Pedro Alves de Alencar, Major Manuel Antonio Rodrigues, Major José Libanio de Souza, charged with the delivery of money and jewels found in the said house, to the commission appointed by his excellency the marshal of the army, Marques de Caxias, which commission also was present, and composed of the following: Intendant of the department of finance, João Baptista de Figueiredo; chief of the fiscal department, Sebastiao Marqués de Souza; officer of the pay department, Joaquim Antonio Vasques; major and assistant to chief of staff, Luiz Eduardo de Carvalho; first officer to the intendant, Frederico Augusta de Menezes Lara. Proceeding to an examination of some packages and a chest that were in the house mentioned above, they found money and jewels, all of which were placed in a box which was completely sealed, to be opened on the following day. The door of entrance to the house was also sealed, it being too late to make an inventory. In view of which, I, Frederico de Menezes Lara, first officer to the intendant of finance, serving as secretary of the commission, have framed this present report, signed by the members of the above-mentioned commissions.

Report of the examination and counting of the money found in the house No. 95 of Rua da Justica, in Asuncion.

On the 8th of January, 1869, in the city of Asuncion, met in the house No. 95 Rua da Justica, the commissioners, embracing Colonel Hermes Ernesto da Fonseca, Lieutenant Colonel Antonio Joaquim Bacellar, Lieutenant Colonel Joaquim Cavalcanti de Albuquerque Bella, Major Joaquim Antonio Dias, Major Pedro Alves de Alencar, Major Manuel Antonio Rodrigues, Major José Libanio de Souza, charged with the delivery of the money, jewels, and other articles of value, which were yesterday and to-day found in all the packages and chests that were in the above-mentioned house; and proceeding to count the money in the presence of the commission appointed by his excellency, the marshal of the army, Marques de Caxias, composed of the intendant of the financial departments, João Baptista de Figueiredo; chief of the fiscal department, Sebastiao Marqués de Souza; officer of the pay department, Joaquim Antonio Vasques; major and assistant to chief of staff, Luiz Eduardo de Carvalho; first officer to the intendant, Frederico Augusta de Menezes Lara; the whole amounted to the sum of 8,861$120, as follows:

114 gold ounces, valued at.....	30$000 each.
4 Brazilian gold pieces, valued at	20$000 each.
3 sterling pounds, valued at	8$590 each.
2 twenty franc pieces, valued at	7$200 each.
3 quarter ounces, valued at.....	7$500 each.
1 Oitava, valued at	3$705 each.
3 gold patacoes, valued at	1$900 each.
1,904 silver patacoes, valued at.....	2$000 each.
144 silver coins, (5 francs) valued at.....	1$800 each.
161½ Brazilian pieces, valued at	1$600 each.
29 coins, valued at	1$000 each.
6 coins, valued at	0$500 each.
721 coins, valued at	0$400 each.
1,923 coins, valued at	0$200 each.
25 coins, valued at.....	0$100 each.
Also Brazilian notes to the value of.....	255$000

Having delivered this money to the pay department of the army, as well as a chest closed, with the name of Antonio Nin Reyes marked upon it with chalk, to be opened to-morrow, and also a box, properly sealed, containing jewels and other articles of value, which are deposited in the same department, and of which an inventory is yet to be made; and nothing more having been found in the above-mentioned house, I, Frederico de Menezes Lara, first officer to the intendant of finance, serving as secretary of the commission, have framed this present report, signed by the members of the above-mentioned commission.

Report of the delivery of money into the pay department of the army.

On the 9th of January, 1869, in the city of Asuncion, met at the pay department of the army the commission, embracing Colonel Hermes Ernesto da Fonseca, Lieutenant Colonel Antonio Joaquim Bacellar, Lieutenant Colonel Joaquim Cavalcanti de Albuquerque Bello, Major Joaquim Antonio Dias, Major Pedro Alves da Alencar, Major Manuel Antonio Rodrigues, Major José Libanio de Souza, to assist at the opening of the chest deposited yesterday in that department, and to deliver the money which may be therein found, to the commission which was also present, appointed by his excellency, marshal of the army, Marques de Caxias, and composed of the intendant of the department of finance, João Baptista de Figueiredo; chief of the fiscal department, Sebastiao Marquez de Souza; officer of the pay department, Joaquim Antonio Varques; major and assistant to chief of staff, Luiz Eduardo de Carvalho; first officer to the intendant, Frederico Augusta Menezes Lara.

The said chest having been opened, there was found a sack containing the amount of 502,800, as follows: One hundred and ninety-six silver patacos, valued at 2,800 each; forty-two silver coins, (5-francs,) valued at 1,800 each; twenty-two Bolivian pieces, valued at 1,600 each, all of which was turned over to the pay department; and I, Frederico de Menezes Lara, first officer to the intendant of finance, serving as secretary of the commission, have framed the present report, signed by the members of the above-mentioned commission.

Report of the delivery of jewels and money found in the previously mentioned house.

On the 11th of January, 1869, in the city of Asuncion, at the pay department of the army, met Colonel Hermes Ernesto da Fonseca; Intendant João Baptista de Figueiredo; Lieutenant Colonel Antonio Joaquim Bacellar; chief of fiscal department, Joaquim Antonio Vasques; major and assistant to chief of staff, Luiz Eduardo de Carvalho; Major Pedro Alves da Alencar; Major Joaquim Antonio Dias; Major José Libanio de Souza; Major Manuel Antonio Rodrigues; first officer, Frederico Augusta de Menezes Lara, members of a commission charged with the delivery of the jewels, and other articles of value found in the house No. 95 of Rua de Justica, and which on the 8th instant were deposited in that department in a box closed and sealed, and of the contents of which an inventory was to be subsequently made.

The said box was to-day opened in the presence of the above-mentioned commission, as well as the commission appointed by his excellency, marshal of the army, Marques de Caxias, composed of the intendant of the departments of finance, João Baptista de Figueiredo; chief of the fiscal department, Sebastiao Marquez de Souza; officer of the pay department, Joaquim Antonio Vasques; major and assistant to chief of staff, Luiz Eduardo de Carvalho; first officer to the intendant, Frederico Augusta de Menezes Lara, to receive the said jewels and other articles, of which the following inventory was taken:

1 pair of reins, silver-mounted.
1 headstall, silver-mounted.
1 inkstand.
1 sand-box, silver-mounted.
1 large cup, with silver ornaments.
7 small cups, with silver ornaments.
2 pairs of silver spurs.
3 whip-handles, silver-mounted.
1 small silver coal-holder, (for lighting cigars,) [fogareiro] with wooden handle.
1 wooden mug, with silver ornaments.
4 gold watches, broken, numbered respectively 85,966, 2,914, 2,375, 1,176.
3 small gold watches, with open dials.
1 gold bracelet.
1 pair of gold ear-rings.
2 combs, with gold ornaments.
1 ordinary silver watch, broken.
1 box, with gold pin and ear-rings, enameled.
2 pins, with brilliants, one having ten stones.

1 pair of ear-rings, with brilliants, broken.
3 rings, with brilliants, one being broken.
10 gold bracelets, French, of 14 carats, two of coral.
3 gold pins, of different kinds, French, of 14 carats.
2 watch-chains, of different kinds, French, of 14 carats.
1 golden dove, enameled, with brilliants.
16 gold rings, of different kinds, French, of 14 carats.
4 gold crosses, of different kinds, French, of 14 carats.
1 gold cross, of enamel.
1 gold heart, of coral, French, of 14 carats.
1 gold heart, of enamel.
20 pairs of ear-rings, of different kinds, French, some having ordinary stones.
2 small gold lockets, for miniatures and hair.
2 small gold buttons, of 14 carats, and different articles of gold of 18 carats, weighing 20½ ounces.

Having taken an inventory of everything the box contained, it was sealed up anew and placed in the pay department, subject to the final order of his excellency, marshal of the army, Marques de Caxias, and I, Frederico de Menzes Lara, first officer to the intendant of finances, serving as secretary of the commission, have framed the present report, signed by the members of the above-mentioned commission.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Rio de Janeiro, September 8, 1871. (Received October 7.)

SIR: I beg to inform you that the United States sloop-of-war Portsmouth, Commander A. A. Semmes, left this port on the 5th of September, bound for home, (New York,) at the expiration of her term of service on this station. She had on board four families, (United States citizens,) who, under the instructions of the State and Navy Departments, were allowed to return in her to the United States, in all twenty-four persons.

There were others, quite a number, self-exiled from the Southern States, now in the province of San Paulo, (south of this,) where I understand there are still between three and four hundred in all, very many of whom are exceedingly anxious to avail themselves of the generosity of our Government, which they are now glad to call their Government also, to return to the home they left. Their experience has convinced them of their mistake, and few things have caused greater admiration in Brazil, where those exiles formerly loudly boasted of the reasons which brought them here, than the generosity and magnanimity of this present Administration, which, upon their repentance and solicitation, gives them free passage home again, even on vessels of war.

The Portsmouth did not delay long enough in this port to enable many of those persons, for whom she still had room, to join her here in time.

It is my intention shortly to make a visit to the province of San Paulo, (as my predecessor, Mr. Blow, did,) after which I will be able to report to you the condition and disposition of those who still remain and are desirous to return.

In the mean time it will be gratifying to me to receive your instructions as to whether any arrangements can be made for chartering a vessel for, or paying passage to the United States, of such among them as meet the conditions of the Government's generosity, so that such now in great need may be carried back before the expiration of the flag-ship's cruise, (some months hence,) and which would probably not have accommodations for any considerable number.

The Ticonderoga, Commander O. C. Badger, proceeded on the same day (5th) to the river Plate, and the flag-ship Lancaster is still in this harbor, where Rear-Admiral Lanman remained, at my request, so as to participate with the other vessels of war in salutes, &c., on the 7th of September, the anniversary of Brazilian independence.

I have enjoyed the pleasantest intercourse with the admiral and the officers of the fleet.

I have, &c.,

JAMES R. PARTRIDGE.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Santiago de Chili, February 15, 1871. (Received March 16.)

SIR: I have the honor to report that on the 19th of January last, accompanied by General J. C. Caldwell, United States consul at Valparaiso, and several other American gentlemen, I proceeded from Santiago to Llaillai by railroad, thence by stage, passing through San Felipe to Santa Rosa de los Andes, where we arrived the same night. This city being near the mountains, we there prepared for our journey, which we commenced early on the morning of the 22d. The third day we passed the cumbre, or highest point, called the Nspullata Pass, at an elevation of 12,656 feet above the sea. The summit was passed at 10 a. m., thermometer standing 40° F.; our barometer, a small pocket one, proved worthless when above 9,000 feet. The cumbre of this pass is between two and three hundred feet in length, and the same in width. The immediate ascent and descent are comparatively easy. The wind, which later in the day is very strong, during the forenoon is quite bearable. The view from this point is truly grand and sublime. From either side, looking north or south, the highest peaks of the Andes, with their pinnacles veiled in mantles of eternal snow, are in full view, and, as seen rising from almost fathomless abysses, gorges, cañons, and lesser heights, to their homes among the clouds, present a picture of sublimity and awful grandeur never to be forgotten by the beholder. This night we rested at the "Puerta del Inca," a natural bridge nearly a hundred feet from the water of the Rio de los Cuevas, and is one hundred and fifty feet wide and three hundred feet in length. Beneath this bridge, on one side, are several warm baths of a saline character, possessed of many medicinal virtues, and except for the difficulty of reaching would be much frequented. Their uniform temperature, by my thermometer, was 92 degrees. Beautiful stalactite formations completely covered the under side of this bridge. The appearance of the mountains on the east side of the pass is in marked contrast with that of the west. The former presents a sharp, angular, hard, unyielding, and undecaying surface. The rocky points seem to stand out in bold relief, bidding defiance to time or the action of all the elements of nature, while the moment the cumbre is passed a distinct change is observed. The whole face of the mountain scenery seems mellowed and softened. The highest peaks discernible beneath the snow seem crumbling and fast going through the process of disintegration, being thus prepared for the vegetation of the valleys and vast plains below and beyond, toward which every shower and melting snow carries a bountiful supply. Nothing of especial interest occurred until our arrival in the ill-fated city of Mendoza, in the Argentine Republic, situated about thirty miles from the base of the Cordilleras, on the vast plains or pampas, which stretch hundreds of miles to the east. This place we reached the eighth day.

Mendoza was destroyed by an earthquake the 20th of March, 1861, between 8 and 9 in the evening. Having been kindly furnished with letters of introduction to some of the principal men here, as well as elsewhere on our route, we were enabled to obtain correct information touching the sad history of this city. The "tremble," or "shake," lasted from three to five minutes, during which time the town was completely destroyed; not a house was left standing; fifteen thousand persons, out of a population of twenty thousand inhabitants, were instantly buried beneath the ruins of the fallen buildings. For the next two years most of the living went either into the country or some other town or city. After this period, many of the old inhabitants commenced to return and to rebuild, and were rapidly joined by others, so that now Mendoza is a thriving place of nearly or quite twelve thousand inhabitants. The new town is mainly built adjacent to the old one, which still lies in crumbling ruins, with only here and there an old residence rebuilt. Hundreds of skulls and other human bones, especially in the neighborhood of churches, lie scattered around in careless and apparently unnoticed condition. Those in the vicinity of churches were evidently the remains of women and children, who at that hour were attending vespers. The men in these Catholic countries, I have noticed, are not as punctilious in their observances of church demands as the females. Most of the buildings in the city were made of adobe. The oldest church, (the church of San Francisco,) built by the Spaniards, was one of the strongest pieces of brick masonry I have ever seen, with walls from ten to fifteen feet thick, yet this edifice was shattered as though made of the most brittle material. Perhaps, as part excuse for allowing such an apparent neglect of the dead to appear, it should be remembered that the dead outnumbered the living as three to one. Many who were not instantly killed were burned alive by fires which raged in different parts of the city. Though multitudes have been extricated and buried, it is supposed that at the present time there are about six thousand bodies lying just as the sad catastrophe overtook them. Perhaps I may be pardoned for suggesting a theory for the destruction of this place, and if true it may throw light upon similarly situated cities which have been destroyed. Mendoza, from all information obtained, was the center or nearly so of this earthquake; a few miles from the city upon a level plain, at the time of the disaster, the earth opened with great power and violence, and threw each way, in a lateral direction, for the distance of several hundred feet, immense quantities of earth, making an elevation of the surface thereof at the present time nearly thirty feet high. At the same time large quantities of water were thrown forth, and from that to the present time about fifty springs have been in lively operation, from which flows a large supply of cool and slightly mineral water, so much so, that several small buildings have been erected near, and this place has become a great resort for public bathing. My theory is that a reservoir of water, far up the Andes, suddenly opened into one of the subterranean water-courses leading from those vast heights, beneath the surface of the earth, under the plains, and in the vicinity of Mendoza, and that by mere hydraulic pressure the earth was forced up, and when this pressure was relieved, as was done when the earth was burst asunder and the earth and water poured forth where the springs now are, the earth fell back to its original position, causing the terrible shock with its consequences. In this view a similar "shake" may occur at any time to any place situated on a vast plain at the base of exceedingly high mountains. I found that the force of the shock gradually diminished in every direction from the vicinity of these springs. Neither fire nor smoke was known to issue from the earth in any direction at this time. The above ideas have at least the merit of pure originality with me, never having known of their being suggested previously from any quarter, but with all these facts before me I am fully satisfied of the correctness of my theory.

After two days in Mendoza, we commenced our return by the Potillo Pass, situated about sixty miles south of the Nspullata route, on reaching which we marched two days across the pampas, often being reminded of the prairies of the West, though far from being as fertile. Much of the distance was quite sandy and barren. A few guanacas and ostriches were seen, and some smaller game. More rain falls on the eastern than the western slope of the Andes, so that there is considerable verdure in places even without irrigation, which is rarely true of the west side of the mountains. On this route there are two distinct ridges or passes, with a valley between, occupying a day's march. Both of these passes or cumbres are much higher than the Nspullata cumbre, and have a faint resemblance thereto, each, however, being much narrower. I attempted to light a fire for the purpose of ascertaining at what degrees water would boil at the summit, but was doomed to utter failure, notwithstanding I had all the necessary appliances, as I supposed. My matches would only fuse an instant and then go out. The driest paper and pine shavings would not ignite. The brandy of one of the company would not burn. Unfortunately my alcohol lamp I had left behind. The rarefied air was not sufficiently filled with oxygen for my experiment. The thermometer at 10 a. m. stood at 31°. The next day, after passing through the eastern portion of the valley, we passed the west Potillo Pass at 7 a. m. This pass is much higher than the latter; thermometer 29°. A frosty mist encircled us as we passed the cumbre. From the last Potillo we obtained a good view of Tapungato, lying a few miles north of us, 22,450 feet high, the highest mountain in the Western hemisphere. Aconcagua, 22,296 feet high and sixty miles northward, is not visible on this route. The west Potillo is the highest of these passes, being nearly fifteen thousand feet above the sea. All these summits should be passed as early in the day as possible for fear of the wind, which toward night is often very strong and dangerous. Soon after passing our last cumbre a violent snow-storm commenced, which continued, as we subsequently learned, for several days, making the summit impassable for a time, and preventing several thousand head of cattle from continuing their march from the Argentine Republic to Chili, thereby causing great loss of stock; vast numbers of these starved and frozen animals becoming food for the thousands of huge condors that seem to be alone the living inhabitants of these lofty solitudes, among, in, and above the clouds. I ought to state that in very many places on both routes we saw sure indications of great mineral wealth, and several copper and silver mines were in successful operation. Just three weeks from our departure we safely arrived in Santiago. On our entire route, though avoiding as much as possible any appearance of display or official show, we were treated with marked kindness and distinguished courtesy, and everywhere found the United States recognized as the great nation of the world, whose sympathies were especially extended to all sister republics.

I beg pardon for so long a report which, however, might easily have been greatly extended, with perhaps more interesting details than those here hurriedly given.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, October 25, 1870. (Received December 28.)

SIR: In my No. 31, of the 26th of September, you were informed that the chargé d'affaires of France had called his colleagues together and made known to them the punishment which this government proposed to inflict upon those who were engaged in the massacre at Tien-tsin. He also stated that, at the time the communication was made he was asked, in rather an imperious manner, if the proposition was satisfactory. His reply, as stated to his colleagues, was that in the present disturbed condition of his country he did not feel at liberty to speak for the government of France on so grave a matter, and that, as the punishment of the guilty had such a direct bearing upon the security of all foreign residents, it seemed in every respect desirable for him to assemble his colleagues and solicit their opinions before making any reply to the question submitted.

The manner in which the propositions were made, and the fact that M. Rochechouart had unwisely, as I thought, made known to the officials in advance his intention of submitting the question to his colleagues, left no other course open for them to pursue, except to express their approval or disapproval without qualification or explanation. In view of these considerations it was deemed advisable for the representatives of Great Britain, Russia, Prussia, and the United States to address a joint note to Prince Kung, expressing their dissent from the conclusions to which the government had arrived as to the proper measure of punishment which was necessary to inflict for such a crime, leaving it to the Chinese to decide what, if any, further action it might be proper and expedient for them to take. A copy of the joint note is herewith inclosed, (inclosure A.)

To this Prince Kung replied, (inclosure B,) intimating that the investigation and trials were closed, and that as soon as the sentences were formally pronounced, the result would be officially communicated to all the legations. He also begged to assure us that ample protection would be afforded to all foreign residents.

The two imperial decrees (inclosures C and D,) confirming the sentences of the criminals and ordering them to be carried into effect immediately, and my reply acknowledging their receipt, (inclosure E,) also accompany this.

As a measure of precaution against a recurrence of trouble at Tientsin during the approaching winter, the governor general has been ordered by the Emperor (inclosure F) to remain there until further orders; and I learn, unofficially, of the contemplated removal of the capital of the province from Paoting-fu to Tien-tsin, so that the chief magistrate of the province will be more accessible in case of real or apprehended trouble, and thus be able to preserve a better understanding between natives and foreigners.

The report of the acting French consul at Tien-tsin, of which the chargé d'affaires has kindly allowed me to take a copy, (inclosure G,) will furnish you with full particulars of the execution of sixteen criminals, and the state of feeling resulting from it.

He also gives his opinion as to the effect which these convictions and executions are likely to produce upon the people generally, which, I regret to say, differ widely from what I had hoped.

I trust the effect will be better than he anticipates. But whatever may be the result in Tientsin and in its immediate vicinity, I am persuaded that the knowledge that these criminals have been punished will add to the security of foreigners in places more remote from the scene of their trial and execution.

The remaining four under sentence of death were convicted of the murder of three Russians. Their execution is, I am informed, delayed at the special request of the Russian consul general, in the hope that their testimony may be useful in the conviction of others charged with complicity in the massacre.

A careful review of all that has transpired in connection with this affair—the timidity and vacillation of the officials; the delay and uncertainty attending the arrest and trial of the offenders; the fear of trouble and riotous proceedings at their execution; the extreme caution exercised in the preparation for and the secrecy of the execution—illustrates most painfully the weakness of the government when called upon to perform a duty in opposition to public opinion, and enables somewhat of a just estimate to be made of the embarrassments which surround the prince and his associates in their dealings with foreign nations.

The natural result of this is, I am led to view their action, or rather inaction, with more leniency than those do who know less of the difficulties with which the members of the Foreign Office have to contend.

Chunghow, who was some time since appointed ambassador to France, for the purpose of offering a suitable apology, and affording such reparation as might be reasonably demanded, is making preparations for his departure. Before he leaves I expect to be placed in possession of a copy of his instructions and the substance of the propositions which he will be authorized to make to the government of France in satisfaction for the outrages committed at Tien-tsin, which will be forwarded in a future dispatch.

PEKING, September 24, 1870.

SIR: The undersigned, representatives of the United States, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia, have the honor to inform your Imperial Highness that M. de Rochechouart, as he sent yesterday to the Yamen to state was his intention, has assembled us, his colleagues, for the purpose of communicating to us the measures of punishment which your Imperial Highness has apprised him the government is about to award to the mandarins and people engaged in or connected with massacre at Tientsin.

We conceive it to be our duty without loss of time to state to your Imperial Highness that we regard the decision arrived at, after three months' delay, as utterly unsatisfactory, whether with reference to the atrocity of the 21st June in particular, or the general question of security in which all foreigners in China are interested.

The undersigned seize with eagerness this occasion to renew to your Imperial Highness the assurances of our respectful consideration.

Minister for North Germany.

B.

TUNGCHI, 9th year, 9th moon, 3d day, (September 27, 1870.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary for foreign affairs, herewith sends a reply.

I had the honor to receive the joint note of the 24th instant addressed to me by your excellencies, in which you state that Mr. Rochechonart, chargé d'affaires of France, had informed you at a meeting, which he had called for general consultation, of the decision which had been come to in regard to the punishment of the murderers in June last of the French officials and subjects at Tientsin; and that you consider this decision, reached three months after the events, as entirely unsatisfactory and very far from giving that assurance of general security to all foreigners living in China, which they require.

You are already aware that His Majesty appointed Tsang Kwohfan, then governor general of this province, and others with him, to secretly search out and arrest the persons concerned in the riot, and execute those who had been tried and found guilty of murder; and also to take the depositions of the prefect and magistrate of Tien-tsin, who were so remiss in their duty, with all the evidence that could be obtained, and send it with the prisoners to the board of punishments, where they would be tried and sentenced. All this surely is proof that he wishes to act with strict justice in the matter.

The safety of foreigners residing in China will also be assured, for the people everywhere will notice how the murderers at Tien-tsin have been dealt with, and will not be desirous to experience the last penalty of the law on their own bodies, while local officials in every place will mark how those at Tientsin have been arrested and punished for their remissness in duty, and take warning to prevent like excesses.

When their cases and all relating to this affair are settled, His Majesty will issue a general mandate to all the high provincial officers to strictly enjoin on every local magistrate to protect the foreigners, so that hereafter it is to be hoped that they and the natives can live together peaceably. As soon as the cases of the prisoners are concluded, and I have received the commands of the Emperor, I will again communicate with your excellencies.

BARON REINFUES, Minister of the North German Confederation; HON. FREDERICK F. LOW, Minister of the United States; EUG. BUTZOW, Russian Chargé d'Affaires; THOMAS F. WADE, C. B., British Chargé d'Affaires.

C.

TUNGCHI, 9th year, 9th moon, 11th day, (October 5, 1870.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication.

The following imperial decree has this day been received:

When the quarrel arose at Tien-tsin between the citizens and the Roman Catholics, the prefect, Chang Kwang-tsao, and the district magistrate, Liu Kieh, neither took any precautionary measures to guard against the outbreak, nor exerted themselves after it occurred to speedily arrest the guilty persons concerned in it, in consequence of which orders were then transmitted to degrade them both, and deliver them to the board of punishments for trial and condemnation. Subsequent to this Tsang Kwoh-fan and his colleagues having taken their depositions in full, sent them to the custody of that board at Peking. The officers in this tribunal have now reported upon their case, saying: The statutes provide that when seditious people stir up a riot, the civil officers who cannot suppress it and allay the discontent, are to be degraded; if their offense is aggravated, they are to be banished to the army, and subjected to hard labor. As the circumstances of this case are very serious the board requests particular orders as to the increased sentence to be inflicted upon them.

Seeing that these two magistrates were intrusted with the government of the city of Tientsin, and when the people gathered in crowds ready for a riot they were inefficient in taking any measures to restrain them, so that the mob seized their opportunity to set fire to houses and kill and wound many people, and afterwards did nothing efficient to immediately seize the guilty actors, their criminality under all the circumstances is exceedingly great. Furthermore, after their degradation, and when they knew that the decree delivering them to the board of punishments for meting out their doom had been issued, the prefect Chang had the presumption to skulk off to Shuntch. (in the south of the province), and the district magistrate, Liu, to slip away to Mihyun, (near the great wall,) both thereby intending to prolong the matter, and making their contemptuous effrontery more manifest. Let both of them be banished to (Tsitsihar-) the region of the Amoor River, there to expiate their crimes by hard labor, as a signal warning to law-breakers.

The people of Tient-sin not only have cherished groundless suspicion and stirred up animosity in disregard of their authorities to be quiet, but suddenly went to such a daring length as to kill more than twenty persons; and what was still more atrocious, brutally murdered the Sisters of Charity in their asylum. Tsang Kwoh-fan and his colleagues have seized the guilty participators in the riot, and after clearly ascertaining the degree of their guilt, have sentenced Fung and fourteen others to death, and Wang and twenty others to banishment to the army. Since the sentences accord with the crimes, let them now be carried into effect. Let Fung and the others be immediately executed; and Wang and his party sent by couples to different places of banishment. These severe sentences being carried out, let the local authorities throughout the provinces issue the most peremptory orders to the people to observe the laws, and not again stir up riots. Whatever may arise that concerns both natives and foreigners, let it be managed with justice, and settled according to treaty stipulations. It is henceforth to be hoped that they will both, of whatever calling they may be, now live amicably together, and that the land will be quiet everywhere. Respect this.

I have now the honor to send the above to your excellency for your information.

His Excellency FREDERICK F. LOW,
U. S. Minister to China.

TUNGCHI, 9th year, 9th moon, 16th day, (October 10, 1870.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication.

I have already informed your excellency that a decree was received on the 6th instant, in relation to the Tientsin affair, in which it was ordered that the severe sentence on the prefect and district magistrate should be strictly carried into effect; that Fung and others, fifteen in all, who stirred up the riot, be executed; and that Wang and twenty others be banished to different regions.

I was honored by receiving a second decree yesterday upon the same matter; "Tsang Kwoh-fan and his colleagues report that they have further examined persons implicated in the riot at Tientsin, and have sentenced them according to their guilt. These persons were arrested after the others, and a list of their names has been sent up, with particulars of the trial, and degrees of punishment to be inflicted. These decisions are approved. Let Liu and the other four be summarily executed, and Táng and the other three be sent into banishment to different places. Respect this."

With the punishment of these men now arrested in addition. The cabinet ministers Tsang Kwoh-fan and Li Hung-chang report that the trial and sentence (of persons connected with the riot) has been brought to a close; and my object in this communication is to inform you of the same.

His Excellency FREDERICK F. LOW,
United States Minister to China.

E.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, October 17, 1870.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Highness's two dispatches of the 5th and 10th instant, the contents of which I have carefully noted. In the first, you mention the reception of imperial decree in relation to the riot at Tientsin, ordering that the prefect Chang Kwang-tsao and the district magistrate Lin Kieh be banished to the region of the Amoor to toilsomely work out their time; that Fung, with fourteen others, be executed; and Wang and twenty others be banished to different regions; in the second, you state that another decree has been received condemning Liu and four others, since arrested, to death, and Táng and his fellows, five in all, to banishment.

The sentences on the criminals connected with the dreadful tragedy at Tientsin, involving the loss of many lives and producing momentous consequences, must necessarily be reported to the President of the United States, for his information; and when I have received his instructions upon the matter, I shall again address your Imperial Highness.

I have, &c.,

FREDERICK F. LOW.

His Imperial Highness PRINCE KUNG, &c., &c., &c.

F,

TUNGCHI, 9th year, 9th moon, 18th day, (October 12, 1870.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith makes a communication.

I have been this day honored by receiving the following decree :

"Let Li Hung-chang still remain at Tientsin, and not hasten his return to Pao-ting, for (the provincial capital,) as it is important for him to attend to every detail connected with the pacification and repression of disorder there, in order to firmly settle the whole affair; which when done, both in relation to foreigners as well as natives, let him report for further instructions. Respect this."

In conformity to usage I now send this for your excellency's information.

His Excellency FREDERICK F. LOW,

United States Minister to China.

Copy of a dispatch from the acting French consul at Tientsin to the French chargé d'affaires, describing the execution of sixteen criminals.

OCTOBER 19, 1870.

With reference to your dispatch No. 29, of the 15th instant, I have the honor to report that the senior officer of the French navy here having expressed himself much averse to the sending of any one but a commissioned officer to witness the execution of the criminals now under sentence of death for the murders of the 21st June, we, after consultation with each other, decided that it was best, in view of the importance of the affair, to depute one of the commanders of the gun-boats stationed here, and Mr. Interpreter Frater, to be present on the occasion.

The whole subject of the proceedings at the execution was then discussed at an interview between the prefect and myself yesterday. He informed me that it was the desire of the governor general, as there was a possibility of a disturbance taking place among the already excited population, that the sentence of death should be carried into execution before sunrise to-day. The prefect insisted on the necessity of the French officer and Mr. Frater proceeding to the spot during the night, and in small chairs, under a guard of fifty men, which he would supply; and he hoped the attention of the crowd, which would be composed, notwithstanding the early hour, of weeping friends and relatives, and numerous rowdies, would not be attracted to them. I objected to these two officers proceeding in the undignified mode desired by him, and told him that I should not send any one to an execution that was to take place in the dark. He still maintained the necessity of putting the criminals to death at the time named; and after some discussion, during which the prefect gave unmistakable proofs of excitements having shown itself to a large extent among the people for the last three or four days, on account of the intended fate of these men, and did not conceal from me that the governor general was afraid of serious disturbance. I said that I would send no one to the execution under the present proposed arrangements, but that I should leave the whole matter to be settled by the governor general as he pleased. I added, however, that I wished to have some proofs of the reality of the executions supplied to me. These the prefect thought might be afforded by the spectacle of the confined remains, and he invited me to send some one to inspect them after the execution was over. He also asked whether a formal dispatch from the superintendent of trade, announcing the fact of the decapitation having taken place, would be received by me as evidence. This I consented to accept. The prefect said he was glad that his presence would not be required at the execution, and confessed that he himself would be afraid to go in any case. Before leaving, the prefect informed me that it was actually true that money payments were being made to the relatives of the men condemned to death, but that the sums were raised by public subscriptions.

I had previously directed Mr. Frater, the interpreter, to call in the early part of the day on the prefect, and arrange about the presence of the French naval officer and himself at the execution, and to tell the prefect, in my name, that it was expected of the Chinese authorities that steps would be taken to secure foreigners from molestation and insult.

The prefect thought it right to retire with Mr. Frater into a private room, where, after the exclusion of all the domestics and official attendants, who were ordered to retire, he conversed on everything relating to the execution in a whisper, and even then kept starting now and again, thinking some one was engaged in listening. The reason of his conduct was a fear that a distrust of the people of Tientsin felt by all the authorities, which he had to communicate to Mr. Frater, would leak out. The prefect, in fact, felt so ill at ease in his own yamen, (office,) that he at last desired that the discussion of the subject of the execution might be transferred to this consulate, whither he proceeded for that purpose shortly afterward, and this led to the above-mentioned interview I had with him.

In the night-time I sent one of the consular messengers to Tien-tsin, and instructed him to take note of what went on at the execution, and to bring back with him, if possible, the death-warrants attached to the bodies of the criminals, an inspection of which would furnish me with the names of the persons actually put to death. Mr. Frater gave the messenger his official card to be used in the event of his being driven back by the police. The messenger made a greater use of it than was intended, for by means of it he made his way to the district magistrate's yamen (office) before the criminals were brought out of jail, and saw the whole proceedings from that time till their death. He has reported to me that about two hundred police and soldiers escorted them from the jail to the district magistrate's court-room, where they were marshalled, sixteen in all. None of them would kneel to be bound when ordered to do so. They were all dressed in what is everywhere stated to be a government present, viz: new silk clothes, and wore on their feet shoes of elegant manufacture; their hair was dressed after the female fashion, in various modes, and ornaments such as those seen on the heads of Chinese ladies were stuck in their head-dresses. While in the court-room one of them vociferated abuse of the Hsie-tai, who had probably caused his arrest to be made.

On the way to the execution ground the criminals bawled to the crowds, which even at that early hour in the morning had collected, "Have we changed countenance?" and were answered immediately that they had not. They also accused the Chinese authorities of selling their heads to the foreigners, and called out to the people to honor them by the name of "brave boys," which was done by the united voices of the crowd. A large number of the personal friends and relatives of the condemned followed them along, giving vent to tears and lamentations. On the arrival of the procession at the execution ground outside the west gate the criminals commenced singing, on hearing which the presiding magistrate, the Fiat-Sing-Haien, gave the order for their decapitation.

The criminals themselves stretched out their necks to receive the blow, and the executioners, five or six in number, all of whom were southern soldiers, soon finished the proceedings.

This occurred about 5.30 a. m. The ground was kept by numerous soldiers. The consulate messenger was allowed to pick up the 16 death warrants and to bring them away, and I now have them in my possession.

The men who murdered the Russians were not, I believe, among those who suffered. The execution has passed off more peaceably than I expected, and this is probably owing to the secret nature of the arrangements made by the Chinese authorities.

From all that I have heard lately, the death of the murderers is not likely to impress the people much, and will probably only deepen their resentment against foreigners. There is no doubt but that the men who have been put to death have received, in the eyes of the populace, and, I am afraid, if all the reports that have been made to me are true, in the eyes of the authorities also, the fate of martyrs.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, November 22, 1870. (Received January 25.)

SIR: During the recent visit of Admiral Rodgers and Consul General Seward to Peking, an opportunity was afforded for the admiral, the consul general and myself, to consult together in regard to carrying out the instructions contained in your No. 9, with reference to opening negotiations with Corea.

It seemed in every respect desirable to select a favorable season for the visit to the coast of Corea, of which so little is known, and at the same time it was my desire to so arrange it as to interfere as little as possible with the plans of the admiral and the requirements of the naval forces in other places.

It is now determined—subject however to any change which may be rendered necessary by circumstances, either to the admiral or myself—that the expedition shall start from Shanghai, or Chefoo, the latter if possible, between the 1st and the 15th of May next. The line of procedure will so much depend upon the temper of the Corean officials that no definite plan can be decided upon at the present moment.

I shall be glad to avail myself of the services of Mr. Consul General Seward, and shall expect to profit by his experience, if he goes. He was shown your instructions to me, and invited to join the expedition. If he reaches China in season after his visit to India, where he goes for the winter, he may accompany me.

In order that the Coreans may not have any grounds on which to base technical objections, I have, most respectfully, to request that a commission may be sent, by the steamer leaving San Francisco not later than the 1st of March next, authorizing me to negotiate and sign on behalf of the United States such treaty or treaties with the government of Corea as may be deemed advisable.

During the winter I shall use every exertion to obtain information in regard to this unknown country from the Chinese authorities, and also, if possible, from the Corean officers accompanying the Tribute, which reaches Peking annually in December or January.

The North German minister in Japan attempted to open communication with Corea last summer. To facilitate his proceedings, he took a Japanese official with him, hoping by this means to reach the government of Corea. I inclose copy of an extract from a letter from the minister in Japan to the North German minister in Peking, (inclosure A,) giving a brief account of his visit and hasty departure. From this it appears that the Coreans are disposed to seize upon any subterfuge to oppose the entrance of foreigners into their dominions.

As stated in a former dispatch, I am not sanguine of favorable results: at the same time the object aimed at is worthy of the trial, and no effort on my part shall be wanting to accomplish it.

I have, &c.,

FREDERICK F. LOW.

[Translation from the German.]

Extract from a letter from M. Von Brandt, minister of the North German Union in Japan, to Baron de Rehfues Peking.

The vicinity of Corea induced us to make a little trip in this direction, and we arrived there on the forenoon of 1st June.

The harbor of Fusan is excellent, but the country dreadful; quite bare and yellow, only in some few places overgrown with wood, and quite deficiently cultivated. The Japanese station is a miserable colliery, most houses of which are in ruins. They are inhabited by half a dozen officials, and thirty or forty coolies, who are not allowed to absent themselves farther than half a mile from their lodgings, and are altogether very badly treated by the Coreans. My chief object was to obtain a clear insight into the whole matter, and through the interposition of an officer of the Japanese foreign office, whom we had on board, I requested the Japanese chief of the factory to tell the Corean officials that, in case they were desirous to receive a communication regarding shipwrecked German subjects, I could give them such information either on board or in the Japanese factory.

The answer to this proposition is highly characteristic, and will convey to you the plain truth about the state of affairs in these parts better than anything else. The Corean authorities thought it exceedingly impudent that the Japanese had delivered a message of this kind, and they also declared it quite improper that some Japanese had dared to come to Corea on board a foreign vessel. For these reasons the relations between the Japanese officials and the Corean government must be broken off immediately, and were not to be resumed until a Japanese on board the foreign vessel had left the country. This proof will be sufficient for you. I hastened, of course, to assure the Japanese officials that I should be inconsolable if any difficulties were likely to result to the Japanese from the circumstance that some of their officers were on board our ship. We would start, therefore, as soon as possible. This Captain Kohler did, on the 2d of June, after some gun-practice.

During a walk on shore, the people we met in the fields were tolerably courteous, but as we approached a village the whole of the inhabitants assembled in the street, offering passive resistance, and declaring that the Japanese were not allowed to go any farther. Of course we retreated courageously, and cannot complain about the people generally, who behaved themselves toward us in a more civilized manner than the brave Germans would have done toward the Koreans. They are strapping fellows, all dressed in white, as they are represented on pictures. Their villages and towns are miserable, like their junks and boats.

No arms whatever are to be seen, and are said to consist solely of matchlocks. During the gun-practice, a few thousand people with flags had assembled from a large town in the neighborhood, but on this occasion, too, no arms were seen.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, December 15, 1870.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that a careful estimate of the loss and damage sustained by the North China Branch of the American Board of Foreign Missions, by the action of the mob at Tien-tsin, on the 21st of June last, fixed the amount at 4,785¹⁰/₁₀₀ Tien-tsin taels, about $6,700.

The property destroyed consisted of one chapel building, with rooms adjoining suitable for a residence, the property of the society, and another small chapel in another part of the city, which was rented of the Chinese. The damage to the latter was estimated at 285⁵⁰/₁₀₀ taels.

The vice-consul, at Tien-tsin, by my authority and direction, presented the claim to the local authorities; and a settlement was made by their agreeing to rebuild the rented premises in a manner satisfactory to the owner, and the payment in money of the claim for damages to the larger chapel. This has all been done to my entire satisfaction. For more full particulars in regard to the adjustment of the claim, and the disposition of the funds, I beg to refer you to the vice-consul's dispatch to me, a copy of which accompanies this, (inclosure A.)

With reference to the additional claim mentioned by Mr. Meadows in his dispatch, which is preferred by the Rev. Mr. Stanley for losses and damage sustained by native Christians, and my decision upon this as well as upon all claims of a similar character, I have, most respectfully, to refer you to my dispatch to the vice-consul, a copy of which forms the inclosure D in my dispatch No. 40, of December 5th, to the Department. The settlement of this matter adjusts all legal and proper claims for losses or damages sustained by citizens of the United States in consequence of the riot at Tientsin, so far as I am at present informed.

Trusting that my action in the premises will receive the approval of the President, I have, &c.,

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Tien-tsin, November 18, 1870.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's dispatch dated 17th ultimo, instructing me to obtain from the Chinese authorities the sum of taels 4,785.⁰⁰/₁₀₀ for the chapels destroyed in Tientsin City, on the 21st of June last, by the Chinese people belonging to the North China Mission of the American Board of Foreign Missions. Immediately after the receipt of your dispatch I addressed his excellency Chung-lin on the subject, and handed him translation of the paper received from you, giving in detail the losses sustained, and the particular claims for each. Later, I had several interviews with Ma, the prefect, at my office, on this subject, and it was finally arranged by us that as he had, previously to the receipt of my dispatch, already begun erecting the second chapel near the west gate of the city, for which there were charged taels 235.⁰⁰/₁₀₀, by the wish of Rev. Mr. Stanley, that he should proceed with the work and finish it, and that the sum of taels 4,499.⁶⁰/₁₀₀ should be paid in cash as liquidation for the claim sent to me from the legation. I have now to inform your excellency that I last night received a dispatch from Ma, the prefect, inclosing a customs banker's order for the above-mentioned amount of taels 4,499.⁶⁰/₁₀₀, and that I this morning handed the order to Messrs. Russell & Co., of this post, with instructions to hold the amount to the credit of the North China Mission of the American Board of Foreign Missions; and I beg to inclose Messrs. Russell & Co.'s receipt for the amount which I obtained, in duplicate. I have further to inform you that the Rev. Mr. Stanley called on me a few days back to say that he had another claim to present to the Chinese authorities on account of some Chinese connected with the mission. I shall be obliged to you if you will give me instructions on this head for my guidance when I am called upon to address the authorities, as I take it for granted, although I have received no instructions from you on this matter, that the further claims meet with your approval.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, December 27, 1870. (Received February 24.)

SIR: A short time since a report came to me from Tientsin that the people there were preparing to give to the men that were executed for participation in the riot of last summer, a grand public funeral, and that funds were being collected to erect a tablet or temple to their memory. While it appeared desirable in every respect that the proper authorities should endeavor to prevent such proceedings, it did not seem to be a case in which a formal official protest by myself or my colleagues would be proper or becoming. I deemed it advisable, however, to send Mr. Williams to the Foreign Office with a verbal message pointing out the danger to be apprehended from a large popular assemblage such as would be collected at the funeral, and the evil effect the news of such proceedings would have abroad, and advising the government to take such measures as should be by the proper officers deemed advisable to put a stop to it. At the same time the vice-consul at Tientsin was instructed to call upon the viceroy and make similar friendly representations to him. Herewith I have the honor to inclose copy of a dispatch from the vice-consul giving a report of his interview with the viceroy, and the assurances of the latter that the proceedings contemplated will not be allowed to take place. This matter is important, chiefly as exhibiting the temper of the people of Tientsin, and I should not have troubled you with any reference to it but for the fact that the rumor, when it reaches Shanghai, will probably be seized upon and given undue prominence in the newspapers, and have the effect to keep alive the fears and apprehensions of the foreign community.

I have, &c.,

FREDERICK F. LOW.

Mr. Meadows to Mr. Low.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Tientsin, December 22, 1870.

SIR: On the 20th instant I called on Li-Hong-Chang, the viceroy, and brought on the subject of your last letter to me in regard to the report current at Peking, "that the people of Tientsin are preparing to give the beheaded martyrs a grand funeral, and that a memorial tablet or temple will be erected to their memory."

His excellency said that shortly after the executions a rumor was current in Tientsin that it was the intention of the people to erect a tsze-tang, (which we may, in this case, translate by the words a "sacrificial temple,") dedicated to the memory of the executed men, but that on the rumor reaching his ears, he at once called the prefect and magistrate (Chefoo and Chehsien) to him and ordered them to rigorously prevent any such action on the part of the inhabitants, if they actually contemplated it. He further added that the men had been punished in accordance with the laws of China, for the killing of foreigners, and as Chinese and foreigners were one family it could never be permitted by the territorial authorities that the people of Tien-tsin should be allowed to erect a tsze-tang to their memories; and if the attempt was made he himself, as the viceroy, would personally proceed to the spot and pull the building down.

On no account would it be permitted by the territorial officers. It was, however, he was sure, never the intention of the respectable inhabitants of Tientsin to do any such thing, and that rumor arose, he was confident, from some utterances of the lower orders, who were congregated at the place of execution. I am confident in the opinion that the viceroy would not allow the inhabitants of Tien-tsin to erect any such tsz-tang or temple as mentioned in your letter of 15th instant. I told the viceroy that I would report his words to your excellency, and I further added that you might be passing through Tientsin next spring on your way to the southern ports, which you had not yet visited. He said he would be very glad to see you if you came to Tientsin.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, January 10, 1871. (Received March 28.)

SIR: Hitherto I have confined myself to reporting, with as much care as possible, upon the present condition of affairs in China, without indulging in reflections as to the past or in speculations upon the future. This appeared to me to be the course of wisdom and prudence; and while the information given in this way might not be as full and complete as would be desirable, what you did receive would be more exact and reliable. And besides, time, observation, and experience seemed necessary to enable an impartial judgment to be formed with reference to a country and people about which there are so many antagonistic theories and diverse opinions as there are in regard to China and the Chinese. No forecast of the future would be likely to prove correct, or subserve any useful purpose unless founded upon a broader basis than the prevailing opinions and prophecies current here seemed to be.

In submitting some observations upon China, its social and political organization, its relations with the people and governments of other nations, and some speculations in regard to the future, I do it with some diffidence, knowing as I do that opinions upon these points differ so widely that the exact truth can only be approximated. Even with the same sources of information, different persons form different theories and arrive at opposite conclusions, each theory appearing plausible and all opinions containing more or less truth.

China is in itself a country of contradictions. No generalization is safe or likely to prove correct, for to fifty examples adduced to prove a given state of facts, one hundred may be brought forward to prove the contrary. This is true of the government as well as everything else.

Commencing with the Emperor and tracing the authority downward, nothing is seen but irresponsible autocratic power, which must of necessity make the government an absolute despotism; while if you begin at the bottom and go up through the several gradations of society and governmental authority, democracy appears to be a principle deeply embedded in the governmental structure, the popular will exercising a controlling influence over the officials—the officers evidently being guided, to a great extent, by the will of the governed. The fact is, however, that it is neither the one nor the other, but a strange mixture of both—despotism and democracy; of absolute authority vested in the Emperor to do all things according to his will, while this power is so hedged about by precedent and tradition that little can be effected except in obedience to the popular will.

In theory the Emperor is God's viceregent on earth, and the source of all law both human and divine. He claims to be, by right, the possessor of the soil; owner of all the resources of the country; the source of office from which come power, honor and emolument; and is entitled to the services of all male subjects between the ages of sixteen and sixty.

Were this theory carried out in practice the government of China would be the strongest of any on earth. One man's arbitrary will controlling and directing four hundred million of people has no parallel.

Against this theory may be safely stated as a fact that the power of the imperial government is weak, amounting to feebleness, exercising a control over its people rather nominal than real.

China is divided into eighteen provinces, each having a separate government, the chief officials of which are direct appointees of the Emperor. In theory, the provincial governments are instituted for convenience, to assist the imperial government in the exercise of its jurisdiction and authority over the people, while in fact the provinces are to all intents and purposes independent tributary states in which the authority of the central power is scarcely felt except through the provincial officials. The governments of the provinces in their workings appear to be a complete realization of the day-dreams of the more enthusiastic advocates of, and believers in, "State rights" in the United States.

The provincial officers are invested with legislative and judicial, as well as executive powers, and are, to all intents and purposes, supreme within their jurisdictions.

They grant leases for the land and receive the rental, fix the rate and mode of taxation, and cause the taxes to be levied and collected, and appropriate the proceeds, over and above what may be demanded by the central government as an annual contribution for its support, to defray the expenses of provincial administration. And when any extraordinary expenditure is rendered necessary, it is their duty to devise means for raising unusual taxes to meet the emergency. The officers of the provinces are expected to maintain peace and good order within their several jurisdictions; to repel invasion and suppress insurrection, and, if necessary for the purpose, to raise and organize troops and support them. They are required to do all this without having any fixed rules of law for their guidance. When any outbreak occurs, the fact is looked upon by the central government as prima facie evidence of the incapacity or dishonesty of the local officials, justifying instant removal from office and degradation.

By Chinese law, acts of omission are punished with as great or greater severity than acts of commission. If an insurrection occurs, it is quite according to precedent to use any available means to put it down, and it not unfrequently happens that leaders of guerrilla bands are rewarded with money, and even with office, as a quid pro quo for disbanding their marauding forces. If, on the other hand, force is resorted to to suppress insurrection, the maxim of Machiavelli appears to be the law of war: "It is safer to put an enemy to death, because, if his life be spared, he may stir up sedition again." Instances occur when men and money are ordered from other provinces to aid in suppressing revolt, but, as a rule, each province is expected to maintain peace without aid from elsewhere.

The chief officials of the provinces usually recommend or nominate persons to fill the subordinate offices. These recommendations require imperial sanction, which is rarely withheld, before they can become effective; a nomination being considered equal to an appointment. In this way by far the larger number of offices in the empire are filled by the high provincial offices, while in the theory all appointments are made by the Emperor alone.

Theoretically all offices are filled by the intelligent and educated only, the test of a literary examination being applied to all candidates, and only those who pass this ordeal with credit being considered eligible. The humblest person in the empire, if fitted by education, is eligible to the highest office below royalty. This rule is adhered to with a strictness and impartiality that would be highly creditable in any nation. As a proof of this a large proportion of the high officials at the present time are men of lowly origin. This system, admirable in itself, has stood the test of nearly eleven hundred years' practice. It has survived internal wars and changes of dynasty, and is to-day more firmly fixed in the polity of the empire and the affections of the people than any principle which governs this nation. Indeed it is about the only principle that has not so often been set aside from motives of policy that little is to be found of the original.

Great precautions are taken to secure absolute impartiality in the examinations, and I am convinced that they are conducted in a manner that would be creditable anywhere, and that equal and exact justice is substantially done. Much has been said and written by foreigners in regard to the sale of offices to non-graduates for money, and while it is undoubtedly true that this expedient has been resorted to in times of great financial distress, to replenish the government exchequer, I am inclined to believe that rank, and not office, is the chief thing sold and purchased. In other words, a title resembling somewhat a brevet rank in our Army, which carries with it honor but no emoluments, is the thing purchasable. To be sure a person holding rank is eligible to office, but as a matter of fact few of those that purchase rank are appointed to office.

The great drawback connected with this excellent system is the useless character of the education when applied to the practical concerns of life. What would be thought of the curriculum of our universities and colleges that included only the study of the Old Testament in English, and the Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic languages? Or of an examination in which the student, in order to entitle him to a diploma, would be required to exhibit a thorough knowledge of the three dead languages, and be able to recite from memory the Books of Moses, the Psalms of David, and the Proverbs of Solomon! And yet this is not an inapt illustration of the nature of a thorough course of Chinese instructions.

Education in this country includes a long and laborious course of study, consuming the best years of a life-time, and in the end the result is valueless for any useful purpose to the government or people.

Another glaring defect in the construction of society is that the hope of obtaining office is the great, if not the only, incentive to a thorough education. Office, which brings to its recipient honor, power, and reward, is the end and aim of all men in this country. With this end in view they will struggle in poverty through a long series of years, triennially submitting themselves to an examination, with ninety-nine chances in a hundred against success; and many who do obtain the coveted prize only succeed at the ages of 50, 60, and 70 years, when their mental and physical energies are well-nigh exhausted. So far as I can learn, few, if any, enter upon a thorough course of study with a view of fitting themselves for professional labors, or of applying their talents to any useful purpose in science or art.

Where there is such a scramble for place and power the number of unsuccessful ones must be very large. Scarcely one per cent. of those that compete triennially for the highest degree are successful; and when it is taken into consideration that only those that pass a successful provincial examination are entitled to compete at Peking, some estimate may be made of the vast numbers in the empire that enter the race for renown and reward.

Those who do not succeed constitute, by common consent, a middle class, commonly known as the "literati and gentry." The people of this class occupy a medium position between the officials and peasantry. They act as advisers to the lower classes, and their good offices are sought by the governing class in the management of local concerns. By their superior intelligence they are enabled to control most of the property, and yet few acquire such wealth as would enable them to oppress the people, were they so disposed.

This class create the public opinion of the country, which exercises a controlling influence over the officials, and is usually powerful enough to thwart the intentions and nullify the action of the officers, from the Emperor down, whenever popular rights are in danger of being invaded or the people unduly oppressed. So powerful is the influence of the literati that all officials endeavor to conform their action to the popular will, and in this view the government of China is essentially democratic in practice.

Where offices are obtained at the cost of so much labor and expense, the officials expect to reimburse themselves for all their trouble when position is once obtained, and, if report be true, they seldom fail in their purposes, nor are they particular or scrupulous about the means by which it is done. To successfully accomplish what they desire, with the people in front and the Emperor behind, vested with the arbitrary power of removal from office, is not always easy; so that the acquisition of ill-gotten gains without risk of unhappy consequences usually compels the officials to resort to falsehood and subterfuge. When complaint is made to the imperial government, all the advantages are on the side of the officials and against the complainants; for in a country like this, where there are neither railroads, telegraphs, nor a well-regulated postal system, communication between the capital and the provinces is slow, irregular, and uncertain, and the officials are thus enabled to present their side of the case first, and in the most favorable light; and in the absence of a newspaper press the popular voice can scarcely be heard outside of the immediate vicinity whenever such cases arise. These causes often give rise to insurrection and rebellion, which seem to be the only mode left to the people to redress their wrongs.

The arbitrary power vested in the officials appears to render falsehood necessary, on the part of the common people, in order to escape oppressive burdens and unjust punishments; and the desire for dishonest gains on the part of the officials compels them to use subterfuge to escape untoward results. As an offset to this kind of dishonesty and in justice to the Chinese, it should be stated that among the trading and mercantile classes there is probably more honor and honesty than is to be found among similar classes in any country.

In placing a value upon the honesty of the Chinese, as compared with that of other nations, I by no means overlook the difference between Paganism and Christianity; but with all its elevating tendencies I should be inclined to doubt the efficacy of Christianity, unaided by other enlightening and elevating influences, in controlling the baser passions of men, keeping them in the path of rectitude and virtue, when exposed to the temptations that Chinese officials are. It would be hazardous to predict a better state of public and official morality in any nation, however enlightened, according to our ideas of enlightenment, with a government of arbitrary power, depending more on tradition and precedent than well-defined written law for the guidance of the officials and the people.

In view of all these adverse circumstances, instead of finding progress, it is a matter of surprise that the whole social and governmental fabric has not fallen to pieces of its own weight. With such entire independence on the part of the provinces the wonder is that the central government has been able to maintain any prestige or power whatever. Isolation has undoubtedly done much toward keeping the nation intact; and the fact that the Emperor is regarded as the spiritual as well as the temporal head adds much to his power and to the force of imperial edicts. But more than all other influences combined is the universal ambition for official position, and the mode of making the appointments. This is the strong bond that has kept the nation together. By the method of competitive examinations before referred to, all the intellect and education of the empire is either in office or hoping to get in. The officials are anxious to keep the government intact in order to retain place and power, and a large portion of the literati live in the hope that a happy turn in the wheel of fortune, a successful examination, will give them official position also.

This is also a great hinderance in the way of making improvements; an almost impassable barrier in the path of progress, which is difficult to reach or overcome by reason or argument.

The language is another great obstacle which only time and forbearance on the part of other nations will be able to remove even partially.

The language is so cumbersome that it consumes many years in the lifetime of a native to master it thoroughly. If this be so in the case of natives, what are the prospects of foreigners that undertake the task? To be sure, there are, at this time, a number of foreigners able to read and speak the language with more or less fluency; yet, with all their years of patient study, it would not be safe to affirm that there is in China a single foreigner able to read and speak the language thoroughly and correctly, or one that would undertake to translate a letter or dispatch into Chinese without the aid of a native teacher or writer, and be certain that the meaning and intent would be correctly understood.

The Chinese appreciate but slightly the importance of learning other languages, which would enable them to read the literature of other nations, and, until more enlightened, will make little or no effort in that direction; and until they can be led to appreciate the value of foreign knowledge, or foreigners can prepare themselves to teach the Chinese in their own language, how are the latter to acquire knowledge? Although the task is laborious, requiring much time and patience, yet the progress made in the last twenty years is encouraging. Text-books, dictionaries, &c., are multiplying, all of which will prove efficient aids in acquiring a knowledge of the language, and will facilitate very much the work in the future.

Aside from those connected with the foreign customs department of the Chinese government, the foreign diplomatic and consular service, and the missionaries, it would be difficult to find a single foreigner able to understand, speak, or write the Chinese language. The foreign merchants have made no effort in this direction. On the contrary, some firms have declined to employ natives that could speak and read English, fearing that the European price currents and market reports might be by them communicated to the native merchants. Substantially, all business with the natives is transacted through the agency of Chinese brokers, or "compradores."

Merchants are able to communicate with their compradores by means of a nondescript jargon called "pidgin English," by which the simplest ideas may be conveyed, orders for buying and selling, which answers the purposes of trade. It possesses, however, few elements of language, and its introduction and use have in no small degree retarded the progress of the natives at and near the ports in acquiring something like a correct knowledge of our language. It gives me pleasure, however, to chronicle the fact that there are at the present time in Peking two young men, employés of an American firm in Shanghai, studying the language, with a view of making themselves useful to their employers, and thus relieving the house somewhat from its entire dependence upon native compradores in communicating with Chinese merchants. This firm (Messrs. Augustine Heard & Co.) deserve honorable mention for liberality and enterprise in promoting what seems to be the acquisition of useful knowledge, and it is to be hoped that the experiment may prove such a success as to induce others to follow their example.

That the empire is in a state of decline the signs of decay and ruin to be met with on every hand afford painful evidence. When the decadence commenced, and what are the causes, are, like all other questions in regard to China, not easy to be answered. If the history of this country could be correctly known and understood, it would be found, undoubtedly, that progress and retrogression had alternated according to the vigor or licentiousness and profligacy of the several dynasties, and very much in proportion to the wisdom, honesty, and energy of the several ruling Emperors. The present decline, however, may, I think, be safely set down as dating from the reign of the Emperor Kien-loong, who ruled from 1736 to 1796. During the reign of that sov-foreign vast sums of money were expended in repairing and enlarging old and building new imperial residences and pleasure grounds, and in the repair and erection of Buddhist temples, tombs, tablets, &c., all over the country. Succeeding Emperors do not appear to have had the vigor to repair the losses to the national wealth occasioned by the profligate expenditures made by Kien-loong. The people becoming impoverished, became also discontented, and their discontent showed itself in rebellions and insurrections. This insurrectionary spirit, on the part of the people, seems to have become chronic, and rebellion showed itself in nearly all the provinces of the empire at various times during the present century. It finally culminated in what was known as the Taeping rebellion, which raged with great violence and ferocity from about 1850 to 1865, and devastated and laid waste almost the entire central part of China before it was finally suppressed. To the destruction of life and property by the insurgents must be added the cost in men and money of the wars carried on by the imperial government for their suppression, and also the foreign wars that have occurred, all of which reduced hundreds of thousands of the peasantry to destitution, want, and starvation. From the best data obtainable, the loss of life by casualties of war, wounds, sickness, and starvation, within the last one hundred years, has overbalanced the natural increase of population, so that the actual number of people now in China is less than it was a century ago. If this estimate be correct, of which there can be little doubt, it is obvious that from these causes alone decline and retrogression must be the inevitable result. In addition to this, and more potent, probably, than all other causes combined, is the increase in the consumption of opium. This vice, which has consumed their substance and enervated the people, was scarcely known at the beginning of the present century. In the year 1800 the total amount of opium imported into China, according to the most authentic accounts, did not exceed 4,000 chests of 133 pounds each. In 1869 the amount of the foreign drug brought into this country was about 85,000 chests. This estimate includes 53,000 chests actually entered at the open ports, on which duties were paid, and 32,000 chests which the foreign customs authorities believe were smuggled into the country from Hong-Kong. At the beginning of the present century very little opium was produced in China. In 1869 careful estimates put down the native growth at equal to 75,000 chests, which makes the total consumption of this drug 160,000 chests, equal to 21,000,000 pounds, or ten thousand five hundred tons. The value of the opium brought into the country, in all ways from abroad, does not vary much from $68,000,000, equal to seventy-five per cent. of the value of all the tea and silk exported to foreign countries. These figures tell a painful story, and are a sad commentary upon the beneficial influence of foreign trade upon the welfare of this people. They prove most conclusively that the vice of opium-smoking has consumed, and is consuming, a large portion of the earnings of the people, lessening their ability to pay taxes, which, in turn, tends to the impoverishment of the government. But this estimate only includes the smaller part of the loss and damage. The consumption of this drug has weakened the energies of the people, promoted indolence and profligacy, lessened their productive power, and thus accelerated the decay and ruin of the empire.

Whether this decadence can be arrested by a reformation in the habits of the people, or whether new sources of industry and wealth can be opened up to replace the losses caused by the use of opium, or both, are questions worthy of the serious consideration of all who desire to foster and increase the commercial relations between the people of western nations and this country. The former, in my judgment, is only possible by creating among the people a better moral sentiment, which will have the effect to curb their appetites and passions; the latter can only be done by enlightening the governing and educated classes with reference to the benefits to be derived, and through their influence induce their own people to undertake the task of systematically developing the vast mineral and other resources that now lie dormant, or allow foreigners to do it for them. In my judgment these are the only means of regenerating this country and this people peacefully.

The masses must be educated through the labors and influence of the Christian missionaries chiefly, and the officials must be taught by the wise, judicious, and energetic action of foreign governments, through their diplomatic representatives in Peking. This latter influence must be exerted in the enlightenment of the officials, and the strengthening of the central power, so that its decrees and mandates may, while doing justice, have more force and command more respect than is the case now.

There is still another course more direct, if not more effective, than either, which may be termed the "popular course"—force. This is regarded by most of the foreign residents here as the only sure and speedy agent for "opening up" China. The merchants look upon the use of force as necessary to open up new resources and avenues of industry, and a large proportion of the missionaries favor it because their task will, by this means, be rendered less difficult, probably, than by the slow and laborious process of moral suasion.

I will do the missionaries the justice to say that their mode of reasoning leads them to honestly believe in the morality and humanity of war to accomplish the best results to this people. They believe that "the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof;" that they are simply agents in the hands of the Almighty to effect the christianization and regeneration of the heathen; that the more speedily the work progresses the better it is for the Chinese and the world; that force is absolutely necessary to break down the barriers of ignorance, conceit, and superstition, and that the use of armies to compel submission is only adding an auxiliary force to reason to accomplish the great work of the Master. The arguments against such a theory are so obvious that it is not necessary to repeat them here.

That the work of reformation by peaceful means will require many years of forbearance on the part of other nations, and patient labor and effort of those to whom the task is committed, is quite certain; but that time, forbearance, and labor will accomplish it, must in the nature of things be so. The believers in the other theory assert, with truth, that all foreigners are now residing in China through the influence of force exerted in former years, and hence nothing, in their opinion, but force will, in the future, break down the barriers of ignorance and superstition which stand in the pathway of progress. It is hardly necessary for me to say that to this theory in its entirety I do not subscribe.

Leaving justice and morality quite out of view, and reducing the question to one of policy and expediency simply, I see so many obstacles in the way of securing permanent advancement by war, for it really means nothing else, that I should hesitate long before counseling the application of military force for the purpose of obtaining further concessions.

But with all the forces which will be brought to bear against it, I have little hope, and no real expectation, that peaceful relations will continue between China and foreign nations so that the ameliorating influences of education will be able to do the work of regeneration.

The slowness and vacillation of the central government will be likely to exhaust the patience of other nations; and the infractions of treaty rights by the provincial authorities and the people, and the pressure of the mercantile class for additional concessions, will sooner or later cause a rupture which will end in a foreign war.

In estimating the chances and counting the probabilities as to the future, it should be borne in mind that the manufacturing operations in some European countries are in a measure dependent upon maintaining and increasing the market for manufactures in India and China.

To try and relieve their suffering operatives at home, may cause these governments to pursue a course, in the attempt to increase trade, which would not, under other circumstances, be attempted.

Happily, no such considerations are likely to enter into the policy which the United States may choose to pursue towards this or any other nation.

In addition to all the other difficulties which stand in the way of the maintenance of peace and good-fellowship between natives and foreigners, is the "irrepressible conflict" which is sure to result when two distinct races and civilizations are brought vis-a-vis.

The Indian wars on the North American continent, and the experience of the people of the United States with African slavery, are painful illustrations of this truth.

The mistake that most foreign residents make, is in underestimating the value of Chinese intellect and Chinese civilization.

It is not fair to compare this people with Indians or negroes, or to place them on a par with the inhabitants of India and the Eastern Archipelago.

The Chinese are superior to most, if not all, existing Pagan nations, in mental capacity, industry, and administrative power. Although their education is faulty, and really valueless for the practical purposes of an enlightened age, yet their ability to master difficult studies shows a capacity for acquiring knowledge that compares favorably with any people. Chinese merchants compete successfully with the foreigner in all branches of trade, and occupy at the present time the vantage-ground here.

The peasantry are industrious, frugal, and painstaking; content with gains that afford subsistence in the most inexpensive form; noted for their docility and love of order. Their isolation, and ignorance of everything that pertains to modern science, promotes superstition, and their belief in the Emperor being the head of all affairs, both temporal and spiritual, leads them to look with distrust upon all innovations or prospect of change. The great mass of the people have never seen a foreigner. They have been taught that the people of other countries are a distinct and separate species, fierce, cruel, and rapacious, capable of committing any outrage, and ready to practice any device for purposes of gain.

Unfortunately, impartial history cannot be invoked to disprove many of the counts in the indictment against foreigners. On the other hand, most foreigners make little distinction between Chinese civilization and barbarism. In their opinion the Chinese are an inferior race, whose rights, privileges, or prejudices are too apt to be disregarded when gain is hindered thereby, or when they seem to stand in the way of the onward march of what we are pleased to call our "superior civilization."

The same influences are at work in China that produced a somewhat noted dictum by one of the highest judicial officers of the United States, in which the assertion was made in substance, if not in words, "A negro has no rights that a white man is bound to respect." And this startling announcement was approved of, apparently, by a large minority, if not a majority, of the people of the United States.

Foreigners residing here are much too prone to exhibit by acts, if not by words, their belief in the doctrine that "a Chinaman has no rights that a white man is bound to respect."

The present reigning dynasty is weak and effete, capable of being overthrown by a joint movement of the treaty powers, or even by any one of the first-class powers alone.

If the present government be overthrown, what then? What will take its place? No foreign government would, I imagine, undertake to conquer China and hold it as a dependency, nor would such a course be tamely acquiesced in by the other treaty nations, if attempted. To divide and parcel out the territory among the western nations would also be impracticable, for there would be some—the United States among the number, probably—that would hesitate before accepting territory here if freely offered, and they would seriously object to any such scheme on the part of others. So that whatever may occur in the future, one thing may, I think, be safely set down as certain: China must be governed by the Chinese.

If there were men to be found in the non-official class of intelligence, breadth of mind, vigor of thought and courage, capable of and willing to do better if opportunity were offered them, than those now at the head of affairs, it might perhaps be policy for foreign nations, both in their own interests and for the future welfare of the Chinese, to favor the bringing of this new life into the government by aiding in the overthrow of the present effete dynasty. But, so far as I am able to learn, there are none to be found who would be likely to do better, or even as well, as the present officials. Those now at the head of the government have had the benefit of ten years' experience and direct contact with the foreign diplomatic representatives of other nations, in which time they have learned much, and can, therefore, better appreciate the power of the Western nations, and of the benefits to be derived by preserving amicable relations with them than any men in the empire.

But with all their advantages their progress in knowledge has been slow; so little that, in our moments of impatience, the task seems almost hopeless of ever being able to accomplish what all well-wishers to this government and people so much desire. But when we calmly consider the position in which these men are placed—foreign governments on the one hand demanding, oftentimes with menace, concessions possible and impossible, and on the other a nation of ignorance, superstition, and arrogance, that would not only prevent any forward movement, but would, if they could, undo all that has been done in the past—their difficulties and embarrassments appear to call for the exercise of charity and forbearance on the part of other nations. These difficulties the people at a distance do not see or appreciate, which accounts, in some measure, for the harsh, and, in many cases, unjust criticisms of the people and press of other nations upon the high officials here.

In view of all the difficulties herein detailed, I am of the opinion that foreign nations, in their intercourse with this government and people, should pursue a just and firm course, and at the same time be prepared to exercise patience and forbearance.

They should insist upon the due fulfillment of treaty engagements, and be prepared to render protection to their own citizens and subjects, whenever the imperial government is either unable or unwilling to perform its duty. And while doing this with vigor and firmness, without unnecessary menace, every effort should be made to increase social and commercial intercourse, as fast as the government can make its power effective, and the increase be rendered safe and to the mutual advantage. Should a state of peace continue, this is the only prudent and practicable course to introduce reform. If, on the contrary, peaceful relations be interrupted, and the foundation of the government be shaken by foreign war, the education of the officials in the manner indicated will the better prepare them to accept and profit by innovations and radical changes that may, by pressure, be forced upon them.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, January 15, 1871. (Received March 28.)

SIR: Referring to my dispatches Nos. 29, 31 and 34, in regard to the removal of the American missionaries from Tungchow, in consequence of apprehended danger, I have now the honor to inclose an extract from the report of Commander Kimberly, of the United States ship Benicia, which vessel was dispatched by Admiral Rodgers, in response to my suggestion, to convey the missionaries back to their homes.

You will also find inclosed translation of a note from the prefect at Tungchow to Commander Kimberly, in which assurance is given that the local authorities are able to and will protect the missionaries fully in the enjoyment of life and property, and in the peaceable pursuit of their calling.

The full report and the papers connected therewith, which the admiral sent me, are quite voluminous. Many of the papers do not seem important enough to send, nor is it possible to have copies of all made without employing additional clerical force. If, however, any further information should be wanted, copies of all the papers can, I presume, be obtained at the Navy Department.

In this connection I desire to say that I have had no information from the missionaries, except a short note from one of them saying that they had all reached Tungchow. Without expressing any opinion as to the real peril they were in, or whether there was or was not cause for the step they took, I am of the opinion that their removal and the manner of their return will, on the whole, result in good.

My thanks are due to Admiral Rodgers for the prompt assistance he rendered in bringing this matter to a satisfactory conclusion.

I have, &c.,

FREDERICK F. LOW.

Extract of a report made by Commander Kimberly, of the United States steamer Benicia, to Admiral Rogers, describing his trip from Chefoo to Tungchow, with the American missionaries on board.

OFF CHEFOO, October 22, 1870.

On the 20th instant, the translation having been finished, I received on board the American missionaries, their teachers and servants, also their children, amounting to a total of twenty-four persons, together with Mr. Solbe and servant, whose names are appended to a list appended to this letter, marked A, and at 10 a. m. got under way, and stood out of the harbor bound for Tungchow-foo, and anchored off that city at 2.15 p. m. the same day, and immediately sent an officer on shore to communicate with the chipfu (prefect) and to request an audience. The officer so sent returned, and informed me that I would be received at any time. I went on shore immediately, accompanied by several officers of the ship, and Mr. Solbe, the interpreter, and held the audience, being received in the usual way.

Your instructions to me (translated) were read by the interpreter in my presence, to the chipfu, (prefect,) who, in reply, said: "That there was no necessity for the missionaries ever leaving Tungchow-foo; that he had received orders from the governor-general of the province to receive and protect them; and, furthermore, that he was able to protect them in every way, and that he was willing, and would protect them." He requested that he might be allowed to retain the instructions read to him, which request I granted. I asked him to give me a letter stating that he was willing to and would and could protect the missionaries, which letter he sent off to the ship the next day.

After the audience with the chipfu (prefect) it was so late that the missionaries were not landed until Friday, the 21st instant, when, as I had requested at the interview with the chipfu, a messenger was sent on board of this vessel to invite them (the missionaries) on shore to return to their homes, which had been carefully cared for and protected by the authority of Tungchow-foo since the missionaries had fled. Having concluded the business successfully, and having safely landed the missionaries and their baggage, I got under way at 2.30 p. m. the same day, and arrived at this anchorage off Chefoo at 8.45 p. m.

The missionaries expressed themselves perfectly satisfied with everything that had been done in regard to returning them to their homes, and wished me to visit the shore and walk about the city with the officers of the ship in full uniform, which I declined to do, as, after the promises made by the Chinese officials, I considered it unnecessary, and the Chinese being perfectly willing, and pleased, as far as I could judge, that they had returned. From my interview, I came to the conclusion that there never existed any real danger at Tungchow-foo, but the missionaries were frightened by the threats of some Chinese not in authority. Mischievous persons are found in every community, and Tungchow-foo is not free from this infliction.

The massacre of Tien-tsin capped the climax, and the missionaries left in consequence. The missionaries, in conversation with me on the passage up to Tungchow-foo, complained that their grave-yard had been desecrated, in having some of the tombstones defaced. After the important business of the audience had been disposed of I took the opportunity of stating this complaint to the prefect, who earnestly replied that he would take all means in future to protect them, and to punish any person for any acts of the kind complained of.

Memorandum note from the Prefect Heng, of Tungchow, to Commander Kimberly, of the United States steamer Benicia, stationed at Chefoo.

In the interview held on the 20th instant, between Captain Kimberly and the prefect, Captain Kimberly stated that the foreign missionaries who, apprehensive of violence from the rumors which were circulating, and to which they had given ear, had removed from Tungchow, where now, their fears being dissipated, desirous of returning to and, as of old, taking up their abode in that city. In view of this, Captain Kimberly enjoined upon the resident officials their duty of protection according to treaty stipulations. In regard to this interview, the prefect has to remark that it is the duty of China's officials to afford full protection to the missionaries of all countries who may be quietly pursuing their calling in China, and not to allow them to meet with molestation or interference.

His humble brother Heng Kioang salutes Captain Kimberly.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, February 10, 1871. (Received April 26.)

SIR: By the terms of the French treaty of 1858 with China, the time has now arrived for its revision, in case one or both parties demand it. A few months since the chargé d'affaires of France gave formal notice that it was the intention of his government to demand a revision, the particular points of which would be made known at the proper time.

In communicating these facts to me verbally, Count Rochechouart appeared to be anxious to enlist the aid and support of all the treaty powers, so far as practicable, to the end that such modifications of the old concessions might be made, and such new ones obtained as would prove beneficial to all countries having intercourse and commercial relations with China.

Before committing myself to any definite course of action, I asked, as a preliminary step, that he would give me, in writing, a short memorandum of the alterations he thought necessary and practicable, that I might be able to consider the matter intelligently, and, if necessary, communicate with my Government, with a view to asking instructions. He accordingly addressed me a note, in which these points are briefly stated, a translation of which I beg to inclose herewith.

In the conversation referred to, I was informed that, prior to the rejection by the British government of the convention of 1869, an agreement had been come to between France and England, by which joint action would be taken in the matter of treaty revision under and by virtue of the stipulation contained in the French treaty.

What effect the war and the overthrow of the government of the empire may have upon such an arrangement, if made, you can judge of better when this reaches you than I can at this moment.

In order that you may be in possession of my views, based upon the best information I have been able to gather, I beg, most respectfully, to offer some suggestions upon the several points raised by the French chargé d'affaires.

First. The question of audience.

In my opinion, it is unwise to raise or discuss this question until the Emperor attains his majority. The government of the empire being the same now that it has been since diplomatic relations were established at Peking, and as all foreign governments have, up to this time, waived the right of audience because of the Emperor's minority, this course should be continued until a valid reason can be assigned for a change. An earnest attempt to effect a change now would be likely to result in injury instead of benefit.

It would, I think, be quite impossible for the regency to enter into any engagement by which the Emperor would feel bound to grant audience to the foreign representatives at any fixed date in the future. It is doubtful if the Emperor would consider himself bound by such a contract, if made; and any attempt of the kind by Prince Kung and his associates would arouse all the hostile reactionary forces in the capital and in the provinces to resist the innovation.

In considering the propriety of insisting upon this point now, an estimate should be made of the advantages or disadvantages likely to result from an immediate change in the government, and also of an entire change in the personnel of the Foreign Office.

If a solution of the problem be insisted upon now, and the Chinese conclude that there is no way of evading or postponing the matter, it would result, undoubtedly, in the immediate setting aside of the regency and bringing forward the young Emperor, a youth scarcely fifteen years of age, to assume the duties and responsibilities of sovereign de facto; thus throwing upon him the responsibility of acceding to, or refusing to comply with, the demand. What he would do under such circumstances cannot be conjectured with any certainty.

From the meager knowledge we have of this youth and his surroundings, I infer that he is being trained, in the mode pointed out by Confucius, by tutors who have seen little and know less of foreigners or their relations. It is altogether likely that the views and feelings of these people would, if known by us, be considered anti-progressive and reactionary, and their influence with the Emperor could not be other-wise than harmful.

Their opinions would be sought as a guide instead of those of Prince Kung and the members of the Foreign Office, and when a difference of opinion occurred, the former would outweigh the latter. And, besides, there are to be found in China, as in every other country, men anxious to obtain place and power, who would resort to every kind of artifice and intrigue to supplant the present officials in the good opinion of the Emperor, the result of which, if successful, would be to displace Prince Kung and his associates, and fill their places by new men, conceited and supercilious, ignorant of their duties and obligations. It would require a war and years of experience to teach them what the present officials have already learned.

In view of these considerations, I would advise patience on the part of all foreign governments. It is the part of wisdom to hold fast to the men now in power, until more mature years will insure a sounder judgment to guide the young Emperor, when he emerges from his seclusion to assume the responsibilities of an actual sovereign.

There will be no loss of dignity by continuing for a few years longer the course pursued for the last ten; and besides, if the question be postponed until the Emperor becomes of age, according to his own laws and customs, there will then be a distinct and definite ground for making the claim without regard to treaty, which will be recognized as valid by the civilized world. It will also furnish a plausible excuse, if one is needed, for conceding to a demand which can no longer be postponed or resisted.

But while arguing in favor of postponement, I am entirely opposed to abandoning or giving it up without a struggle.

When the time comes for the Emperor to assume his duties de facto, whether it be sooner or later, my opinion is clear and decided that it will be the duty of all foreign governments to demand for their representatives the same rights, privileges, and courtesies that were accorded to the diplomatic representatives of China, when they visited the courts and capitals of Europe and America; and in case of peremptory refusal, I should not hesitate to advise the withdrawal of legations from Peking, and a resort to such other measures as might be found necessary to enforce a compliance with the demand.

If it is expected that the plan now inaugurated shall be carried out—treating China as one nation, and the imperial government as the only responsible power—it is absolutely necessary that the rights, privileges, and immunities of the diplomatic corps, customary in all civilized and enlightened countries, shall be recognized by the supreme authority of China.

No one thing would do more to disabuse the minds of the people of their absurd pretensions of superiority over all other peoples, and of the divine right of the Emperor to "rule all nations, whether within or without." Nor do I believe that a firm demand, made at the appropriate time by all the treaty powers, will meet with a refusal.

There will be no need of elaborate regulations in regard to the forms and ceremonies. A simple declaration to the effect that the usual forms customary in the United States and Europe shall be observed would be ample.

Second. The right to place salaried consuls at any point, either on the coast or in the interior, and that any place where such a consul resides shall be open to foreign trade.

This is a loose proposition, and one that never will be assented to by the Chinese government unless driven by force into submission. Indeed, it is doubtful whether, in the interest of foreigner or native, it ought to be. If M. Rochechouart means that when France or any one treaty power chooses to place a consul at any point other than those already open to trade, the place shall be considered open to the residence and trade of all countries having treaties with China, which contain the "favored nation" clause, whether they have consuls or not, does not seem clear. If such is a correct interpretation of his meaning, (and I think it is,) the demand is unjust.

The Chinese government having, by treaty, yielded jurisdiction over the persons of all foreign residents upon its soil, so that it cannot punish them even by fine, it is obligatory upon all treaty powers to provide a mode of punishing their citizens and subjects for infractions of treaty and regulations, and it is but a simple act of justice and good faith that their laws should be made effective for this purpose.

I regret to be compelled to say that a due observance of this portion of treaty obligations has been too much neglected by nearly all foreign governments, of which the Chinese have just cause of complaint. The United States have done as well or better than most governments, (England excepted;) at the same time, candor compels me to say that we have not performed our duty; and if Congress could see clearly the anomalous condition of things where ex-territoriality is claimed and exercised, as is the case here, I feel quite sure there would be no delay or hesitation in providing, through a more perfect consular system, the means of carrying out honestly and in good faith our part of treaty engagements. But if we have failed in part to do our duty, France has done worse. She has salaried consuls at Canton, Foo-chow, Shanghai, Hankow, and Tientsin only, while at Swatow, Amoy, Ning-po, Ching-kiang, King-kiang, Chefoo, Newchwang, and on the Island of Formosa, there are either merchant consuls or none at all. Generally at these ports last named France is entirely unrepresented. It is true that the trade of France is small, amounting only to one per cent. of the aggregate, and, therefore, expensive consular establishments at all the ports may appear to the government quite unnecessary. But if her trade will not justify the expense of consuls at the ports already open to trade, what plausible argument can be urged in favor of sending salaried consuls to other points? England might, with some propriety, urge such a point, but with France the case is entirely different. Nor would France or any other country be likely to agree to keep continuously salaried consuls at such points, in case the demand was acceded to. The selection of any point in the interior for trade would be an experiment, and experience might prove its inutility for the purpose. In case the consul should be withdrawn, would the place where he resided be closed to trade? With such an understanding in the beginning there would be little inducement for a permanent outlay of capital by merchants in order to test the question fairly, in which case it would rest with peddlers, and not merchants, to determine the eligibility of such points for foreign trade.

I see so many objections to such a treaty provision, and so many chances of its proving a delusion and a snare; that, unless the proposition can be more definitely defined, I should not be inclined to favor it.

If the exact truth could be ascertained, it would be found, I expect, that the whole idea of the French chargé in this scheme is the better protection of the French missionaries; and were it possible to obtain the concession asked for, these additional consuls would be, to all intents and purposes, agents of Roman Catholic missionaries. Their official positions and influence would be used to sustain missionary claims and assumptions, some of which have been described in a former dispatch. So far as trade is concerned, it may well be questioned whether the presence of French consuls in the interior would not prove a damage instead of a benefit.

Third. The right to navigate by steam all water-courses that will float a vessel drawing ten feet or more. This, if put in some more definite form, of which it is susceptible, would be a great advantage to foreign trade, and a benefit to China. If granted it would open the Yang-tze River about three hundred miles above Hankow, and possibly the river Han and the Poyang Lake. The former would be quite certain, but of the latter there would be some doubt. Our scanty information hardly justifies a decided opinion upon the question of the navigability of the interior water-courses of this country, their maximum and minimum depth of water, &c.

The carrying trade is one of the most important interests to foreigners, and any concession which will increase it will prove of great value to foreign commerce, and also be a benefit to the natives. The Chinese merchants avail themselves of steam transportation because of its greater speed and certainty, and less risk. This the officials begin to see and appreciate also. An illustration of this may be seen in the fact that during the year 1870 a considerable portion of the tribute rice and grain, which comes from the provinces annually to Peking, was brought in foreign vessels and steamers to Tien-tsin. This is the first experiment of the kind made by the government. It proved so satisfactory that it is expected a much larger quantity will be transported in this way during the present year.

The interests of foreign merchants are chiefly imports and exports of merchandise, and carrying trade on the coast and in the interior. Up to this time the latter is confined to the river Yang-tse from Shanghai to Hankow, and the Pei-ho to Tien-tsin. Beyond these three branches of trade there is little in which the foreign merchant can compete with the native. Experience proves that the Chinese will do most of the local and internal trade, and it is quite according to reason that it should be so. Among themselves there is a credit system, regulated by law and custom, and thus rendered quite safe. As between natives and foreigners, it would be hazardous to the latter; and, besides, the expenses of a native merchant are so trifling that he can conduct a business successfully upon profits that would be ruinous to a foreigner.

In my opinion the extension of trade by steamers, particularly inland, is, on the whole, the most important of all the schemes that are put forward for "opening up" China, and one that is open to less objections than any other. It is even more important to American merchants than the extension of the import trade, and will continue to be until the cotton manufactures of the United States can compete with those of Great Britain. If any additional privileges can be obtained in the direction indicated, it is worthy of an earnest effort to try and obtain them.

Fourth. A mixed court for the trial of civil and even criminal cases. Several years since the experiment of a mixed court for the trial of offenders accused of petty offenses was inaugurated at Shanghai. It was hoped that experience would prove its adaptability for the trial of grave offenses, so that ultimately ex-territoriality might be given up. Its success thus far, I regret to say, does not warrant any extension of its jurisdiction, or the establishment of similar ones elsewhere.

The laws, customs, and forms of legal procedure, in the United States and England, are so radically different from those of China, that the attempt to form a mixed code for the trial of criminal offenders appears to me entirely impracticable. Even if the Chinese would consent to it, neither England nor the United States could do so with due regard to the welfare of their own people. In our country a person accused of crime is, in law, considered innocent until proved guilty; in China the reverse appears to be the rule. In the United States and England the guilt of the accused must be proven by competent witnesses; in China the accused is examined by the magistrate touching his guilt or innocence, and, in order to get at the truth, law and custom sanction the application of torture for the purpose of extorting truthful confessions. So barbarous are the forms of Chinese law and justice that I should dislike very much to see American citizens charged with crime brought before a court in which any trace of the criminal law and justice of China could be found.

There may not be such radical differences between French and Chinese law and mode of procedure, and for these two countries it may be possible to arrange a mixed code or a mixed court; but so far as the United States are concerned, the thing is practically impossible until this government and this people are much further advanced in our form of civilization.

Fifth. A mixed commission to manage and expend the revenue derived from "tonnage dues."

By this is meant, I presume, that the Chinese government shall place the revenue derived from this source in the hands of a mixed commission composed entirely of foreigners, to be expended in such manner as may seem proper.

It is claimed, with justice, that the revenues derived from this source shall be exclusively devoted to building and maintaining light-houses, light-ships, and buoys, and the removing of obstructions to navigation, although there are no stipulations in the present treaties expressly saying that it shall be done. No practical step was taken in the matter until after all the indemnities to foreign nations were paid up; and as the United States were receiving a portion of this as well as all other revenues collected of their trade, on account of the indemnity due, it was difficult to take any step in urging the light-house matter upon the Chinese. I presume Great Britain and France were similarly situated, but of this I am not certain.

In 1867, this whole matter was placed in the hands of the inspector general of customs, who has had the entire management of it up to the present time. Several new light-houses have been built under his direction, and others are being constructed in England, or are on their way out. Whether all is being done that can be, with the means applicable for the purpose, or not, I am not aware. I am satisfied, however, that a good start has been made in a systematic and proper manner, and, unless it can be shown more clearly than I think it can be that Mr. Hart is not doing his duty faithfully, I should prefer to let the matter remain in his hands rather than intrust it to a commission.

The revision of the "three or four articles," for the purpose of making them plainer, in which France alone is interested, refers, I presume, to the discrepancy in reference to the rights of missionaries, particulars of which were sent in my dispatch No. 40. In that matter no advice or aid of other nations will be asked or accepted if offered.

It is but natural that France should not desire to open the tariff to revision. The only thing in the trade in which that nation is interested is silk. The basis upon which the present tariff was arranged and settled was an average of five per cent. ad valorem. A specific duty was agreed upon for several things, silk among the number. The increase of the value of this article since the tariff was made has, however, reduced its rate of duty to about one-half of the rate agreed upon as equitable; hence it is for the interest of the French to let the tariff question remain without any disturbance.

To sum up the whole matter, there is nothing in the present scheme, as indicated by the French chargé, for treaty revision, in which the United States has any interest, or which would prove of any material advantage, except the extension of inland steam navigation. The audience question and the protection of French missionary interests are the only questions in which France has any special interest. The other claims are put forward to enlist the sympathy and aid of other countries in the revision, hoping by their aid to gain concession, which would add to her prestige and political advantage in this part of the world.

[Translation.]

PEKING, January 28, 1871.

M. LE MINISTRE: You have expressed a desire to know the demands which I have engaged my government to make from the Chinese government when the treaty of 1858 is revised. I have no objection to satisfy you, for I believe that the alterations are indispensable, and I shall be happy to learn that the other governments allied with China have decided also to demand them.

I place the solution of the question of the audience with the Emperor first, and the arranging a treaty of etiquette regulating the details of our official life in a manner honorable to our governments and to ourselves.

Second. I demand that we shall have the right to place salaried consuls wherever we judge proper, and that those cities where consuls reside shall also be opened to foreign trade.

Third. I demand the right to navigate with steamers all water-courses which will float a vessel drawing at least ten feet.

Fourth. I demand that a mixed code shall be adopted, by which commercial and civil cases, and even criminal, too, which may arise between the French and Chinese, shall be judged.

Fifth. Lastly, I demand that some change shall be made in the application of the tonnage dues. It would be well if the management of these revenues were intrusted to a mixed commission, as is the case almost everywhere else in the East.

In some things, relating to France alone, I ask that a clearer interpretation shall be adopted of three or four articles in our treaty, in the meaning of which there is some confusion. The motives which have led me to these conclusions are rather too long to be explained now, and, moreover, are all contained in a report which I addressed to my government on the 1st of July, a knowledge of which I am quite sure it would give most willingly. I may add, however, that if I have said nothing about the tariff, it is because I think it is now very liberal, and that it would be impossible, without injustion, to force the Chinese to reduce it more, and that to raise this question is to run a risk of exposing one's self to counter demands as equivalents.

Receive, sir, the expression of my devoted regards, and high consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, March 20, 1871.

SIR: This Government received, with great satisfaction, in the year 1868, evidences that the government of China, appreciating its importance to her own shipping and that of foreign nations, was desirous of establishing a proper and sufficient system of light-houses upon the coasts of the empire; and at the request of the inspector general of customs, Mr. Robert Hart, a complete collection of the drawings, maps, plans, and documents, illustrating the principles of construction, and the location and maintenance of light-houses of the coasts of the United States was carefully arranged, bound, and forwarded to the minister of the United States in China, by whom it was presented to the proper authorities of the Chinese government. A dispatch of the 13th of January last from George F. Seward, esq., the consul general of the United States, at Shanghai, which was accompanied by charts and a list of the lights in course of construction, erection, or alteration, on the coast of China, presents clearly the progress made and the actual condition of the light-house system, from a consideration of which this Government is led to apprehend that the measures which have been adopted by that of China are inadequate to the necessities of a commerce which brings wealth to her shores and stimulates to profitable activity the industry of millions of her people, and are not commensurate to the amount of tonnage duties paid by the commercial vessels of foreign nations to the government of China, with a view to its expenditure in perfecting and maintaining this important service.

It is believed that this state of things is due mainly to the facts that the foreign trade of China is of recent origin, and its benefits to the revenues, resources, and welfare of China are yet hardly appreciated by the government and people thereof at their true value; and that they have not given due consideration to the obligations of hospitality and humanity resting upon all nations having extensive sea-coasts to provide all possible safe-guards to the shipping of other countries engaged in friendly commerce in their waters.

Independently of this latter consideration, a regard for their own interests should induce the Chinese authorities to make provision for the ample development and maintenance of a thorough and extensive system of coast lighting. To illustrate the magnitude of those interests, it is only necessary to bring properly before them facts derived from their official returns of trade at the treaty ports, according to which foreign nations engaged in commerce in the year 1869 with China contributed to the revenues of the empire in exports, imports, and other duties 9,643,201 taels.

This large sum is actually paid by commercial nations into the treasury of China; but it is by no means the greatest material benefit conferred upon the empire by the foreign trade. The constant and increasing demand for the teas and other natural productions, as well as for the various useful articles which give employment to the industry of the people of China, and the importation into China of many productions and manufactures entering into daily use and consumption by the people, which can only be derived by them from beyond the seas, constitute an economic exchange, the benefits of which such eminent statesmen as his Highness Prince Kung and others connected with the imperial government must be too wise to underrate. The same official returns before referred to show the nature of this trade. According to those returns the value of the articles exported from China to foreign countries in 1869 were one hundred and seventeen million nine hundred and fifty-one thousand nine hundred taels; and the value of articles imported into China from foreign countries is sixty-nine million eight hundred and seven thousand nine hundred taels.

Mr. Seward, in his dispatch before referred to, informs the Department that there has been a very considerable reduction in the corps of officers originally organized under Mr. Hartis's plan; that the marine commissioner, Captain C. S. Forbes, who has been at the head of the corps, has become annoyed at the contraction of the staff of his department, and is about to return to England; and that he informed Mr. Seward that it would require two or two and a half years to place the material now on hand or ordered; and that one or two engineers are urgently required for the work. He also informed Mr. Seward that he considered it essential to the proper progress of the work that a successor to himself should be secured. Mr. Seward proposed to take an early occasion to invite your attention and that of Admiral Rodgers to the propriety of urging upon the government at Peking the need of their appointing a chief for the department, and the engineers declared by Captain Forbes to be requisite. Captain Forbes informed Mr. Seward that to complete the works already undertaken from thirty to forty thousand pounds sterling would be required.

Mr. Seward expressed the opinion that this money will not be provided by the Chinese government with reasonable rapidity, unless the ministers make urgent and continual representations in the matter. He states that the government might provide the amount and enough more to carry the original plan to completion within five years without expending the whole of their current receipts from tonnage dues, which branch of their revenue is nominally levied to support, and is properly applicable to, such works.

I will thank you to take this subject into consideration, and to give the Department the benefit of your opinion upon it. If you agree with Mr. Seward as to the expediency and propriety of the course suggested by him, you are authorized to urge the Chinese government to make the appointments and to devote the tonnage duties referred to to the work, so far as it may be necessary to its energetic prosecution.

The general interest of the other maritime powers in this important subject will render it proper for you to make known to their diplomatic representatives the course which you may adopt, and to secure their co-operation if possible.

No. 56.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, March 20, 1871.

SIR: In my No. 52, of February 20, reference was made to a communication I had received from the Foreign Office in relation to the missionary question. I have now the honor to inclose a translation of that document, together with my reply. The memorandum was drawn up by Wantsiang, one of the oldest and by far the ablest of all the Chinese ministers. He has had more to do with, and therefore understands better, the actual relations of China with foreign nations, than any of his colleagues, and is, I feel sure, anxious to prevent disturbances that may lead to international troubles. That he is sincere in his professed anxiety about the future, no one well acquainted with the real condition of affairs here will question; although it is not impossible that his fears are overstated for the effect such declarations may exert upon the foreign legations, and thus tend to bring about some kind of a compromise which will be useful in the future management of the missionary matter. My opinion that these apprehensions of future danger are genuine, and that this paper is not put forth at this time simply to try and protect themselves against further demands that the French government may make in the treaty revision which is soon to take place, is confirmed by the fact that about two years ago, this same Chinese minister addressed a private note of a similar character to the British minister. A copy of that note I have just now obtained, a translation of which I beg to send herewith. The answer of Her Majesty's minister to the note I am not able to give, as it was made verbally, and not in writing. A careful reading of the memorandum clearly proves that the great, if not only, cause of complaint against the missionaries, comes from the action of the Roman Catholic priests and the native Christians of that faith; although the rules proposed for the government of missionaries apply equally to Protestants and Catholics. What reply to make, in view of the complication of the question, and the circumstances with which it was surrounded, did not seem quite clear. I would have preferred to have taken the President's instructions before sending an answer, could they have been obtained within any reasonable time. To simply acknowledge the receipt of their note, and say that instructions had been asked for, would involve a delay of four or five months, and this delay would perhaps raise a hope, which could not be otherwise than illusive, that some at least of their propositions would prove acceptable. To reply and admit what I really believe to be true, that the Chinese have some ground of complaint, without being able to suggest a practicable remedy, would only do harm, and render the situation still more insecure; to simply say that, as their complaints are against the Roman Catholics, it is a matter which concerns the French alone, with which other nations have nothing to do, would have the effect to defeat what the other treaty powers have been anxious to bring about, viz, that when the Chinese have difficulties with one foreign nation, which are likely to involve all in trouble, they should frankly state their case, to be judged of by all, and in this way bring the force of an enlightened public opinion to bear upon the action of any government that attempts to oppress or deal unfairly. After carefully considering the whole question in all its bearings, I deemed it my duty to reply, without waiting for specific instructions. This I have done at some length, reviewing somewhat in detail the several points presented, reasserting the intention of the Government of the United States to claim for all its citizens entire exemption from the operation of Chinese law, and disclaiming any intention of screening natives from the obligations which they are under to their own laws and officials, pointing out the impracticability of many of the proposed rules, and suggesting personal discussion of this as well as all other matters of dispute. Had they stated their complaints in brief, without circumlocution, and stripped of all useless verbiage, they would have charged that the Roman Catholic missionaries, when residing away from the open ports, claim to occupy a semi-official position, which places them on an equality with the provincial officer; that they deny the authority of the Chinese officials over native Christians, which practically removes this class from the jurisdiction of their own rulers; that their action in this regard shields the native Christians from the penalties of the law, and thus holds out inducements for the lawless to join the Catholic church, which is largely taken advantage of; that orphan asylums are filled with children, by the use of improper means, against the will of the people; and when parents, guardians, and friends visit these institutions for the purpose of reclaiming children, their requests for examination and restitution are denied; and lastly, that the French government, while it does not claim for its missionaries any rights of this nature by virtue of treaty, its agents and representatives wink at these unlawful acts, and secretly uphold the missionaries. If the opinions of the Chinese officials could be stated in a direct and courageous way, instead of proposing rules for the governance of missionaries, they would demand a revision of the treaties by which the right of extraterritoriality would be withdrawn from missionaries when they go beyond the places open to trade where foreign consuls reside. This is really what they mean, although they do not state it specifically.

I do not believe, and therefore I cannot affirm, that all the complaints made against Catholic missionaries are founded in truth, reason, or justice; at the same time, I believe that there is foundation for some of their charges. My opinions, as expressed in former dispatches touching this matter, are confirmed by further investigation. But while I see clearly the difficulties and dangers, candor compels me to say that the remedy seems to lie outside and beyond the scope of affirmative diplomatic action. Neither will sound policy, nor the moral and religious sentiments of Christian nations, sanction any retrogression, although trade and commerce might be promoted thereby; nor will the dictates of humanity permit the renunciation of the right for all foreigners that they shall be governed and punished by their own laws. But while insisting firmly upon these rights, all foreign governments should see to it that no claim be made by their officers, agents, or subjects, for an extension of their laws over the Chinese. They should also see that their treaties are honestly and fairly construed, claiming no rights which come of fraud, and conceding nothing that a just construction will grant. That a strict non-interference between native Christians and their rulers will subject the former to persecutions is possible, and even probable; but whether this course will not in the end subserve the cause the missionaries are laboring to promote better than the opposite one, is the question. I think it will. One has the sanction of treaty and law; the other is in violation of both. The remedy, so far as it lies in the power of foreign governments, is with France alone; and it behooves that power, for the sake of its own interests, as well as for the welfare of all foreign residents, to remove all just causes of complaint of the Chinese. Whether this can reasonably be expected depends upon the form and composition of the new government of France, and also upon the character of the representative which that government may send here.

Trusting that my action, as herein detailed, may meet with the approval of the President,

I have, &c.,

MINUTE.

When the treaties between China and foreign countries were arranged, it was hoped that they would be advantageous to both parties and remain unaltered for a series of years. The stipulations which were then agreed upon by treaty have been since tested in all their bearings; and not only has it been shown that some of them cannot endure the trial, but already are they found to be inadequate to answer the exigencies which have arisen. In commercial matters, no serious causes of strife have ever arisen between this and other countries; but in respect to missionary operations, many and great difficulties have been continually coming up. When these operations were commenced, it was asserted that the object of missions was to exhort men to be good; but the propagation of the Roman Catholic faith in China among the people has been attended with constant troubles. Seeing that no satisfactory arrangement of these has been reached, it is now of the first importance to adopt some measures which will bring these causes of dispute into some kind of harmonious and permanent settlement. This question has in reality a close relationship to the maintenance of peace and friend ship between China and foreign countries, and remotely even to the continuance of their commerce. This arises from the fact that it invariably happens among members of the Romish faith, that wherever the missionaries commence their work in the country the former get into quarrels with the people, which year after year come before the courts, and cannot in any way be amicably adjusted so as to maintain the peace. All this has, we think, long been known to your excellency. When the religion of the Lord of Heaven first came into China, it was known as the Si Ju, i. e. [the doctrine of] the Western Literati, and those who joined the sect for the most part quietly maintained their tenets; but those who have embraced it since the adoption of the treaties have been very largely of a disreputable character. This has caused people to regard with contempt the assertion that these doctrines are intended to reform mankind, and they are, consequently, totally disinclined to accept them. On the other hand, those who have joined them are led to trust much to the position and power of the missionaries, and misuse and oppress peaceable people. Such conduct still more embitters men's minds against them, and prepares the parties for reciprocal dislike, which ere long culminates in open strife. The matter then comes into court, and the local authorities try to adjudicate it. The missionary takes sides, screens and helps his partisans, and this encourages the converts to oppose their rulers, which in turn stirs up the people the more against them all. From this it will surely come to pass that among the multitudes of disaffected men who are ready to foment rebellion in the land, criminals, litigious pettifoggers, and shysters who make strife, many will seek the shelter of the sect to create trouble. The popular indignation is already very deep, and will grow into a settled hatred, and this hatred will ere long break out into open enmity.

The people at large are ignorant of the distinction between the Protestants and the Romanists, but regard all [Christians] as belonging to the latter sect; just as they are unaware of the number and names of foreign countries, but look upon all persons from abroad as simply foreigners. If a riot should break out, therefore, every stranger in China would be exposed to the same peril. It would then extend to other provinces, whose people, though having themselves no cause of strife, would yet cherish aspirations from what they heard. How, under these circumstances, would it be possible to prevent serious disturbances rising into open violence? It is true that there is a great difference between these sects, and a fact that each foreign nation has its own name; and it is not for want of repeated orders and instructions on the part of government that the people do not know this, but it is impossible to reach every house and hamlet.

During the past ten years, while the Prince and his associates have had the charge of affairs, this subject has been a cause of daily anxiety. The startling outburst at Tien-tsin last summer showed how the thing works. The guilty officials in that affair have been punished, the murderers have been executed, and an indemnity paid to the bereaved families; but all these steps to close it and do justly have by no means dissipated the anxiety which fills our minds lest the people and the Roman Catholics should again come into open conflict. If the course of action at Tien-tsin is to serve as a precedent in future, then greater difficulties will be experienced in repressing such risings, and every successive quarrel will become more and more exasperating and savage. In trying to look at the present aspect of this whole question, one is led to ask, how can the two parties be brought to live at peace? It seems to be plain, judging from the cases arising in the provinces, that the influential cause has really been the irritating conduct of the native Romanists, though it is granted that the people too, on their part, have cherished revenge and wreaked their anger on them. These cases do not seem likely to be settled amicably by the provincial authorities; but if, when they are brought before the native and foreign high officials, (at Peking or elsewhere,) these, knowing the acts of the Romish missionaries and their converts, decide them unjustly and without regard to the feelings of the people, and decline to agree to some rules for preserving peace and preventing evil, then, when there is an outbreak some bright morning, foreigners will only think how that single affair can be most quickly settled. They will not care at all whether the people consent to such proceedings, and only think how they can best put down the disturbance by the strong arm; and this course will influence the local authorities to do their best to settle it some way or other. If no well-understood mode of action can be agreed upon, and only temporary expedients are devised for a present exigency, then no permanent harmony can be thought of. If, while we at this time desire to discuss the causes and difficulties of this subject with foreign governments, in order to agree on some plan which will bring a lasting and advantageous settlement, they firmly refuse to discuss it in an impartial manner, there is no help. In such a conference, if one side desires to bring forward some impracticable rule and force its adoption, or make it a reason for declining to do anything, that course will most plainly show that he has no earnest desire to come to any arrangement at all.

It is the sincere desire of the Prince and his colleagues, in view of this whole question in all its bearings, to maintain peace with all foreign countries, and perpetuate the present friendly status; but, to this end, some discussion as to the mode of arranging it is indispensable. It is our belief that, in all western countries where missionaries live among the people, there must be some reasonable course agreed upon by which they can live together in harmony, and that this is the reason why the teachers and professors of Christianity do not desire to raise causeless trouble. We have heard it stated that in whatever country missionaries reside they obey the laws and customs of that country, and are not permitted to assert their independence of them. Whoever resists the laws of the land, or opposes the rulers; whoever takes upon himself power, or encroaches on the rights of others; whoever causes scandal to the reputation of families or persons; whoever maltreats people, or damages them in any way; or, lastly, whoever excites suspicion in the minds of others, and thereby ill-will and hatred are stirred up through the community; in short, whoever commits any illegal acts of this nature, is forcibly restrained. Therefore, those who build churches and preach Christian doctrines in China should chiefly take pains not to provoke the suspicion and dislike of the native gentry and people, but act so that mutual confidence may be strengthened. If this were done, they could easily arrange matters, and all would go on well; the two classes living side by side in friendly relations, and no attempt made to destroy churches and chapels. If the Romish missionaries will permit what properly comes into their calling to be usually known openly and fully by the people at large, the latter will then have no grounds for maligning and opposing them. Further, if they refuse to do what their converts wish them to do, and do not interfere with the jurisdiction of the local rulers, or trust to their power to carry their own ends against all opposers, a course which can only draw on them the angry hatred of gentry and people, then will the common people live at peace with them, and our officials will protect and defend them. If all the unlawful and irritating acts which have come to the ears of the Prince and his colleagues, as having been committed by Romish missionaries now in China, be true, then it cannot be denied that there is in this empire what amounts to a countless number of independent and uncontrolled hostile states. Can any man imagine that it will be possible long to maintain peace under such a state of things, and prevent both our officials and people from hating them cordially? We candidly say that we know of no way of preventing such a calamity. We fear, wherever the ignorant converts learn how the Tien-tsin affair has been settled, that their spirits will rise to greater excesses, which will stir up greater strife, and their vain boasts will arouse the bitter hatred of the common people to a more deadly degree, till the smothered irritation suddenly bursts out into riots and outrages. The local officials will be unable to manage such a flame; the high provincial authorities will find it too strong for them; and even the Foreign Office will be powerless to restrain and punish. If the Chinese people become of one mind on this point, and rise against these secretaries, then, though the Emperor himself send his high officers with troops to punish the offenders, it will be impossible to exterminate the people. Much less, when the rage of great multitude has been aroused, will they be inclined to quietly allow men to be executed. If at such a crisis the affair could not be restrained, and the two parties led to see that it was possible for them to live in harmony, then things have come to a bad pass; and the high officers to whom pertains the conduct of the relations between this and other countries cannot relieve themselves from great blame. The most vital point in happily conducting any business between two states is to get the good will of the people; for if this be not done, and one tries to coerce them, they will some time or other resist, and the highest powers of the state will find themselves unable to control this popular sentiment. If those in China, to whom the highest affairs of both parties have been intrusted, can now do nothing to restore harmony and prevent disasters, they should surely know that foreigners living among the natives and traders of every nation may ere long be in the midst of great peril. If they together cannot agree upon some mode of regulating this matter, it is clear that henceforth it will be impossible to regulate anything. The desire of the Prince and his colleagues to preserve friendly relations between this and other countries is so earnest that they now present eight rules, which they have drawn up as a means to this end, and inclose them for your excellency's perusal, as well as to the other foreign ministers, desiring that the same may be fully examined.

EIGHT RULES, WITH REMARKS.

Rule first.

The establishment of asylums for training up children by the Romanists has hitherto not been reported to the authorities; and as these institutions are carefully kept private, this management continually gives rise to suspicion and excites ill-will. The best way to remove this feeling of mistrust among the people would be to close all foreign asylums. But if this cannot be done, let the names of those among the converts who are shown to be unable to rear their own children be reported to the local officials, giving the names of the children, the day they were taken into the asylum, and when they were sent home, or whether any other person had adopted them for their own children. By this means all the facts would be known. The children of natives who have not become Roman Catholics can be cared for by persons selected from among the gentry by the local rulers, under the direction of the provincial authorities. Each class will thus do its own good work in this line, and all suspicion will be allayed.

NOTE.—It is the rule in China that the conductors of foundling and infant asylums shall report all particulars concerning those who are received or discharged to the local authorities. The relatives can always come and see the children at the asylum afterward; when they have grown up, it is allowable for childless people to adopt them, or for their parents to take them home. Whatever might have been the sect they belonged to, they still adhered to it; for it was considered to be a good work enough to carefully nurture the children in the asylum. We have learned that the rules in other countries respecting such institutions are similar to those in force here. It is only those established in this land by foreigners which are not so regulated. In them, the time when the children are received is not inquired into, nor is any report made to the officials; nobody is allowed to adopt them after they enter, nor can their own parents ever reclaim them, nor even see them afterward. Is it surprising that such things excite suspicions among the people? It is on these grounds that, though it has been fully proved, since the riot at Tien-tsin, that there was in that city no gouging out of eyes, or cutting open hearts, even to this moment people retain their former fears and suspicions. It is indeed possible to stop their mouths, but no one can quiet their apprehensions; and who can assure us that another outbreak will not be caused by their mistrust? If the asylums now under the control of foreigners could be all closed, and they do all this good work in their own countries, then all the children of China needing this care could be reared in native establishments, of which there are many in every province. Why need foreigners trouble themselves about this work? for in showing that they have good desire to relieve the poor, they only arouse suspicion and ill-will. Therefore if each party would attend, in this respect, to their own modes and spheres of actions, it is quite certain that amicable relations would be less likely to be endangered.

Rule second.

Chinese women should not be permitted to enter churches and chapels, nor foreign women to propagate the doctrines in China; in order to exhibit the reserve and strict propriety of the tenets of Christianity, and prevent all reproach among the people.

NOTE.—Among the Chinese, the unsullied reputation and modest demeanor of females is very highly esteemed. The rules for separating the sexes are very strict, both in regard to their personal intercourse and the seclusion of their apartments. Since these requirements have been relaxed by the Romanists, women and girls go into their churches, which surprises all who hear of it; in these missionary-halls men and women are not separated, and when they remain there a long time, the people are led to despise them, and suspect that everything there is not altogether as proper as purity requires.

Rule third.

Missionaries residing in China ought to conform to the laws and usages of the empire. They ought not to be permitted to set up an independent style and authority, nor should they resist the laws of the land, and oppose the orders of its magistrates; they should not assume power, nor encroach on the rights of others, injuring their reputation and causing scandal in communities. They should not misuse or oppress the people, acts which lead men to suspect their designs, and provoke the indignant hatred of all classes; nor, lastly, should they malign the holy doctrines of the Chinese sages, and thus arouse public resentment. Every missionary ought to come under the authority of the local magistrates, therefore, in all these respects. Native Roman Catholics should be placed in the same position under the laws as other Chinese; and except in the contributions to theatrical plays and idolatrous processions and festivals, from which they are exempt, they are bound to perform their quota of public labor and calls for corvée and other services from the local magistrates. Still more are they required to pay their part of public taxes in money and kind, and their faith cannot be in the least degree pleaded as a reason for not paying their rents and assessments. In all these things, foreign missionaries are not to protect them or abet their resistance. Cases at law arising between the people and the converts are to be examined equitably, and then decided entirely by the local magistrates. No missionary can be permitted to take sides in them as a partisan, nor shall he conceal a plaintiff or defendant, when they are converts, and prevent their appearance in court, in order to embarrass the matter, and prevent its settlement. If he overpass his station, and interfere in this manner in legal affairs, the officials can send his letters or reports of his personal application to the high provincial authorities for transmission to the Foreign Office, and if the thing is proved the missionary shall be deported. In all cases connected with marriages, tenelements, and lands, coming into court from among the Roman Catholics, if they endeavor to make their cases succeed against the people by the representations of the missionaries on their behalf, they shall be liable for doing this to heavier penalties from their own rulers.

NOTE.—In China every person belonging to the literary class, or who takes up the profession of a Buddhist, or Taoist priest, or even the Lamas, which do not belong to any strictly Chinese sect, all, without exception, obey the laws of the empire. Each member of these sects submits to the decision of the magistrates in all matters of right and wrong in which he may be interested. We are informed that in other countries, missionaries, living among the people, everywhere conform to the laws and usages of the land. They are not permitted to set up an independent style and authority, resisting the laws of the land, and opposing the orders of the magistrates. They do not there assume unauthorized power, nor encroach on the rights of others, injuring their good name and causing scandal; nor do they oppress and insult people, leading men to suspect their designs, and provoking the indignation and hatred of all classes. It is, therefore, but right that missionaries who come to China to practice their profession should, in these respects, be amenable to the authority of the magistrates. Is it not altogether out of their proper position for them to exhibit such hauteur and pride, and dispute precedence with the officials, as they do? Those natives who profess this creed, having always been Chinese subjects, are still more bound to observe their proper duties, seeing that they noways differ from other people. They ought, most assuredly, to live in friendly relations with their countrymen, whether in town or country, and cultivate that spirit of neighborly regard which is seemly; and whenever an occasion arises demanding united effort to accomplish some public work, or it is necessary for the whole village to join its men and means to effect an object, then, for them to cast about how they can avoid doing their share, and escape their obligations because of their faith, is to prejudice for themselves their own rights. Can they be surprised if others sharply judge their claims too? In all cases where they resist the payment of taxes, refuse to do government work, interfere with the orders of magistrates, or insult and oppress the people, the foreign missionary has no right to make himself a party to the case. Some of the converts are perverse and lawless men; and to secrete such fellows so that they shall not be delivered to the authorities for just punishment is really a most heinous offense. Every man who joins the Romish Church desires to be protected: and in the provinces the missionaries take up all cases of complaint in which converts are implicated, and go into court to protest and interfere before the officials. There was a case in Szechuen, in which some women belonging to the church deceitfully refused to give up the crops of their land for rent, according to contract; and when the landlords asked it, they rose against the people and killed and wounded several. The French bishop presumed to issue his decision in the matter, and to this day none of these women have been examined or expiated their crime, which has, ever since the occurrence, greatly irritated the people of that province.

In Kweichan Province the Romanists always designate themselves as belonging to the Roman Catholic Church, in every paper which they present in court in cases wherein they are parties, expecting thereby to get some help to succeed. Everybody can see how such a course only adds to the bitterness and trouble. Furthermore, in all parts of the land, whenever a betrothal has been arranged between two families, if one of them subsequently joins the church, but the other does not, then the former compels the latter to break the engagement and cancel the marriage. Sometimes, in a family, the father or elder brother joins, while the son or younger brother does not; whereupon, the father reports his son to the officers as disobedient, and the elder brother denounces his younger brother as insolent; and the missionary takes part in such affairs and helps his people. The irritation which a variety of such cases as those now adduced has produced among the people is intense.

Rule fourth.

The laws which govern foreigners and natives living together ought to be calculated to promote mutual peace and bear equally on each. For instance, in cases of a serious nature involving life, the law should require life to be forfeited; each side to punish its own criminals according to its own laws, that the feelings of justice in men may be satisfied. Whether it be the native or foreign official who judges the case, let him simply decide its criminality as it comes before him: and after that has been done, let there be no further examination as to the amount of compensation or indemnity to be paid. Still more, let it be settled that each case is to be confined to its participants, and no one is to be allowed to demand that the gentry or traders, who had nothing to do with it, pay an indemnity. When an official tries a case wherein Romish converts and natives are involved, whichever of these two parties are proven to have been the aggressor in wronging the other, let the same law apply to all, and the same sentence be meted out to each, so that no partiality be exhibited. Whenever a Romanist is arrested for any misdemeanor that involves a breach of the laws, whatever the offense may be, he shall be examined by the local authorities. If he be accused by others before the courts, he shall, as the law provides, be seized and tried; and in neither case shall a missionary be permitted to protect converts from just sentence, or hinder their appearance before the authorities. In all cases where it can be shown that the missionary has screened persons in this way, or tried to thwart the orders of the officials, not only shall the real criminals be punished as the law directs, but the missionary himself shall suffer the same punishment for having resisted the course of law; or, if this cannot be, he shall be deported.

NOTE.—The missionary Mabileau was killed in a riot in Szchen in the year 1867. The authorities had arrested a man named Yen, who, being proven to be guilty, was executed for the crime. But the missionary M. Mihière persistently declared that the gentry had stirred up the quarrel, and forced them to pay an indemnity of 80,000 taels. The fact is, that the row was caused by some ignorant poor men, who suddenly broke out into these violent acts; but to turn around and compel quiet scholars of respectability and wealth to pay so much money has, with other high-handed acts, provoked deep indignation.

Again, when the missionary M. Rigaud was killed in a riot in the province of Szchen in 1869, there is not the least doubt that it was caused by the acts of the converts in compelling certain persons to annul a marriage contract. The governor general, Li Hung-chang, and the Manchu commander-in-chief, Chung, jointly examined into the affair, and they have long since condemned and executed Ho Tsai by decapitation, and Lin Fuh by strangling, proven to have murdered the missionary and converts. But [while the government did this] the converts who killed their countrymen, two men named Wang Hiah-ting and Chang Tien-hing, who, for several years, had been carrying on such a system of extortion, ravishing, plundering, burning, and killing, that they were long known as head rascals, have never yet been brought into court, although their crimes have been proved. In another instance the native priest, Tan Pu-chin, who headed a mob that killed Chao Yung-lin and over two hundred others in a haulet, where they were surrounded, has, we are now informed by the missionary, M. Mihière, gone beyond sea, and there is no clew by which he could be traced. These things have still more aroused the hatred of the people of Szchen.

Whenever a French missionary goes to any province to preach, the passport given to him should state the names of the province and prefecture to which he is going with great explicitness. If it mentions that his mission work is in a certain province, he should not be allowed to avail himself of the passport to secretly go elsewhere; and if it plainly describes the name and other particulars of the holder, he should not be permitted to turn it over to another man when he pleases. When he passes the barriers and customs-stations, such a passport should not enable him to take dutiable goods through, to the loss and detriment of the revenue. On reaching his place of destination, he ought to present the passport to the local officers for verification. If they find that the name and the place, as given in the passport, do not tally with the bearer, or that it has been passed over to a Chinese convert to enable him to act as a missionary, in either case the passport shall be defaced and canceled. If it be further ascertained that money has been unlawfully paid for the transfer of the passport, or any other illegality has been connected with it, the pretended missionary shall be severely punished, and the foreign missionary sent out of the country. The name and surname of the missionary who holds a passport shall be written in Chinese characters, and these alone shall be regarded as evidence, so that he may be readily recognized wherever he goes. If the holder returns home or dies, or if he changes his calling and no longer preaches, then the passport should be returned to the Chinese to be canceled. In whatever province or place insurrection exists, it is forbidden to issue passports to foreigners to go to those regions, and therefore, hereafter, when a missionary shall request a passport for a province in which military operations are carried on, its delivery shall be suspended, in order that the real purpose of a passport (i. e., a paper to protect one) may be manifested.

NOTE.—In the record of cases connected with missions in Kweichau Province, there appears the name of the missionary Chao, but in the Foreign Office there is no record of a passport having been issued to a missionary of that name to go to Kweichau. In his note respecting it M. Déveria, the interpreter, [at the French legation,] says: "I have examined the old records, and find that there was a priest named Chao who died from the effects of his wounds; but the man here meant is a man named Jui-lo-sz, who obtained a passport on the 16th of August, 1865, and was therein wrongly named Chao." It appears that on that day passport No. 325 was issued to a man named Jui-lo-sz to go to Szchen, but in the list for Kweichau there are no persons named either Chao or Jui-lo-sz to be found. If, therefore, the names and surnames of missionaries and their destinations be mixed and changed in this manner, how can any trust be reposed in the passport as a surety for protecting its holder? In another case a missionary, M. Spilngaert, [he who killed a Russian,] after acting in that capacity became a servant in the Prussian legation, but the passport granted at first was never afterward returned to this office. If passports can be thus inconsiderately transferred to other persons, or carelessly left to fall into other people's hands, not only shall we have many troubles arising from persons assuming false names and characters, but if they get into the hands of brigands or thieves, the injury done to the reputation of His Majesty will be very serious; and where, then, will be the good name of the church?

Rule sixth.

The object of a missionary being to exhort men to reform and become good, he ought, before receiving a man into his church, to carefully inquire into his character, and learn whether he has been convicted of crime or any evil deed, and then accept or reject him, according to the facts. If he be accepted, then it should be so stated in the titling-list of the place where he resides, just as is done with the members of monasteries and temples, so that evidence may exist upon the point. The number which each man can receive into the church should be limited, and he ought to report distinctly to the local magistrates on what day, month, and year he received each member, what had been his previous occupation, and that he had been convicted of no crime, nor taken an alias. In this way it would be easy to trace each person. If the member died or went away, this should likewise be reported. If no heinous misdemeanors can be alleged against a man when he is received, yet supposing he commits crimes after that date, he ought immediately to be excommunicated, and the same reported. Every month, or every quarter, the record of all these things should be made known to the local authorities for their inspection, just as is done by them with nunneries, temples, and houses of Buddhists and Taoists. By this monthly or quarterly examination the reputation of the Roman Catholic sect will receive no injury, but its members will, on the contrary, be able to live at peace with all.

NOTE.—In 1866 the governor of Kweichan reported that in the district of Kwei-ting several brigands, headed by one Yen Shih-pao, had combined with two Roman Catholic converts named Yuen Yuh-siang and Hia Ching-bing, and under the guise of that sect had led a party of fellows, which attacked and killed Wang Kiang-pao and Tso Yen-shan, severely wounded three others, plundered the houses of their contents, and carried off all the cattle and horses. In 1869 the same dignitary reported that the district magistrate of Tsun-i had sent him a public statement in which the writers declared that four men, named Sung, Tang, Tan, and Kien, who had formerly been rebels and pretended generals, had been received among the Roman Catholics. The injury inflicted upon the towns and villages since from these men was quite incalculable. There were also other restless disturbers of the peace in the neighborhood of Tsun-i, named Yang, Lin, Ching, Hieh, and Chao, who all joined themselves to the Romanists and managed everything connected with the church. They insulted and oppressed the orphans and the helpless, extorted money from the ignorant villagers, went in and out of the public courts, taking the oversight of such cases as related to their co-religionists, as if it was their business. If the magistrate tried to examine a case in which a Romanist was involved, and found that his case was groundless, then Yang and his comrades, at the head of a crowd of converts, would violently rush into the hall of justice and compel the magistrate to reverse his sentence. At other times, when these sectaries were detained under the surveillance of the police, these men would present the missionary's card and demand that the prisoners be instantly released. The cases, in short, are very numerous in which they have wrongfully possessed themselves of people's property, claimed their wives or daughters, or even destroyed their lives.

Rule seventh.

Missionaries living in China should conform to its usages and regulations, and carefully refrain from encroaching on the position of others, or overstepping their own proper functions. They should not presume to use official seals to stamp their letters, or write formal dispatches to officials of any rank. If they have any matters of their own to bring before the magistrates, not cases which involve others, or litigations of other people, let them do so in the same manner that native literary men adopt in addressing those in office, and state their affair clearly in the form of a petition, when it will be attended to and decided. If they wish to have a personal interview with the high authorities, they should adopt the ceremonies of the country and follow the practice of its literary men. Also, when they request an audience of the local magistrates, they should observe proper etiquette, and not rudely march into the public courts, to the great disturbance of official business.

NOTE.—In 1867 the Manchu commander-in-chief at Chingfu, in Szechuen, reported that the French Bishop Sinchon addressed the official board of consultation of that province in dispatches which he stamped with an official seal cast for the purpose. In 1868 Bishop Taury in Kweichan presumed to send an official communication on terms of equality to the Foreign Office, by the government post, in which he took upon himself to commend and ratify the acts of Towan, a former intendant there, and other officers and requesting that promotion and reward might be conferred on them. In Shantung a Romish missionary had the boldness to style himself a siun-fu, or governor. In the provinces of Szchuen and Kweichau the missionaries have gone to the length of asking that certain magistrates be degraded from office, because of their management of missionary cases—acts which not only encroach on and diminish the power of the rulers, but, still more than that, usurp the dignity of His Majesty. How can such unjustifiable and impertinent proceedings as those here mentioned do otherwise than cause general indignation?

Rule eighth.

In order to bring about mutual good feeling, it is proposed that hereafter no Roman Catholic missionary shall of his own motion demand that a place shall be given up to him because it was once a church. When land is to be bought for the purpose of erecting a church upon it, or a building is to be rented for a hall, by the Romanists, it is necessary to go in company with the real owner of the property to the local authorities of the place, in order to ascertain beforehand that there is no difficulty arising from fung-shui. If the magistrates consent, and the people offer no counter-representations, and do not dislike the proceedings, then the proposition can be carried out in accordance with the rule agreed upon in 1865. If the place is bought, it must be mentioned in the deed of sale, plainly and explicitly, that the property belongs to the congregation of Chinese Roman Catholics; it is forbidden to falsify names, and make the purchase and get hold of it by using other names. It is also disallowed to employ crafty natives to deceive in these transactions, and by their help to secretly get the property transferred, [without notifying the magistrates.]

NOTE.—Roman Catholic missionaries have long resided in China, and we wish that they and the people may confide in each other, and not so act as to excite the anger or settled dislike of those around them; for then all parties can live together without suspicion. But now many things are done by the Roman Catholics which greatly irritate the people and lead to strife; as, for instance, those proceedings connected with the restoration of church property. In late years, whenever they have demanded that houses and churches should be restored, they have never given a thought as to whether it annoyed the people of the place, but they have peremptorily demanded that the places be restored to them. They would even designate fine and elegant houses occupied by the gentry, and insist on their rendition, saying that anciently a church stood there, and thus compel the occupants to give them up. In some cases, these spots greatly interfered with the public service or dignity, or there was a clubhouse or hall of some kind, a temple, or other building which the whole community held in the highest veneration and carefully kept. These would be unscrupulously demanded and forcibly taken for the use of the church. Moreover, there are many buildings, which in former years really were churches, but in subsequent days were used for other purposes, or which were sold by members of the sect, and in process of time have since been sold by the people again and again, and now do not all belong to one person, or places which have been repaired and improved at a large expense, made like new houses; all these are known to have been forcibly demanded and obtained by the missionaries without paying aught for them. In cases where the buildings had become ruinous and dilapidated, they would demand that they be made habitable at the public expense. These doings have exasperated the people at large, and the two parties look at each other with bitterness. If they come to be actual enemies, how can they be expected to live together without coming to open rupture?

The points which have been discussed in this paper only relate to a part of the whole subject; but they go to prove clearly the improper conduct of the Roman Catholic missionaries, and that the converts cannot live amicably with their countrymen. Everybody knows that severe diseases require quick remedies, and if it is expected that these two parties are to get along well with each other, [something should be done,] and not permit things to go on until the acts of the missionaries seriously impair the amicable relations now existing between China and foreign countries. The other causes of complaint from various provinces are quite numerous, but we have not time to detail them in full. Good and bad people are found in the world, and when the one have been extirpated, then it encourages and soothes the other. For instance, if villainous traders are severely dealt with, you protect and honor the upright merchants by such action. So with the missionaries. If they do not take the trouble to inquire into the character of people, then every miscreant will seek admission into their church, and take advantage of his position to involve or ruin the honest and good. Such men will seek to oppose the officers and rouse the gentry, which will exasperate the people at large still more, till all over the empire they will come to hate foreigners as the inhabitants of Tien-tsin do. In such a posture of affairs, the commands of the Emperor himself would be disregarded, and the danger to everybody would be most imminent. In proposing these [eight] rules the government still designs to exert itself to protect these men, and at all times will try to maintain just treatment toward all. If the missionaries will honestly adhere to them, no difficulty is likely to arise, and all parties can be at peace; but if they will not accord with them, nor even act as required by the rules of their own sect, they can no longer propagate their doctrines in China. His Majesty's government desire to treat all Roman Catholics the same as they treat their other subjects, and make no difference between them. This decision is not come to because they wish to prohibit mission work in China, but simply because the missionaries do not attend to their proper place and functions. The way the Romanists now stir up and befool people will surely result in some serious disasters on the part of the latter; and if these burst out in many places in open violence, it is not unlikely that the government will be altogether unable to protect anybody. There is, therefore, no better way than for us to clearly state the case, as we have now done, before anything happens.

[Inclosure No. 2.—Dispatch No. 56.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, March 20, 1871.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 13th ultimo, to which was appended a memorandum setting forth somewhat in detail the causes of discontent among the people, and their ill-will toward the missionaries, and appealing to the representatives of all the treaty powers to take the subject into consideration, with a view of devising measures which will have a tendency to remove the difficulties and assure a continuance of peace between China and foreign nations. To accomplish this, eight rules are proposed by you for the better regulation of missionary enterprises. These rules have been drawn up by you in consultation with all the members of the Foreign Office, and will, if accepted and adopted by the western nations, in your opinion, remedy the evils complained of. By way of illustrating your position, showing that foreign missionaries are responsible for much of the ill-will of the Chinese, and proving that additional safeguards are necessary to preserve peace, instances are cited of illegal and unwise action on the part of missionaries.

I have read with attention all the papers you sent, and have given to their contents the most careful consideration.

It is a noticeable fact that, among all the cases cited, there does not appear to be one in which Protestant missionaries are charged with violating treaty, law, or custom. So far as I can ascertain, your complaints are chiefly against the action and attitude of the missionaries of the Roman Catholic faith, and as these are under the exclusive protection and control of the government of France, I might with great propriety decline to discuss a matter with which the Government of the United States has no direct interest or concern, for the reason that none of its citizens are charged with violating treaty or local law, and thus causing trouble. But fully appreciating the force and gravity of your observations when you affirm that involved in this question are the interests of all foreign residents in China, and upon its proper management and solution depend, in a greater or less degree, the safety and well-being of all, whether merchants or missionaries, without regard to nationality or religion, I feel justified in complying with your expressed desire, that all the representatives of the treaty powers will consult upon these grave questions. I shall, therefore, with entire frankness, give you my opinions upon the several points raised by you.

I cordially reciprocate the sentiment when you say that it is the earnest desire of the Prince and his associates to maintain peace between China and all foreign nations, and entirely concur in the opinion that when apprehensions of trouble arise, which may, if not averted, impair friendly relations, it is the part of wisdom and prudence to state frankly the disturbing causes, and together with the foreign representatives discuss, with a view to adoption, suitable measures for remedying the evils. Such discussions can do no harm and may lead to the best results.

Of the truth or justice of the complaints made to you by the provincial officers against the Roman Catholic bishops and priests, the undersigned cannot presume to judge. It is, however, not impossible or hardly improbable that the local officials, who think that their authority has been improperly resisted, and themselves insulted, may have overrated the discontent of the people, and have reported isolated cases of misconduct as the rule of missionary action.

It is also a noteworthy fact that substantially all the instances mentioned, where trouble has occurred through the alleged evil practices of the priests and Christians, are confined to the provinces of Szchuen and Kweichau—provinces far remote from the residence of consuls, merchants, and foreigners generally—which renders it difficult to obtain evidence as to the actual facts, except from the principals and their adherents on either side.

In this view, it is unfortunate that merchants are not allowed to reside there also, and that these places are not open to the residence of foreign consuls, who could look after and arrange such difficulties as they arise; and I would suggest that you take into careful consideration what has so often been urged upon the attention of the government, and see whether the opening of these disturbed districts to trade and the residence of foreign consuls would not be the best means you could adopt to prevent missionary troubles.

But, conceding that the charges you make are substantially correct, and the troubles as great as you represent, the remedy, it appears to me, is quite simple, requiring no extraordinary rules or regulations. You say that the trouble arises chiefly from the illegal acts of the native Christians, and the attempt on the part of the missionaries to shield these people from the just punishments for their crimes. In reply, I have to say that the Government of the United States, while it claims to exercise, under and by virtue of the stipulations of treaty, the exclusive right of judging of the wrongful acts of its citizens resident in China, and of punishing them when found guilty according to its own laws, does not assume to claim or exercise any authority or control over the natives of China. This rule applies equally to merchants and missionaries, and so far as I know all foreign governments having treaties with China adhere strictly to this rule. In case, however, missionaries see that native Christians are being persecuted by the local officials on account of their religious opinions, in violation of the letter and spirit of the XXIXth article of the treaty between the United States and China, it would be proper, and entirely in accordance with the principles of humanity and the teachings of their religion, to make respectful representation of the facts in such cases to the local authorities direct, or through their diplomatic representative to the Foreign Office; for it cannot be presumed that the imperial government would sanction any violation of treaty engagement, or that the local officials would allow persecutions for opinion's sake, when once the facts are made known to them. In doing this the missionaries should conform to Chinese custom and etiquette, so far as it can be done without assuming an attitude that would be humiliating and degrading to themselves.

With reference to Rule 1, as proposed, the undersigned is not prepared to speak. The American missionaries have no establishments of the kind alluded to, and he cannot assent to or dissent from a proposition which has for its object the regulation and government of asylums of a distinct religious sect, under the special protection of another nation. He would, however, observe in this connection, that there are Roman Catholic orphan asylums in all parts of the United States, over which the Government exercises no surveillance or control; and, instead of arousing suspicion and hatred, these charities are so well and favorably known that they merit praise and commendation, and receive contributions for their support from both government and people, irrespective of religious creed, wherever they are located. It would, I think, be well for the government of China to expend its energies in the more weighty concerns of administration, and allow charities of all kinds, which have for their object the amelioration of the condition of children or adults, the largest freedom compatible with the safety and well-being of the people.

Rule 2 is without apparent reason, and unjust. Among all western nations females attend churches in common with the males, and their religious teachings conduce to the highest good. Their attending church in company with parents, husbands, and friends should in no manner give rise to suspicions. On the contrary, their presence in such places is a guarantee against illegal combination or plots against the state or individuals. In western lands it is considered of the highest importance that females be educated in literature and religion, so that they may be fitted to rear families who will become useful and honest members of society. So fixed is this principle become in all Christian countries that a proposition of this character will be regarded as an unfriendly interference to prevent the carrying into effect, in its proper sense, Article XXIX of the treaty before alluded to. I deeply regret that such a rule should have been proposed. Instead of being accepted by the treaty powers, the mere mention of it will, I fear, cause some to doubt the good faith of the government and people of China in their profession of a desire to observe all treaty stipulations.

Rules 3 and 4 appear to me entirely unnecessary. Missionaries have no right under the treaties to do the things complained of; hence any additional regulations to prevent such acts are superfluous.

When native Christians offend they are subject to, and under the control of, the laws and officials of their own country; nor do I see how it is possible for the missionaries to oppress the people in any way. In the United States every person is allowed the largest liberty in the discussion of all subjects pertaining to government or religion. In this way the people hear all sides, and are the better able to judge between the true and the false. If the Buddhist, Taoish, Confucian, and Christian faiths could all be explained without hinderance, the people will judge of the merits of each and adhere to the one that seems to be the most reasonable and true. Each sect will find adherents and followers, but there need not on this account arise ill-will, jealousy, or hatred between the followers of these sects. It would be well, I think, for the government to make further inquiries into the customs of foreign nations, and see whether it would not promote a better understanding between natives and foreigners, without weakening the government or lessening the respect of the people for their rulers, if greater freedom were allowed in the worship of all religions, and the adherence to any sect the people choose without interference on the part of the government.

If native Christians are exempted from the payment of contributions for theatrical plays and processions it shows a spirit of justice on the part of their rulers, and should in no way cause them to evade the payment of their proportion of other proper taxes and assessments; nor should missionaries uphold them in such acts. But foreign missionaries, while it is their duty to refrain from any interference between natives and the officials, except to explain cases when explanations will be of service to enable justice to be done, and which the officials will, without doubt, always be glad to have if they are honest, cannot be held subject to Chinese law except in the way of arrest and delivery to the consular officers of their own country, according to the rule laid down in the treaties. In the cases cited which occurred in Szchuen, where it is charged that the Christian culprit ran away and evaded justice, the proper officers are, it seems to me, alone responsible for all this. The missionaries had no right to shield, screen, or secrete these people, nor should they be censured if they refuse to act the part of police officers in the arrest of Christians. This all belongs to the local officials to do. If the men were guilty, I fail to see any good reason why they were not arrested and punished the same as Ho Tsai and Liuh Fuh, if the officers had done their duty.

Rule 5 seems to me proper enough, except that portion authorizing a refusal of passports for provinces where rebellion may exist. If consented to, this might practically nullify the whole passport system provided for in the treaties. Missionaries will hardly take the risk of going into districts where rebellion is rife; and if they do, on them will fall the penalty of such rash acts. In the last ten years, during which passports have been granted, no cases have been reported in which the holders have gone among rebels to aid them in any way.

Rule 6. I fail to see what practical good would come from a registry of the members of each church, were it assented to. It is not to be supposed that all enrolled as members of the Buddhist, Taoist, Confucian, or Christian sects are pure and honest men; nor should the fact of their being so enrolled exempt them from arrest and punishment in case they commit offenses against the laws.

In the cases mentioned that happened in Kweichan in 1866 and 1869, instead of making these a ground of general complaint to the Foreign Office, why did not the governor cause the arrest and punishment of the brigands? Their profession of Christianity certainly did not exempt them from the just consequences of their evil deeds. It would seem that the officers, instead of attending to their own proper duties in the administration and due execution of the laws, chose to allow these people to escape for the purpose of reporting these cases, and on them founding a general charge against Christianity and the missionaries. If lawless people, whether Christians or non-Christians, are allowed to oppress the orphans and the helpless, deceive and exact from the villagers, and assume improper positions in the courts, instead of listening to such complaints from those whose duty it is to prevent and punish such outrages, the officials should, it seems to me, be summarily deprived of their rank and severely punished for allowing these things to go on.

Rules 7 and 8. If the missionaries assume to exercise powers unauthorized by treaty and regulations, use seals, or adopt a style in addressing the officials in any way unbecoming, the representative of the government to which they belong, upon a proper statement of the facts, would issue such orders as would prevent a repetition of such improprieties. In case of any gross breach of etiquette by an American missionary, I should, upon the fact being made known to me, take steps to prevent such occurrences in the future. It is the custom of the American missionaries to use caution when they go to a new place to rent rooms or houses, and they endeavor by all means to so manage as to gain the good will of the people.

Instances have occurred where they have been prevented from renting or buying property for no other reason, apparently, than a disposition to embarrass and hinder them in their preaching. Many cases of this kind have occurred which would have formed just grounds for complaint to the Foreign Office. I have, however, refrained from making complaints of this character, as I felt sure that as soon as the real purposes of the missionaries became better understood there would be less and less opposition to them on the part of the people. With reference to the restoration of property which was confiscated many years ago, and of the use of which its proper owners have been deprived, that is a matter which concerns the missionaries of the Roman Catholic faith alone, and must be arranged with the representative of France. It is, perhaps, but natural that disputes and difficulties should occur in the settlement of such a question. No fixed rule is possible which will apply in all cases of this nature. Nothing but mutual forbearance, and a desire to settle amicably, in a spirit of justice, these questions, will be likely to accomplish a satisfactory result. The experience gained in the solution of these questions will, undoubtedly, prove a useful lesson to both officials and people. It will clearly demonstrate that unjust and unlawful persecutions and confiscations will require reparation sooner or later, and prove that the best way to avoid the difficulties that have caused so much anxiety and trouble during the past ten years is to act justly toward all people and all religious sects; then foreign nations will have no claims of this nature to urge.

To assure peace in the future, the people must be better informed of the purposes of foreigners. They must be taught that merchants are engaged in trade which cannot but be beneficial to both native and foreigner, and that missionaries seek only the welfare of the people, and are engaged in no political plots or intrigues against the government. Whenever cases occur in which the missionaries overstep the bounds of decorum, or interfere in matters with which they have no proper concern, let each case be reported promptly to the minister of the country to which it belongs. Such isolated instances should not produce prejudice or engender hatred against those who observe their obligations, nor should sweeping complaints be made against all on this account. Those from the United States sincerely desire the reformation of those whom they teach, and to do this they urge the examination of the Holy Scriptures, wherein the great doctrines of the present and a future state, and also the resurrection of the soul, are set forth, with the obligation of repentance, belief in the Savior, and the duties of man to himself and others. It is owing, in a great degree, to the prevalence of a belief in the truth of the scriptures that western nations have attained their power and prosperity. To enlighten the people is a duty which the officials owe to the people, to foreigners, and themselves; for if, in consequence of ignorance, the people grow discontented and insurrection and riots occur, and the lives and property of foreigners are destroyed or imperiled, the government cannot escape its responsibility for these unlawful acts.

If the danger is as great as the contents of your communication would appear to indicate, and that, owing to the ignorance of the common people, all will be likely to suffer, irrespective of nationality or religious belief, then it certainly is a matter of great concern to all foreign governments, which should lead them to consult and seek means to prevent, if possible, such a catastrophe, and also adopt measures for defending their rights under the several treaties.

If I have failed to comprehend fully the difficulties and dangers which surround the situation which you have endeavored to point out, or if I have omitted noticing any point of importance, I am quite ready and willing to meet you and the other members of the Foreign Office, and discuss these as well as other questions of difference between your country and foreign nations, in a spirit of forbearance, with an earnest desire to so arrange and settle all questions that peace and mutual confidence may long continue.

With renewed assurances of regard and consideration, I have the honor to remain your excellencies' obedient servant,

FREDERICK F. LOW.

Copy of a confidential note addressed by the Chinese minister Wân-tsiang to Sir Rutherford Alcock, late British minister at Peking.

JUNE 26, 1869.

The writer again addresses. [Sir R. Alcock.]

The object of foreigners who enter the interior to propagate their doctrines is the exhortation of men to virtue. But among their converts there are evil-disposed and well-disposed. [The latter,] relying on their creed as a sort of magic spell which shall protect them, by their conduct bring the preaching of Christianity into such discredit that [the people] are unwilling to allow the missionary to remain in any place that he goes to. Add to this that the missionary only thinks of the number of converts he can make; he makes no inquiry into private character, but receives and enrolls all [who come.] Having entered the [Christian] society, the good are bent, no doubt, on being good; but on the other hand, the evil make [their religion] a pretext for defrauding and oppressing unoffending people, till, by degrees, indignation and rage reach a point at which the relations of the two parties become as those of fire and water. At the present time, as the British minister must doubtless be well aware, case after case of murder has occurred, the consequence of feuds between Christians and non-Christians. Although the creeds of the various foreign countries differ in their origin and development from each other, the natives of China are unable to see the distinction between them. In their eyes all [teachers of religion] are "missionaries from the west," and directly they hear a lying story [about any of these missionaries,] without making further and minute inquiry [into its truth] they rise in a body to molest him.

The Yang-chow affair is plain evidence of this. Now, if no preventive measures be taken, some great catastrophe will inevitably arise.

Regulations ought, therefore, to be drawn up with such care as shall enable them to protect native Christians from making their religion a pretext for extorting money from honest people, or the non-Christians from taking advantage of their numerical superiority to defraud and oppress the Christians, which shall, besides, bring missionaries, even as the priests of the Buddhist and Taoist sects, under the jurisdiction of the local authorities.

Seeing that missionaries wish to reside in China, and that their doctrines may gradually be propagated far and wide, they cannot wish the Chinese to look upon them as differing from themselves. They ought, therefore, to put themselves on the same footing as Chinese subjects. Buddhism is also a creed of western origin, but the reason why its followers have so long been at peace with the Chinese, each party adhering to his own religion, is this: that although there is a difference of religion, the propagators of this creed are, as well as the others, under the control of the local authorities; and so in Confucianism, the system most esteemed in China, when such men as Chin-Shih and Han-lin, (those who have taken the highest degrees,) after having filled official positions, return home or become the heads of schools, they become subordinate, as they were before [they took office,] to the local authorities. This is always the rule. At the present time foreign missionaries as a general rule adopt the Chinese dress, but they do not [at the same time] submit to Chinese law. They thus begin by holding themselves as outside, [the pale of the law,] and show to others that they are not to be treated as ordinary people; and the native Christians go further. They defraud and oppress ordinary subjects of the country, or withstand and disobey the authorities. [Such being the case,] it is not to be wondered at that men become indignant, and that surprise is everywhere manifested.

But let only this change be made, viz, that [missionaries] be placed under the control of the local authorities, (who must not be allowed to be vexatious in their treatment of them,) and the result will be that Christians and non-Christians will be placed on a just level ris-à-ris each other, and no trouble will arise from unexpected sources.

The missionary question moreover gravely affects the whole question of commercial relations. Such measures must, therefore, be devised in time that shall insure the maintenance of everlasting and sincere friendship.

The writer hopes for a reply.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Peking, April 3, 1871. (Received July 22.)

SIR: I have the honor to send herewith translation of a note from the Foreign Office, in reply to one from me requesting the good offices of the Chinese government to send a letter from me to the King of Corea.

The note, you will observe, contains a declaration that, while Corea is considered and treated as a tributary kingdom, entire independence is conceded in all that relates to its government, religion, and intercourse with foreign nations. This declaration is made at this time, undoubtedly, to guard against complications that may possibly grow out of an attempt by foreign nations to open intercourse with Corea, and relieve this Government of all responsibility for the acts of the Coreans, whether hostile or otherwise.

It is altogether probable that this course has been adopted by the Chinese officials in consequence of the action of the representative of France, who assumed to hold China responsible for the acts of the Coreans who murdered and expelled the French missionaries in 1866.

The announcement that the sending of the letter is a departure from long-established custom and therefore exceptional, which must not be construed into a precedent for granting similar favors in the future, is put forth in this way to be quoted in case any other government should ask a similar favor.

The timidity of the Chinese officials when called upon to perform any duty not in accordance with long-established precedent and custom is quite apparent, and also their desire to avoid all complications which may by any possibility involve their government in difficulty.

The note in question also exhibits in rather a striking manner the superabundance of circumlocution with which all action of the officials is attended. This will be more apparent when you are informed that, prior to writing the letter in question or making any request to have it sent, I sought an interview with the members of the Foreign Office, at which I explained fully my purposes, the objects I have in view, and what I desire them to do, and obtained from them a promise that my wishes should be complied with.

LETTER FROM THE FOREIGN OFFICE,
March 28, 1871.

SIR: We were honored on the 7th of this month by receiving your dispatch, in which you informed us that, as you had been appointed special envoy to go to Corea, there to negotiate upon matters of public interest, you had decided to send a letter to the authorities of that land, and therefore requested us to forward it on your behalf.

In relation to this request we may observe, that although Corea is regarded as a country subordinate to China, yet she is wholly independent in everything that relates to her government, her religion, her prohibitions, and her laws; in none of these things has China hitherto interfered. It was necessary, therefore, in order to forward your dispatch, for the Foreign Office to present a memorial, requesting that it might be transferred to the board of rites to be sent on; but we previously stated to you, that it is impossible to determine now whether the Corean authorities will return an answer.

On the 12th instant we memorialized the throne, requesting that the board of rites might be allowed to write a dispatch to accompany this letter to be forwarded to Corea, and notified that board at the same time. We have now received an answer from the board, stating that on the 22d of this month His Majesty had been informed that this dispatch, carefully sealed, had that day been transmitted to the board of war to be sent on by its couriers. This answer further stated that in all the relations of China with its dependent states the long-established rules of the board of rites had never contained any provision about forwarding letters to them; the permission now granted for it to do such a thing was therefore only for this occasion; it was an extraordinary favor, quite in excess of usage, and one which could not, on any account, be again granted.

We therefore make known this reply to your excellency; and while doing so avail ourselves of the opportunity to wish that you may enjoy daily happiness.

ON BOARD FLAG-SHIP COLORADO,
Harbor of Nagasaki, May 13, 1871.

SIR: By the last mail I received a dispatch from H. M. Brent, esq., United States chargé d'affaires in Peru, inclosing a document written in the Chinese language, which he supposed was a petition from the Chinese laborers in Peru to their government, and asking me to forward it to Prince Kung, if, after examination, I found it a proper communication. I have the honor to send herewith copy of Mr. Brent's dispatch, and a translation of its inclosure; the original of the letter has been sent to Mr. Williams, with instructions to present it to the prince, as requested. This document furnishes additional proof of the barbarities and miseries inseparable from the coolie trade; and although it may not produce such a profound impression upon the Chinese government as it would upon that of any western nation, it will prove one of the many lessons by means of which the officials of China will be made to realize their international obligations, and induce the government to conform its action to the rule recognized as binding upon all other countries. The fact of these people appealing to be placed under the protection of the representative of the United States, in order that their hardships and sufferings may be ameliorated, cannot fail to impress upon the Chinese that there is a clear line of distinction to be drawn between foreign nations and the principles of honesty and humanity by which they are governed, of which the Chinese people generally have a very faint idea.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, January 27, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a document in Chinese, with its envelope, that has been handed me by the Chinese resident in this capital. It is directed to his excellency Prince Kung; and if you, after having become acquainted with its contents, see fit to deliver it to the Chinese Foreign Office, you will confer a favor upon its authors. I am entirely ignorant of its tenor.

I have, &c.,

H. M. BRENT.

Translation of the Chinese document inclosed in the dispatch of the United States chargé d'affaires at Lima, of date 27th January, 1871, to the minister of the United States at Peking.

NOTE.—The document is a petition by the representatives of certain Chinese societies at Lima, setting forth the distress of coolie emigrants in Peru, and praying that a Chinese envoy may be appointed to inquire into their condition; or, failing in this, that the United States minister to Peru may be invested with authority to act as such envoy. The date of the petition is 26th January, 1871. The cover is dated 10th year of Tung-Chih, first moon, 26th day, and is stamped with the name of the Fukeên and Swatow Guild, the Kwang Tung Guild, and the Tung Shêng club, of Lima.

The petition is in very good literary style; the person to whom it is addressed is probably the United States minister at Lima, though no name or title excepting "your excellency" appears in it.

[Translation.]

Chêng Chuan, Wen Têh-lin, Chêng Chun-ta, and Lin Hu-shih, representing the Kwang Tung and Fu-Kêên Guilds, all being Chinese subjects lost abroad, with their heads to the ground, present a petition to your excellency. They cast themselves upon your heaven-like intelligence, that the insolent deception and cruelly oppressive treatment, suffered by Chinese subjects at the hands of wicked barbarians, may be required into. Petitioners would humbly set forth that the reason why, though born and bred in China, they took service abroad is because they were unable to gain a livelihood at home, owing to the swarm [like bees] of rebels and robbers from the fourth year of Heen Fêng, (1854.) Later, in the eighth year of Heen Fêng, (1858,) there appeared a joint notification by his excellency Hwang, governor general of the two Kwang provinces, and his excellency Pih, governor of Kwang Tung, to the effect that rules of agreement had been entered into with England and France, with reference to the engagement of laborers to go to Peru, the period of service to be eight years, on the expiry of which term those thus engaged to be sent home, etc., etc.; and consequently the number of emigrants who have come to Peru since that year is no less than several myriads. But, far from what was expected, the barbarians have shown themselves treacherous in many ways. In China, when they were seeking men, they spoke of our taking service as laborers, and designated us "guests," [i. e., visitors abroad;] on landing in their country, however, they said we had "sold ourselves," and called us "slaves." Furthermore, they beat and swear at us with great violence, and feed and clothe us insufficiently; they brand two characters on the side of the face as is done in China in cases of banishment; they fasten shackles on the ankles, just as if we were captured prisoners. We have to till the soil or dig canals, day and night; with flogging and beating to death, one cannot reckon the number of restless ghosts. Notwithstanding rules of agreement were drawn up, in how many instances have they been regarded? While it was stated that we should be sent home, yet, who, we ask, has been so sent on the expiry of the term of service? Alas! Alas! Your supplicants went forth from a land of reason and justice to one where no sense of right prevails; from being the faithful subjects of a great country we have unwittingly fallen into the poisonous clutch of barbarian slaves. We humbly submit that having [in going abroad] shown ourselves disloyal to our sovereign and unfilial to our ancestors, the infliction upon us of insult and oppression does not indeed merit commiseration; still, the treatment we, his subjects, receive gives our Emperor cause to blush, and is a stain upon our ancestors. How very painful it is to speak or think of this! In the first moon of the ninth year of T'ang Chih, a petition was forwarded through the United States magistrate [? consul] to the minister, praying him to intercede. On the 21st day of the 4th moon a reply [from the consul] was received to the effect that he hoped the United States minister would examine the circumstances with compassion, and devise means of relief, so that those desiring to remain should no longer be subjected to oppression, and those desiring to return home might do so at an early day. This the consul earnestly hoped; and further, this matter had been fully communicated to their excellencies, the envoys from China to the different powers, Mr. Burlingame, Chih, and Sun, for their information, &c.; such was the reply to the position. But although we have been favored with the sympathy of these high officials, still our extreme distress has been too great to be relieved, and from day to day the oppression grows worse. The avarice and cruelty of the wealthy merchants is wolf-like, and the vexatious treatment of the foreign [Peruvian] officials is like a tiger. Our countrymen cannot make a motion without its being construed into a fault. What is the explanation of all this? England, France, and the United States, and the various nations great and small, whose people are engaged in commerce here, and go to and fro, have each established an official called "consul," a man sent out from his own country; again, there are ships of war every year visiting and looking about, and each nation has its resident minister to exercise control. Hence the officials and people of Peru do not dare to commit such acts as they please with the people of other nationalities, and the reason why all kinds of tyranny is visited upon Chinese alone is verily that our heavenly dynasty has no ships of war to visit and inspect, and no minister to exercise control on the spot. With the majesty of the Emperor extending to the four seas, and his goodness pervading every place, we humbly venture to ask why this hateful tribe should be permitted to give the rein to their violence and audacity, to the grievous affliction of his subjects?

Your petitioners, in sore distress at the cruelties inflicted, and with a sense of resentment for the living and the dead, have prepared a petition in common, supplicating your favor to save and lift them up; they would beg your excellency to have the Emperor memorialized to exercise his special grace, and commission an envoy to proceed to Peru to make an investigation, when the wicked barbarians must certainly put a stop to their cruel conduct; or, failing this, to commission the minister of the United States to act for him. Then the restoration of your humble petitioners from death to life will be the gift of your excellency. On our knees we present this petition, praying that your excellency's posterity may be ennobled for all generations.

The humble members of the Kwang Tung Guild, and of the Fukeen Guild, prostrate themselves.

Petition presented on the 26th day of January, (according to the occidental date.)

ON BOARD OF FLAG-SHIP COLORADO,
Harbor of Nagasaki, May 13, 1871. (Received June 22.)

SIR: I have the honor to report my arrival in this harbor in the flag-ship Colorado, on the morning of the 12th instant, having left Shanghai on the 8th instant. Our departure from Shanghai was delayed several days in consequence of the necessity of the admiral's presence there in arranging for the repairs of the Ashuelot, and other business pertaining to his fleet. The Monocacy and Palos accompanied the Colorado, and are now in this harbor. We found the Benicia and Alaska here awaiting our arrival. The fleet expects to sail on Tuesday the 16th instant, and, if nothing unusual occurs, will reach the coast of Corea in three or four days thereafter. The admiral has gathered all the information possible in regard to the coasts, harbors, and rivers of Corea, and I have collected all the data that can be found, private as well as public, about that country and its inhabitants. It is, however, meager, and not to be relied upon as a guide for action.

The fact is that Corea is more of a sealed book than Japan was before Commodore Perry's visit. The scanty information obtainable, if taken as a guide, will be more likely to mislead than otherwise, and hence I shall consider personal observation and experience as the only safe and reliable basis from which to form conclusions, and on which to found action.

I apprehend that all the cunning and sophistry which enter so largely into oriental character will be brought to bear to defeat the object of our visit, and if that fails it is not unlikely that we may be met with a display of force. It is impossible to say what the exact line of action will be, as so much depends upon the temper and disposition of the Corean officials. I hope that the object sought for may be accomplished peacefully; but if it becomes necessary to use force, I shall endeavor to confine it to repelling unprovoked attacks, and redressing actual wrongs and insults. It is mistaken policy when dealing with oriental governments and people to allow insults and injuries to go unredressed. Such lenity leads them to believe that fear alone prevents retaliation, and adds to their arrogance, conceit, and hostility.

It gives me pleasure to add that I am comfortably situated on the flag-ship, and every disposition is manifested to contribute to my convenience and comfort. Admiral Rodgers exhibits an anxiety to render the mission a successful one, and I doubt not there will be entire concurrence and co-operation between us on all measures which may be deemed necessary for the public interest. It is doubtful if I shall be able to communicate with you again until the mail which leaves Shanghai July 12.

ON BOARD FLAG-SHIP COLORADO,
Off Isle Boisé, Corea, May 31, 1871. (Received July 24.)

SIR: Referring to my No. 65, of 25th ultimo, and No. 69, of 13th instant, I have now the honor to report my safe arrival at this point yesterday afternoon. The other ships of the squadron are also at this anchorage. The ships left Nagasaki on the 16th instant, Ferrières Islands, off the coast of Corea being designated by the admiral as the place of rendezvous. From there to this anchorage our progress has been slow, it being necessary to send the smaller vessels and the steam-launches ahead to explore the channels before proceeding with the larger vessels. Dense fogs for several days further hindered our progress. This accounts for the length of voyage.

A map* which is inclosed herewith will give you a general idea of the configuration of the coast, the position of the squadron at the present moment, and an outline of the water approach to the capital, as well as the general direction by land and the approximate distance by either route. This map is made from the explorations and surveys of the French squadron when here in 1866, and has been found as far as verified substantially correct. The distance from here to the capital by water is about fifty miles; by land about half as much. It is believed that it will be found impracticable to move the Colorado, Alaska, and Benicia any farther up without great risk. The Monocacy and Palos can undoubtedly go to Seoul by taking advantage of the tides, the rise and fall of which varies from twenty to forty feet. These extraordinary tides cause very rapid currents, varying from four to eight miles an hour in velocity.

When we reached an anchorage off Eugénie Island the Palos and four steam-launches were sent northward to sound the channels as far as this point. They met with no resistance, nor was any attempt made by the natives to communicate with either the launches or the vessel. I inclose herewith copies of my instructions to Captain Blake, of the United States steamer Alaska, who was placed in command of the surveying expedition. I also sent with him as interpreter Mr. John P. Cowles, jr., acting assistant secretary of legation. Inclosed you will find his report of the incidents that occurred on the trip. While lying at the anchorage, near Eugénie Island, boats were sent out sounding in the immediate vicinity. The first day the natives fled to the hills upon the approach of the boats to the shore. The second day curiosity evidently overcame their fears, and some came down to the beach near the boats and handed to the officers some slips of paper written in Chinese, inquiring where we were from, what was our business, &c., &c. As their actions appeared to be friendly I ordered a reply to be returned, giving assurance of our friendly intentions, and sent Captain Nichols, chief of the admiral's staff, and Mr. Drew, on shore to deliver it. They met the people assembled about fifty in number, and had some conversation with them. No official appeared acknowledging himself as such.

Soon after the ship anchored here, yesterday, a native boat made its appearance near by, the men on board holding up a letter and beckoning for some one on the ship to come and get it. Mr. Drew went off in a boat, boarded the junk, and got the letter, a copy of which, together with my reply, I have the honor to enclose. The men in the junk were invited on board the ship, where they came without hesitation, and a considerable conversation ensued between them and Captain Nichols and Mr. Drew. They said that three officials of the third rank were waiting at a place near here, having been sent down by the government to see and inquire into our particular business, and that they had been sent by the three officials to bring their note. These men were informed that the officials referred to would be received on board whenever they chose to come. In the reply which was returned the officials were informed that a surveying party would proceed up towards Kang-hoa; that the common people need not be alarmed at their approach, as our intentions were entirely peaceful. The messengers were verbally requested to ask the officials to send word up the river to the people not to molest the surveying vessels, and thus avoid all chance of trouble. This assurance of our peaceful disposition was accepted with indications of much satisfaction.

To-day the three officials came on board, and as they appeared to be of minor rank and failed to exhibit any authority from the government I declined to see them, and substituted Mr. Drew and Mr. Cowles to meet them in my stead. They were again informed that the surveying vessels would go up higher to-morrow, and were assured of our desire to avoid trouble in every way. They made no objection, but, on the contrary, gave tacit assurances that the expedition would meet with nothing but civility and kindness from the natives. Mr. Drew also informed them that the minister on board had important business with the government, which would be made known to a person of equal rank duly appointed by the King, and that it was our desire to establish peaceful relations between the two countries which would be lasting. They acknowledged having seen my letter written at Peking, and stated that while the King desired to maintain friendly relations, he did not desire to make treaties—a treaty in their estimation meaning trade.

In reply they were informed by Mr. Drew that he was not authorized to discuss these points, and that all this could with propriety be left for discussion when a high official came to meet the minister. They were shown over the ship, and upon their leaving Mr. Drew requested that a report of the interview might be made known to the King, to which they made no objections. What the result will be it is as yet premature to predict. I place little confidence in oriental professions of friendliness. Every effort will be made to avoid trouble, unless forced upon us in a way that cannot be escaped without dishonor.

*Frederick F. Low to Homer C. Blake.*ON BOARD UNITED STATES FLAG-SHIP COLORADO, May 23, 1871.

SIR: Herewith I beg to hand you a sealed letter, written in Chinese and directed to the King of Corea, which I desire you to forward to its destination by an official of the highest rank you may meet, if you find such a course practicable. If no official makes his appearance during your explorations south of the island of Kang-hoa, you will retain the letter until you reach an anchorage opposite the city of the same name upon that island. If, upon your arrival there, no officials make their appearance, through whom you can communicate with the capital, it is my wish that you shall write a note in your own name, with your rank attached, to the highest official resident at Kang-hoa, informing him that you are the bearer of an important dispatch from the minister of the United States to the government of Corea, which it is desired shall reach its destination without unusual delay, asking him at the same time whether it will be more convenient for him to forward the letter, or whether, by declining this service, he will leave the United States minister free to seek such other means of communicating with the capital as shall be by him deemed advisable.

If an official undertakes to deliver the letter, you will endeavor to procure a proper acknowledgment, in writing, of his promise, and, if practicable, get him to name the time when and the place where the answer will be returned.

If, during your trip to Kang-hoa, you find no one who will undertake to perform the service, you will return the letter to me with a report of your proceedings.

It is not unlikely that you will be visited by natives, both official and unofficial, who will make inquiries concerning the visit of the squadron, and the objects we have in view. It is my desire that neither you nor the officers under your command shall hold conversations with any except officials, with reference to the object of my visit or that of the squadron. In conversation with officials, and in reply to the inquiries they will probably make, you are at liberty to say that I am sent by the President of the United States to arrange important matters with the government of Corea, the particulars of which will be fully and frankly made known when a person of suitable rank and station is duly appointed to meet and confer with me; that I desire nothing but what is reasonable and proper, and which I cannot doubt will be agreed to after the government shall be made acquainted with my requests; that I do not expect this can be done in a few days, and therefore I have come prepared to spend a considerable time upon the coast, in order that a thorough understanding may be arrived at which will render the friendship of the two countries firm and lasting; that considerable delay will undoubtedly be necessary in order that the difficult channels may be explored and sounded, and thus rendered safe for the larger vessels to approach nearer to the capital, where it is my wish that negotiations may be carried on; which delay will afford ample time for the government to consider and discuss the matter, and enable it to give an answer, probably, by the time I shall have reached the capital or some point in its vicinity.

If they ask why so many ships of war have come on a professedly peaceful errand, you can reply that a minister of my rank does not travel except in a dignified manner befitting his mission, with force sufficient to repel attacks, and chastise all who may molest or insult either the minister or the flag of the country he represents.

Mr. John P. Cowles, jr., acting assistant secretary of legation, will accompany you as interpreter.

Relying upon your good judgement and tact to successfully carry out my wishes, I am, &c.,

*Frederick F. Low to H. C. Blake.*ON BOARD FLAG-SHIP COLORADO, May 23, 1871.

SIR: With this you will find a general letter which I had prepared for your guidance during your preliminary trip to the northward. Inasmuch as you will not proceed as far as the island of Kang-hoa before returning to the flag-ship, I do not send the letter for transmission to the King of Corea. I shall retain it here; and if you meet any officials desirous of learning the object of our visit to the coast, you will be guided by the tenor of the general letter accompanying this in your conversations with them. You will further inform them that I am on board the flag-ship, and have a letter which I desire to send to the government.

Respectfully, yours,

F. F. LOW.

*John P. Cowles, Jr., to F. F. Low.*UNITED STATES FLAG-SHIP COLORADO, Roze Roads, Corea, May 29, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to report that, in obedience to your instructions, I accompanied Captain Blake in charge of a surveying expedition up towards the mouth of Salée River. Leaving on the morning of the 24th, in the steamship Palos, and with four fully-equipped steam-launches, reached Boisé Island at noon of the 26th, and found there a fine harbor equal to all requirements. It was ascertained upon the trip up, by the thorough investigations of the commanders of the launches, that the Gulf de l'Impératrice is a shoal bay, which, though reaching far in towards Seoul, and that too in a direction where the air-line to Seoul would cross much less elevated land than generally prevails, is yet too shoal to admit vessels of even light draught. Numerous junks were observed in the northeast of this gulf, and it is surmised that in that neighborhood lies the approach to Jén Chûan, a place which should, by the maps, be not less important officially than Kang-hoa, and can lie but five miles or so from Boisé. It is thought by good judges that the track of ships approaching Seoul River from the southward will henceforward not make the Ferrières Islands as their first land, but instead run in for Ronnd Island, only five miles below Boisé. The launches were in some cases shouted to by natives, some displaying bows and arrows, some matchlocks; but the greater part of the population were unarmed, and showed alarm by retreating to the clumps of trees on the hill-tops. The islands are only very sparsely populated, only scattered spots of valley-land being cultivated. The islands were, only in exceptional instances wooded, and water seemed not very abundant. The Tache Blanche, four miles below Round Island, was visited at low water and declared to show many indications of iron.

The French charts were found remarkably accurate, except that not all the barriers to seaward can be substantiated. The navigation in clear weather as far as Isle Boisé would be very easy. Plenty of water can be carried to Boisé. The water there is still salt, supporting the soubriquet given by the French of Salt River.

We saw no indications of fortifications till we approached Boisé; this island and Roze Island, a narrow passage of a mile and a half, existing between the mainland and the large island Tung Tjong to the west. On the eastern end of this island—Tung Tjong—is the village, with a rather Japanese-like wall, with a sea-front of perhaps a mile and a half. The wall is, perhaps, fifteen feet high, but not, apparently, thick. Its age would seem to point back to Japanese tuition. Launches could approach it within a dozen rods at high tide, if the position of fishing-boats lying on the flats under it at low tide be evidence. The inhabitants were spying at us from hiding-places about the wall, as we came before the place with our decks cleared for action. The next morning, (27th May), the alarm had spread; men were coming in from the neighborhood, and some 200 troops, or armed citizens, paraded under military mandarin, armed with sharpened wood lances, banners, &c. The mandarins are in the uniform described in Belcher's "Voyage of the Samarang" to Quelpart; peacock feathers in the hat, pink or scarlet cuffs turned back, tunic of gray, and mantle or cloak of dark blue. On the morning of our third day at Boisé, as we left there seemed little or no excitement. A few curious were peeping at the vessels from behind corners of houses in the village, and those who moved more to the front and into our view were warned back by the mandarins. The walls were without guns, so far as we could see; gongalls they may nevertheless have. A ferry crosses to the mainland from the above village, and a path runs from the ferry-landing toward Seoul.

By ferry is meant a single sampan, making, perhaps, a dozen trips a day. Island Boisé is quite exceptional in being wooded, and it is worth inquiry whether it may not be one of those wooded and sacred islets never disturbed but by robber-Chinese sailors. Toward the northwest of the above island, with the walled village, exist other villages and weirs for fishing. We saw several Korean two-masted vessels, of from ten to eighty tons burden; they avoided us. It is thought that, had launches gone within bow-shot of the sea-wall of the above village on Saturday morning, May 27, during the great excitement, of especially the military portion of the community, it is probable they would have run great risk of being fired into. The next day when, after taking ineffectual departure, we were driven back for shelter, we found them quiet. It is thought the eight-mile wall along the river-edge of Kang-hoa Island is probably similar to that about the above village. Also, that the surprised and excited, but soon pacified, conduct of the islanders points to no special influence or command from the court authorities in this instance, but is rather the carrying out of the traditional habit towards foreigners. It is therefore thought that we shall meet the same surprised conduct in natives till we eventually reach some place where special instructions have been, or shall have been, sent down from court for our either peaceable or hostile reception.

The Palos would appear to be indispensable as a base of supplies, &c., and for the launches which, from their complicated wants, need some reliable store on which to draw to meet emergencies almost hourly arising in their excursions; such as want of water, coal, kindling-wood, and repairs—the latter by no means unfrequently. With such a movable base, a boat force is almost as much at home before Séoul as at Boisée.

The temper of the village on the 27th forenoon may prove of value in showing that the meeting of both sides with arms in hand (as was the case in Japan when Commodore Perry sent the President's letter on shore) may pass off without accident, for their sudden pacification on the morning of the 28th shows it to have been a temporary excitement, very dangerous while it lasts, but better than a settled line of policy of "shoot whoever lands—cold blood or hot blood matters not," which we might have anticipated.

We enjoyed most favorable weather. The sun's heat was never oppressive. The nights were rather cool.

The country appears thus far poorer than North China. Only a small portion of the houses of a village are tiled. The yamén is far from creditable, from a Chinese point of view, and few buildings equal the yamén.

If a collision was the thing most immediately to be deprecated, launch-work, similar to the above, with orders not to land, would seem the safest measure to prevent it, for though the plying to and fro of the launches speedily creates excitement, yet, as they also soon show themselves peaceable, the excitement dies. The numerous trips of the launches, too, make each launch's total of impression upon the natives perhaps equal to that of a larger steamer. The demonstration of launches into the northeast of the Gulf de l'Imperatrice was not carried out—the weather being too rough to permit the launches to succeed in reaching the east of the bay. The land seems to break down in the direction of Séoul, as per French chart. Numerous vessels were reported in the northeast bight of the gulf, and it is thought their destination may have been the Jên Chuan of the map, where officials, perhaps slightly inferior to those of Kang-hoa, may be located.

As, in accordance with instructions, intercourse with the natives was rather avoided than sought, I was not called on for any services as interpreter, &c.

As the character of the fine force under Admiral Rodgers has and will come under your own observation, it is unnecessary for me to express my individual admiration of the faithful execution of duty which brought to completion the above reconnaissance and survey; one carried out with no small discomfort to the officers in the launches, and during the rough weather of the 28th at their no little personal risk.

Very respectfully, &c.,

JOHN P. COWLES, JR.

Translation of note in Chinese, undirected and unsigned, brought by four Koreans to the Colorado at Isle Boisée, from three officials, on the afternoon of the 30th May.

A day or two since, on the transmission of your honorable missive from Nan Yang Foo, the court for the first time recognized that your honorable ships are [the ones] sent from America to enter our humble confines. Thereupon the officers [who are the writers of this] were sent forward to ask particulars [of your mission.] Your vessels lie at anchor out in the sea, and as ours are not used to going to and fro in the stormy waves, we remain temporarily on the sea shore of Jên-Chûan Foo. We first make this announcement and await a few words in reply.

English version of note in Chinese handed to four Koreans in reply to a note brought by them to the Colorado at Isle Boisée, from three officials, on the afternoon of 30th May.

A note inquiring into the circumstances of the American ships coming into these waters has been received, and the purport communicated to the minister and the admiral.

His excellency the minister instructs me to send a reply, saying that the ships have come to bring a high envoy, who has important business with the government of this country; that he does not doubt that persons of high rank will in due time be appointed to confer with him, to whom it will be proper to make known his business; that he will remain on board the ship here for several days, to wait for any communication the government may make; but in the mean time the smaller vessels of the fleet will make explorations further on, in order that the large ships may move nearer the capital, in case the minister deems it necessary; that the common people need not be afraid of the ships harming them so long as the people on board are treated with civility and kindness; and the minister and admiral hope that such instructions will be given to the people, so that no trouble may occur.

ON BOARD FLAG-SHIP COLORADO,

Near Isle Boisée, Corea, June 2, 1871. (Received July 24.)

SIR: Our peaceful operations looking to the opening of negotiations with Corea, met with a sudden and unexpected but not unprepared-for check yesterday. As had been previously announced to some officials that came on board, the Monocacy, Palos, and four steam-launches started yesterday to explore the passage northward between the mainland and the island of Kanghoa. These officials were informed that our intentions were peaceable, and that no one would be harmed or disturbed unless we were attacked; but that if the vessels or their crews were molested in their peaceful operations, force would be met by force. The admiral placed the expedition under the immediate command of Captain Blake of the Alaska, and, with my assent and approval, instructed him to proceed cautiously, avoiding all menace, through the passage before referred to, taking careful soundings, and making such scientific observations as would enable a correct chart of the channel to be made. Captain Blake was further instructed, in case a hostile attack were made, either upon his men or vessels, to reply by force, and destroy, if possible, the places and the people from whom the attack came; that any advantage gained should not be pursued by landing a force; but that he should quietly proceed in the further prosecution of the work in view until he reached the northerly part of the island of Kanghoa, and, if found to be practicable, should go a few miles up the river Séoul, but not attempt to reach the capital. After doing this he was directed to return to the flag-ship and report the result of his proceedings.

The two letters of instructions with reference to communicating with the natives, which had been given him on a previous occasion, Captain Blake still retained for his guidance on the present expedition. I also sent Mr. John P. Cowles, jr., acting assistant secretary of legation, with him as interpreter.

The vessels of the expedition left the anchorage here at 12 o'clock m., and steamed slowly, sounding as they went, without meeting or seeing any signs of hostile resistance until they reached a sharp point in the river indicated on the map as Fort du Conde. This name was given to the point by the French admiral, when he visited the locality in 1866. When the two vessels and three of the launches came directly in range of the two batteries, situated opposite each other, one on either side of the river, the matting and brush which concealed the guns were suddenly thrown aside and a fire opened upon them. I inclose a report from Mr. Cowles, to which I beg to refer for full particulars of the engagement.

The vessels silenced the batteries and drove the enemy from their fortifications. An unfortunate accident to the Monocacy, caused by striking upon a rock, induced Captain Blake to return and report the result before proceeding further.

The Secretary of the Navy will receive a report in detail of the operations of the Navy, to which I am obliged to refer you, if further particulars are desired.

That the attack was unprovoked and wanton, and without the slightest shadow of excuse, must be as apparent to you as it is to me; for all our operations hitherto have been conducted with the greatest caution, in the hope that the assurances of our peaceful intentions, which were sent to the court from Peking, supplemented by similar protestations here, and coupled with an absence of all ostentatious show of war, would so fully persuade the government of our good faith that the result aimed at might be accomplished without the use or even the display of force.

The events of yesterday convince me that the government of Corea is determined to resist all innovations and intercourse with all the power at its command, without regard to nationality, or the nature of the demands made; and that all overtures will be treated alike, whether they look to the opening of the country and the residence and trade of foreigners, or whether they are confined, as I have endeavored, to securing humane treatment for our unfortunate countrymen who may be thrown by the perils of the sea upon these shores, whose safety and welfare depend, under present circumstances, upon the magnanimity of this semi-barbarous and hostile race.

The question now is, what is the safe and prudent course to pursue, in view of this temporary check, which the Coreans will undoubtedly construe into a defeat of the "barbarians," but which, according to the recognized rules of civilized warfare, was a complete victory on the part of the naval forces. In estimating the effect it may exert upon our power and prestige, which will affect the interests of our people in the East, the situation must be viewed from an oriental stand-point, rather than the more advanced one of Christian civilization. If the squadron retires now, the effect upon the minds of the Coreans, and, I fear, upon the Chinese also, will be injurious, if not disastrous, to our future prospects in both countries. Corea will rest firmly in the belief that she is powerful enough to repel any of the western states singly, or even all of them combined; and this opinion will be likely to react upon China, and strengthen the influence of those who insist that it is practicable to drive out by force all the foreign residents. In view of these considerations, I cannot advise the admiral to abandon the field without further attempts at redress for the wrongs and insults which our flag has suffered; at the same time I am fully impressed as to the inadequacy of the force at his command to carry on offensive operations to conquer this people and compel the government to enter into proper treaty engagements. The configuration of the coast, studded with islands; the shallowness of the rivers; the rise and fall of the tides, which vary from 20 to 40 feet; the rapidity of the currents in the rivers, and in passages between the islands and the mainland; the mountainous and broken character of the country bordering upon the coast and rivers; the distance of the capital and the other principal cities from the navigable waters, present obstacles which are not easy to be overcome without the presence of a considerable land and naval force acting in conjunction.

My own view is that a sufficient force should be sent back to the place where the vessels were attacked yesterday, to take and effectually destroy the fortifications above that place as far as the northerly end of the island of Kang-hoa. This the admiral expects to do, provided he finds his forces are able to do it without incurring too much risk. That would make a virtual, though not declared, blockade of the entrance of the river Seoul, which leads to the capital, which can be kept up until the northern channel is sounded, and will afford active and useful occupation for the vessels of the squadron until the further orders and instructions of the President can be received. It may possibly lead the Korean government to make terms. Of this, however, I am not sanguine.

It is quite impossible to foretell what course events in the future may compel me to pursue. In any case, I shall not lose sight of the main object the Government had in sending me here, and shall endeavor to comply with the spirit as well as the letter of my instructions in the most peaceful and conciliatory manner compatible with the dignity of the Government I represent, and the honor of its flag. I am not unmindful of the fact that the general policy of the Government is peace, and that hostile operations in a distant portion of the world are to be most carefully avoided. But when the representative of the Government, sent upon a peaceful mission in the interest of humanity, is met by uncalled for attack, as has been the case here, any hesitation on my part in sanctioning the seeking of redress for the wrongs and insults which we have suffered might properly be set down as shrinking from a responsibility which I have no right to do, with the vast interests intrusted to my care. The admiral will send a telegram to the Secretary of the Navy, and I shall send a short one referring you to the Navy Department for details.

I have, &c.,

UNITED STATES SHIP COLORADO,
Isle Boisé's Anchorage, Corea, June 2, 1871.

SIR: In accordance with your instructions, I yesterday joined Captain Blake upon the steamship Palos, to accompany a surveying expedition up the river Salée as an interpreter. You informed me that intercourse with the Coreans would be neither sought nor avoided; and that answer to civil inquiries about our purposes would be that yourself and Admiral Rodgers had already explained to officials from the court that it was our peaceful intention to survey the approaches to the Séoul River so soon as the delay yourself and the admiral offered to make, that they might assure the population along the margin of the river of our friendly character, had expired; that we should land only at uninhabited points, and that all nations offer facilities for such surveys of their coasts.

The party started at noon of the 1st instant, and consisted of the four steam-launches, under command of Lieutenant Commander Chester, Lieutenants Meade and Totten, and Master Schroeder; the Monocacy, Commander McCrea, and the Palos, wearing Commander Blake's divisional flag, as the officer in charge of the whole expedition, and under command of Lieutenant Commander Rockwell.

The launches led and indicated the channel to the gunboats following. Master Schroeder followed a mile behind, delayed by momentary accident.

Going northerly rapidly up the river, passing numerous forts to the left, on islands, and to the right on the mainland. At 2 p. m. we were passing around an elbow of land to the east of our generally northerly direction. As we were entering a whirl, as bad as that of Hell Gate, New York, full of eddies and ledges, and immediately under a fort on the end of the elbow above mentioned, masts and screens were suddenly alive with the discharge of eighty pieces of artillery directly into the launches which were under the forts. The launches, as fast as the whirl and eddies allowed, turned their howitzers to the fort, and threw in some eight rounds of shell. The gunboats, though in the midst of a perilous navigation, trained their guns on the fort, and the Monocacy's 8-inch shell frightened the men in the batteries so much that they fled precipitately, and, wrenching up their innumerable flags and standards, retreated to ravines and brush cover, further back on the neck of the peninsula. The banner of "Generalissimo," as it appeared to be, in the headquarters on the top of the hill, was left flying.

The launches and gunboats were swept rapidly past to above and to the rear of the batteries. There they anchored, and leisurely shelled the forts and ravines near.

The Benicia's launch, Master Schroeder, being delayed by accident, was later in reaching the forts. Instead of avoiding the almost certain fate which running the batteries threatened, he pressed through to join his comrades above the fort, firing as he passed. They came through without harm, though they were wet with the splash of the water about them. The Monocacy having struck a ledge, and leaking badly, the further pursuit of the survey had to be postponed, and the party returned to the fleet at Boisé Island. The few shells thrown into the forts as we returned elicited no reply. The scientific character of the expedition had prevented orders being given to cover such an emergency. The party were therefore forced to return without spiking the guns and bringing away the headquarters flag of the enemy, as all were eager to be permitted to do.

Some two hundred discharges of light and heavy guns must have been made in the ten minutes that the launches were beneath the forts, and how the launches escaped with only two wounded seems marvelous. The guns were noticed as we returned, and lay nearly as thick together as gun to gun, and gun behind gun on the floor of an ordnance store.

The pluck of all engaged, but especially of the launches, words can do no justice to. Admiral Rodgers's comment you must allow me as mine: "There is no lack of pluck in the American people."

I have the honor, &c.,

ON BOARD FLAG-SHIP COLORADO,
Off Boisé Island, Corea, June 15, 1871. (Received August 21)

SIR: On the evening of the 10th instant a Corean junk came alongside, and from the actions of those on board we concluded that they desired to communicate with the ship. The interpreter whom I sent to ascertain their business, reported that the people on the junk were Christians; that three Catholic priests were looked for on the coast, and hearing that a foreign fleet had arrived, they naturally expected the priests would have availed themselves of the opportunity to come. Their business was to ascertain whether any priests were on board our ships, and if so, to put the junk at their service, to convey them to any point they might choose. The coming of these people naturally excited my suspicion, but subsequent questioning fully satisfied me of their good faith. The zeal and religious enthusiasm which had induced them to run such risks to find their priests, impressed me profoundly with the power which the Romish church is able to exercise over an alien and ignorant people. These men evidently belong to the peasantry, as but few of them have any education. They were quite free to communicate any information they possessed, but owing to their ignorance and the difficulty of acquiring authentic information in such a country as this, their statements cannot be relied upon, except concerning facts that have come under their personal observation.

They represent that there is great discontent among the people generally, caused by the tyrannical conduct of the government and the exactions of the local authorities; that the will of the officials is the only law, and that summary executions is the universal penalty adjudged for its violation. They represent the number of Christians in the country prior to the persecutions of 1866 at 30,000, of whom 10,000 were sacrificed at the time the French priests were massacred; that not only the remaining 20,000 Christians, but a large minority, if not a majority, of the people beside, desire the overthrow of the present despotic and tyrannical government, and would join any movement foreign nations might make which would accomplish the result. As failure would involve the certain destruction of the natives who might join foreigners, it could not be expected that the standard of revolt would be raised until success could be reasonably assured. From them we gained considerable information in regard to the principal cities and their relative importance. The most important intelligence, however, was a connected and apparently truthful account of the destruction of the American schooner "General Sherman," in the Ping Yang River, in 1866. (See Dip. Corresp. 1867, Part 1, pp. 426, 427, 428.) One of the Christians affirms that he resided near the scene of the disaster, and was perfectly familiar with the whole proceeding. His story appears so reasonable when tested by the other information I have been able to gather concerning this people and their acts, that I feel bound to say that in my opinion it is substantially true. He says the people on board the schooner were enticed on shore by fair promises of civil treatment and trade, were entertained and treated to drugged spirit, during which they were fallen upon suddenly, seized and bound and all massacred. Some were beheaded, and the others were beaten to death with clubs. The cargo was taken out, and the vessel burned to get the iron used in her construction. They further say that the cannon found on board were taken out and sent to the capital, from which patterns were made and guns manufactured. This story was told in a plain straightforward manner without undue questioning. On the contrary, the interpreter endeavored to obtain a voluntary statement of the "General Sherman" affair, in order to test the good faith and truthfulness of these people. It corresponds so nearly with the account given by the French priests at the time, that I consider it more entitled to credence than the report of the officials made to the commander of the "Shenandoah" or that to the board of rites, Peking. It is unreasonable to suppose that the persons on board the schooner, the owner of which was largely interested in the cargo, would inaugurate hostile proceedings to force the natives to open trade; it is to be presumed rather that, as they were bent on trade and gain, they would endeavor by conciliation to induce the people to purchase the cargo. To be sure, the attempt to open commercial relations with this people had not the previous sanction of treaty right, or the permission of the government of Corea in any way, the entrance of the vessel into Corean waters being in violation of the laws and policy of the country. And while this is the fact, it affords no justification for the action of the government or people in the destruction of the vessel and cargo, and still less for the massacre of the people on board. The statements of the officials which have been reiterated so often and with such persistency are scarcely worthy of credence, and should be received with great caution. Were they honest in the belief that their action can be justified, or the truth of their statements substantiated, why did they oppose so persistently and prevent the "Shenandoah" and "Wachusett" from going to the spot where the vessel was wrecked, and making inquiry of the people who witnessed the whole affair, and thus satisfy the Government of the United States of the real facts? And why are the officials of all grades so profuse in their protestations to me of the primary offense of the people on board the schooner, and so anxious lest I should desire to make further inquiries into the facts? The Government, in its communications to the board of rites, Peking, you will observe, takes great pains to throw the whole responsibility for the disaster upon the foreigners, and insists that its statements shall be received and accepted without question by that of the United States. In view of all the evidence, direct and circumstantial, which I have been able to gather, the conviction is forced upon me that the statements of the Corean government in regard to the "General Sherman" case are unreliable and unworthy of belief, and that if the exact facts could be known, it would be found that the vessel was plundered and then burned, and the men on board wantonly and treacherously massacred.

It remains for the Government of the United States to say whether further efforts shall be made to ascertain the facts, and, if the government of Corea is found to be culpable, to demand and enforce means of redress, or whether the statements of this semi-barbarous and hostile people shall be received without question in justification of their acts of robbery and murder, committed upon the property and people of the United States.

No. 74.]

ON BOARD FLAG-SHIP COLORADO,

Near Boisé Island, Corea, June 20, 1871. (Received August 21.)

SIR: My dispatches Nos. 70 and 71 informed you of all that had occurred up to the 2d instant, including the hostile reception the smaller vessels met with while absent on a surveying expedition. In addition, the latter contained my opinions with reference to what should be done immediately, without waiting further instructions, to prevent danger to the lives and property of our people in China as well as Corea. A careful review of the situation in consultation with the admiral, confirmed me in the opinions I had formed; and also that the dignity of the Government of the United States would be seriously compromised unless reparation be sought, and enforced if necessary, for the unprovoked assault upon the vessels. It also seemed reasonable that a demonstration such as was contemplated would, if successful, convince the Government that we would not tamely submit to insult and injury, and so impress it with a sense of our ability to redress wrongs as to cause it to be more careful in the future. Nor did it seem likely that such a step would by any possibility lessen the chances of negotiation, and it might improve them, for evidences were multiplying that all our overtures made in a conciliatory spirit would be peremptorily rejected. Although fully impressed with this belief, and skeptical in regard to any favorable results coming through delay, I still deemed it my duty to discourage hasty action, and advised delay in seeking forcible redress and retaliation until the Government should have had time to learn the facts and disavow its responsibility for the outrage, if the course of the military authorities was unauthorized. In this view the admiral fully concurred; and besides, our success would be rendered more certain by a delay of ten days, as the state of the tides would then be more favorable, which would insure greater safety to the vessels and more efficiency to their co-operation. It was also decided to confine the movement to the capture and destruction of the forts that had participated in the attack upon our vessels, and not go beyond that point, although abundant precedent could be found to justify the infliction of the most extreme punishment and damage upon this government and people, after unprovoked hostilities had once been inaugurated by them in such a treacherous manner. I was the more inclined to confine our hostile efforts within these limits, because I doubted whether the President contemplated the use of force further than the redress of wrongs and insults, and because the capture and destruction of these defensive works would be likely to produce the same effect upon the government as any more extensive operations which did not include the occupation of the capital.

The correspondence with the local officials, copies and translations of which are herewith inclosed, will show the earnest and persistent efforts that were made to adjust the difficulty amicably, and the stubborn reticence of the government touching this particular affair, as well as all matters connected with my mission.

I deem it proper to observe, in this connection, that the history of negotiations and intercourse between western nations and oriental governments goes to prove that every artifice which human ingenuity can devise will be resorted to to maintain their own superiority, and prove to their people the absolute inferiority of foreigners. Refusal to negotiate is usually the first step, and when compelled by force or otherwise to recede from that position, every effort is made to induce foreign ministers to treat with native officials of low rank and position. In illustration of this peculiarity, I beg to call your attention to the communication from the King of Corea to the board of rites, Peking, (inclosure 5.) You will observe that a reply to my letter is evaded rather than refused. The King affirms, however, that "a minister of the Emperor must not have relations with a foreign state," and prays "that the Emperor (of China) will send forth a special edict to exhort and instruct" me in my duties.

My own observation and experience, as well as the experience of others, convinced me that concession on these points would lower my position, lessen my influence, and thus render the task more difficult; I therefore determined to adopt a firm and dignified policy—to demand as a right, and not solicit as a favor, those acts of courtesy due from one nation to another; to submit to no semblance of inferiority by consenting to consult or correspond with officials of inferior rank that might, and probably would, be put forward to meet me; to seek such guarantees as would render reasonably safe the lives and property of American citizens that might be wrecked upon these shores as a right which the United States could properly claim for its citizens and not as a concession which Corea could grant or refuse with equal propriety. This course I have steadily pursued; and when officials of low rank came in person or wrote letters the secretaries were deputed to meet them and reply to their communications. This will explain why it is that the correspondence with the local officials has been conducted in the name of Mr. Drew.

The local official near here and his superior, the governor of Kang-Hoa, were informed that a disavowal of responsibility for the outrage was expected from the government, and that, to enable this to be done, a reasonable time would be allowed; and it was clearly intimated that the failure of the government to comply with this reasonable demand would leave the admiral at liberty to pursue such a course as he might deem proper to obtain redress. (See inclosures 2 and 6.) The replies of these officials (inclosures 3 and 4) contain, you will observe, nothing that can be construed into an apology. They simply express regret at the necessity, but approve of the acts of the military authorities. Indeed I feel sure that the governor of Kang Hoa has military as well as civil jurisdiction, and is really the person who planned the attack and issued the orders to fire upon the vessels. So great was the anxiety of the admiral as well as myself to avoid, if possible, further hostilities, that orders were given to Captain Blake and Mr. Drew (inclosures 7 and 8) to cause hostilities to be suspended whenever they could obtain any reasonable assurance that peaceful negotiations would be assented to by the government. They did receive, while on the way up to the forts and before the attack was made, a communication from the Kang-Hoa magistrate, (inclosure 9) but as it contained only a repetition of his former statement they very properly paid no attention to it.

The expedition started on the 10th and returned on the 12th instant. The work it was sent to do was successfully and fully accomplished. Five forts were taken, which, with the munitions of war found in them, were completely destroyed. About two hundred and fifty of the enemy's dead were counted lying on the field, fifty flags and several prisoners were captured and brought away; among the latter were some wounded. Several books, manuscripts, orders, &c., were found. The contents of these documents are interesting, and enable a better and more reliable estimate to be made respecting the attitude and action of the government than was possible from our previous sources of information.

It was deemed advisable to bring away but few prisoners, only a number sufficient to demonstrate that we do not treat prisoners that fall into our hands cruelly, and that wounded men, although enemies, are humanely and tenderly cared for. Our loss was three killed and nine wounded. For full particulars of the engagement I beg to refer you to the Navy Department, where complete reports of the admiral will be found.

All accounts concur in the statement that the Coreans fought with desperation, rarely equaled and never excelled by any people. Nearly all the soldiers in the main fort were killed at their posts. They exhibited a bravado and recklessness that it is hard to account for upon any other hypothesis than that finding there was no chance for escape, and believing that no quarter would be shown by us to prisoners, they concluded to perish fighting, even after all hope of success was gone; either this, or that their government had threatened the soldiers defending that particular fort with dire retribution in case of defeat. Some such reasons must have existed, because there were outside of the fort, but in the immediate vicinity, several thousand troops which were kept at bay by the field artillery with small effort. Instead of recklessly rushing on to destruction, these troops showed little inclination to come within the range of the weapons of our troops. A proposition was made to release the prisoners on parole, (inclosure 10,) to which a reply was returned (inclosure 11) saying that the prisoners had incurred a severe penalty from their own government by surrender, and it was immaterial whether they were released or not. After a detention of a few days they were all unconditionally released. It is to be hoped that our humane treatment and release of these prisoners may disabuse the minds of the common people of their unjust suspicions regarding foreigners, and induce the government to spare the lives of those who may by misfortune or reverses in war fall into their hands.

The officers and men engaged in the expedition all behaved nobly. Their gallantry and heroism were conspicuous, reflecting upon themselves great credit, and upon the Navy and the Government represented by it honor and renown. I should be doing less than my duty were I to omit to add my testimony to these acts of devotion, or to acknowledge my obligations for the cheerful co-operation of Admiral Rodgers, and the zealous and efficient support of the officers of the fleet in all things where the honor or interests of the United States are involved.

On the 15th instant, I addressed a dispatch to the King, (inclosure 15,) and caused it to be sent to the prefect of Foo-Ping-Foo with a request that it should be sent to the capital. It was returned on the 17th instant with a note from the prefect (inclosure 16) saying that he dare not forward a dispatch to his sovereign. To this I caused a reply to be sent (inclosure 17) requesting him either to send the dispatch or inform the court that I desired to communicate with His Majesty or a high minister. This met with the same refusal as the former one had, (see inclosure 18.)

The first opportunity that offers will be availed of to open communication with the government, if it can be done without discredit, nor will my efforts to accomplish what the Government desires be relaxed until all reasonable and honorable means are exhausted, and I am convinced that further delay will serve no useful purpose. I have, however, little hope of bringing the King to any proper terms. Everything goes to prove that the government from the first determined to reject all peaceful overtures for negotiation or even discussion; and that the recent demonstration, which would have produced a profound impression upon any other government, has little or no effect, favorable or otherwise, upon this. The operations of the 10th and 11th were more significant than those of the English and French in 1858, when the capture of the Taku forts at the mouth of the Peiho River, caused the government of China to immediately send ministers and conclude treaties at Tientsin, and yet this government shows no sign which leads to the belief that there is any change in its attitude of defiance to all other nations.

I have the honor, &c.,

Translation of paper found attached to a pole on Guerriere Island, June 3, 1871, and brought on board the Colorado.

In the fourth month of the year, Mow-chew, [1868,] Captain Febiger, captain of your honorable country's admiral's vessel, came and anchored in the Barrier Cantonment of the marine guard of Jaw-Ho prefecture, Ping-Yang province. I was at that time the prefect. The communications between us offered no cause of offense, the one to the other, and the captain went away peacefully.

Now, again, your honorable country's vessels come and anchor within the borders of the prefecture of Foo-Ping, and truly in a different manner. I avail myself of this communication. Do not hold back your valued reply.

Our kingdom is placed east of the Eastern Sea. Your honored country is located west of the Western Ocean. All winds and sands for the extent of more than 70,000 li. (23,000 miles.) How can there ever have been vessels coming and going between us? From Tan-Chi [early Korean king] down these 4,000 years there has been no communication between your country and ours. It may then well be said that it is Heaven's limitation that has placed us so remote from each other, and earth that has hung us so far apart as to cut us off from each other.

Our respective dispositions are mutually dissimilar; our guiding principles are not alike.

We find that in the autumn of the year Ping-Yin [1866] there suddenly arose a troublesome involvement [of us] in a matter of mutual concern. The destruction in the Ping-Yang river [of the General Sherman] was brought swiftly on by themselves; and for the wreck in the Kang-Hoa prefecture, who is to be blamed?

There was formerly not a particle of ill-feeling existing between us. Why should arms now drag us into mutual resentment? Yet, unless destruction leave [you] to repentance, you will again be taking upon you to constantly return toward us. What affairs would you transact? What words speak? Will you wish to take possession of our land and people, or will you wish to consult upon and carry out friendly relations? If you are going to want us to give away land and people, then let me ask how can 3,000 li [1,000 miles] of river, hill, city, and country be lightly thrown away? If you will desire us to agree to negotiate and carry out friendly relations, then let me ask how can 4,000 years' ceremonies, music, literature, and all things, be, without sufficient reason, broken up and cast away? It does not consist with right, it cannot be spoken of.

You do not hold the course of justice, [lit., as the bear keeps to his native hill, and the fish keeps his native water,] but, on the contrary, dare to consult mere expediency. [lit., act as the heron with the shell-fish.] Having experienced every difficulty and danger in tossing over billowy seas [to our country,] how long, let me ask, can you annoy [lit., ravage] district and prefecture?

It would be better early to mark out a right course of action and each remain peacefully in his own place.

We inform you, that you may ponder and be enlightened.

From the general guardian of Foo-Ping prefecture. [No name signed.]

Reply to a communication found on Guerriere Island, on Saturday morning, June 3.

A reply from Edward B. Drew, acting secretary of legation of the United States.

A communication was found on shore two days since, purporting to come from the guardian general of Foo-Ping prefecture, which has been read, and the contents thereof made known to the minister and admiral.

They have instructed me to make reply, that our intentions in coming to your country were peaceful, as was announced to your sovereign by letter from Peking in advance. He was told that the minister had important business with the government, and hoped that a person of high rank would be sent to meet him when the vessels reached the coast of your country, to whom the full particulars could be made known, and with whom all matters could be arranged and settled. This course is still open if the King chooses to avail himself of it.

We do not want your land or men, nor anything that will affect your ceremonies, music, or literature.

Your people have met our peaceful overtures by an unprovoked and wanton attack. The admiral hopes that it will prove that all this was done by the common people, without the sanction of the government; and has concluded to allow sufficient time to pass to enable the King to learn of it, and send an apology for this outrage if it was unauthorized, before taking any further steps. It now lies with your government to say whether it will disavow this outrage, and send a high officer to meet and consult with the minister, and endeavor to settle the business in an amicable manner, or whether, by failing to do so, leave the minister and admiral to pursue such a course as they may deem proper to obtain redress for the wrongs done to us. It is a question which His Majesty should seriously consider before taking up a warlike attitude. Five or six days longer will be allowed the government to consult and determine what it will do.

When Captain Febiger was here, he was told that the King could not treat with him because he did not come by order of the President. Now the high minister of the United States to China is sent by special orders of his sovereign, with the most peaceful intentions and friendly assurances, and without warning you fire upon the vessels and try to destroy them. How is this? The vessels now here are part of a large fleet that is constantly kept by the Government on the coasts of China and Japan. When they need repairs, others are sent to take their places. They are constantly within two or three days' sail of your country, and if they choose, can destroy your towns and annoy your districts and departments for an unlimited number of years. But this is not our wish. We desire peace and friendly feelings to exist between our country and all others. China and the United States are friends, and the high ministers of each country are received in the other and treated with respect. If anything occurs which may lead to trouble, it is discussed and settled in a friendly manner, without resorting to hostilities.

If the government sends any notifications of its intentions, the communication should be sent to the ship. No boats or messengers will be molested that bring letters or persons who desire to discuss matters with us.

A necessary communication.

Li. Guardian General of Fu-Ping Fu to Mr. Drew, June 7th.

A communication in reply. On receipt of your dispatch in answer to my former one, I read its contents carefully.

I have control of local matters only, and dare not take on myself to discuss any matters belonging to the central government; I have accordingly transmitted your reply to my superior officer, the minister, who is general and governor of Kang-Hoa prefecture; and have to-day heard that a dispatch from him has just been sent on board your honorable vessel.

I trust that all future correspondence will be carried on with the official above named, as I cannot presume to interfere in it further.

A necessary communication in reply to Mr. Drew, acting secretary of legation.

No. 4.

Translation of dispatch brought on board Colorado from Kang-Hoa high official.

Cheng, guardian of the prefecture of Kang-Hoa, Corea, ex officio general and governor, sends a communication to his excellency the American minister.

In the spring of this year the board of rites, Peking, forwarded a dispatch conveying a letter from the honorable American envoy; to this my government speedily sent a reply, fully discussing the matters referred to, which it was requested might be transmitted through the same channel [board of rites] to your excellency.

We feel that—inasmuch as politeness and deference are held in such general estimation in your honorable country that she has long possessed a fame far beyond all other states—your excellency must most probably so clearly comprehend the propriety of things as to take no light or hasty action. Why now do you cross from afar the vast ocean to penetrate another country? Even though you disclaim all purpose of killing or harming us, who can help being puzzled and suspicious?

The barriers of defense of a country are important places, within which it is not allowable for foreign vessels to make their way [without some previous understanding.] This is the fixed rule of all nations. Hence it was the ascent [of the river] to the sea-gate by your vessels the other day that brought on the engagement between us. [literally, the affair of mutual firing and alarming,] which, as you say that your intentions in coming [to this country] are good, it is much to be regretted should have occurred. On the arrival of your vessels, the court warned the civil and military authorities along the coast to avoid most carefully anything which should cause trouble or arouse ill-feeling, yet when your honorable vessels, not considering the fixed regulation of another country, penetrated its important pass, how could the officers, appointed to guard [the closed portals of] the frontier, whose duty it is to take measures of defense, calmly let it go by as of no consequence? Pray do not then be offended at what occurred.

It is not perhaps because the board of rites at Peking had not yet transmitted our reply, [to your letter to the King of Corea,] thus leaving your excellency unacquainted with the various circumstances of my country, that [your coming to Corea] has taken place. Therefore, I now have the honor to inclose duplicate of this reply, from the perusal of which you may perhaps derive full and complete information. The non-intercourse of Corea with foreign states is a settled principle, established by our ancestors five centuries ago; a principle of which the whole world has heard, and of which the Emperor of China also is graciously aware. It is precisely because we must not break through the ancient policy [of our ancestors] that we cannot discuss and cannot settle that which the honorable envoy desires to discuss and to settle, whatever it may be. Why do you then wait for a high official to meet you?

The myriad lands and the countless living sustained on the earth, and canopied by the sky, should all act in consonance with the nature originally bestowed upon them, and it is the will of Heaven and earth that the states of the East, and the nations of the West, regulating each in its own way its administration and its doctrines, and governing each its own people, should move on prosperously and concordantly without encroaching upon and taking away what is another's. Surely your excellency is acquainted with this truth.

Appreciating the hardships of a voyage of 10,000 li of wind and wave, I send some worthless articles as a trifling assistance to your table, as becomes the host. I trust you will not refuse to receive them, though insignificant. I am aware of the deficiencies of this dispatch.

A necessary communication.

Translation of duplicate of the King of Corea's dispatch to the board of rites, Peking, in reference to his excellency Mr. Low's letter, of 7th March, sent to the King through the board.

A communication in reply. On the 10th April I received the honorable board's dispatch forwarding copy of the record of its bureau of foreign relations to this effect: "This board on the 22d March memorialized the Emperor in reference to the transmission of a letter to Corea, and on the same day the great council returned a minute stating that it had reverently received the imperial will. We have taken due note. This minute being received by the board, its duty is to send copies of its original memorial, the imperial edict, the Tsury-li Yamen's original memorial, and the American letter to the King of Corea for his cognizance in the premises," and accordingly inclosing copies of the Tsury-li Yamen's memorial, the board's memorial, and the American envoy's letter.

Besides acknowledging receipt of the board's dispatch, with its several inclosures, I would humbly observe that the service of forwarding the letter is indeed out of the usual course. I ascribe it to the board's anxiety that no mistake should be made in a matter of such delicate concern. The board has performed this special act in respectful intimation of the Emperor's fostering favor toward me; and for such perfect attentiveness I am inexpressibly grateful.

The letter forwarded by the admiral's envoy has reference primarily to two merchant vessels which came to this country in 1866, one of which was wrecked and her crew saved, while the crew of the other was killed, and the cargo destroyed; the American Government not knowing why such very different treatment as this was exhibited, wishes to inquire into the circumstances. Furthermore, it desires that some arrangement be devised for the relief of any American merchant vessel which may in future meet with disaster on this coast, and that friendly treatment should be accorded, &c.

Our humble country has the sea on three sides, and whenever stranger vessels of a foreign nation come to our shores in distress, they are either assisted with food and whatever they require, and enabled to sail away again; or, if the vessel is disabled or lost, her crew are escorted through by land to the supreme capital, [Peking,] thence to be sent to their homes; in each case the wishes of those concerned are regarded, and no obstacle is raised. In this we do not fail reverently to give effect to the exceeding benevolence and plenteous virtue of our holy dynasty, [the present dynasty of China,] which desires all things without exception, under heaven and upon the earth, to follow out their original nature, and the outpost state [Corea] has held this custom as to vessels in distress as its firm rule and established policy for a long period. Moreover, there have been from first to last three occasions of American subjects particularly having been rescued in distress, and sent forward under protection, viz, in the 5th year of Heen Feng, the 4th of Tung-Chih, and the 5th of Tung-Chih, [1855, 1865, and 1866.] The dispatches are all in the archives of the honorable board, and as the affairs were comparatively recent, the country in question can hardly fail to have a knowledge of them. When men have come from afar through the dangers of the sea, they are objects of sympathy; how then could any one think it right to maltreat and destroy them?

The statement about a vessel being destroyed, and her crew killed in Corea, has reference, no doubt, to the event of the autumn of 1866, in the Ping-Yang River, [General Sherman.] The details of that affair were all set forth in the dispatch to the board of the 22d day, 8th moon, 5th year Tung-Chih, [September 30, 1866,] and need not now be reiterated. Again, on the 25th day 3d moon, 7th year of Tung-Chih, I wrote in reply to a dispatch from the board of rites still more explicitly, and inclosed copy of the answer of Poo Cheng-hway, intendant of Hwang-Hai province, to the American commander, [of the Wachusett,] which answer had been prepared and held in readiness for delivery; on this occasion the board was further prayed that the American envoy might be so admonished [by the Emperor of China] as to resolve his doubts and suspicions and prevent further confusion.*

Again, in the 3d moon of the 7th year of Tung-Chih, the American Commander Febiger came, saying that he wished to inquire into this affair, and presented dispatches to the different local magistrates of Ping-An and Hwang-Hai. These magistrates answered very clearly, giving the circumstances of a strange vessel having pushed her way in the autumn of 1866, of wounds and injuries inflicted on the inhabitants, of the detention with indignity of an officer, and of the consequent exasperation of the people, resulting in self-provoked disaster and destruction; they made a complete explanation to dispel all doubts, and Captain Febiger, on receiving the reply, went away. I ventured to think that thenceforth the people of that country, knowing fully the affair, and understanding the right and wrong of it, there would be no more occasion for coming with doubts and suspicions to make inquiry. Why now does the American minister, in his letter, again express ignorance as to the rescue of one of the crews, and the destruction of the other?

He says that the Government of the United States has so much regard for its sailors and countrymen that it will never permit other countries, as they please, to misuse or destroy them; this, surely, is a point in which all nations are alike. America will not allow its people to be maltreated; nor will this country allow its people to be maltreated. In this respect, if we exchange places and reflect, there is surely no difference. Such being the case, the reason for the self-provoked destruction of the vessel in the Ping-Yang River is perfectly intelligible without stopping to discuss it. We appeal to the natural public sentiment of justice among men, and to the controlling presence of God and the spirits. If the American vessel had not abused our people how could the Corean officials and people have wished to maltreat them first?

The letter under consideration expresses the hope that friendly treatment will be accorded. If the strange states of the extreme sea desire a relationship of good will with us, then, in reverent imitation of the virtue of the great dynasty which treats kindly men from afar, we shall prove not to be ignorant of the usages of hospitality. But as to the expression, "consult and arrange about intercourse," I do not know what it is wanted to "consult and arrange," and what the intercourse desired is to be about. "A minister of the Emperor must not have relations with a foreign state."

For kindly commiserating and sending home the crews of foreign ships which have met with disaster, not only has our country a constant rule of its own, but it also imitates, in this regard, the profound benevolence of the heavenly dynasty [of China;] then, without waiting to "consult and arrange," the minister may feel secure from all apprehension. But supposing he does not cherish good will, but comes to commit wanton violence, then in keeping them off or destroying, them we shall also be discharging our natural duty of shielding the heavenly dynasty. It is quite enough for the American Government to hold in control its own people, and keep them from improper interference with others; why go so far as to discuss whether there shall be intercourse with foreign states or not?

Heretofore foreign nations have been in ignorance of the character and productions of this country, and we have been repeatedly pestered with applications for commercial intercourse; but that is entirely out of the question with this country, and that merchants would not find it profitable was set forth in a communication to the board in the fifth year of Tung-Chih, somewhat as follows: It is universally known that our humble state is a small dependency in a corner of the seas; that the people are poor and the articles of commerce scanty; that the precious metals and precious stones are not found here, while grains and cloth fabrics are not abundant; that the productions of the country are insufficient to meet domestic wants; and if they were permitted to flow out abroad, thus impoverishing us at home, this insignificant land would certainly be in extreme danger, and difficult to protect from ruin; furthermore, that the habits of the people are sparing and plain, the workmanship rude and poor; and that we have not a single article worthy of commerce with foreign nations. The constant wish for commercial intercourse, while the utter impossibility of this country's entering into relations of trade, and the unprofitableness of it also to foreign merchants, are such as are above described, is no doubt to be ascribed to the want of full knowledge on the part of the people of remote countries on the subject.

Now, although this letter of the American envoy has not spoken out fully, yet as it asks for an official to consult and arrange [business] affecting both countries, it most likely alludes to this sort of thing, [viz, commercial intercourse.] As the rescue and forwarding home of shipwrecked crews is provided for by existing laws, it is unnecessary to take further trouble to make a fixed arrangement. Besides this subject, there is nothing else to consult and settle, and it is not necessary to come and go to and fro to no purpose.

I humbly hope that the honorable board will lay before the throne all the facts connected with this matter, and that the Emperor will send forth a special edict to exhort and instruct the envoy of the nation in question so as to overcome the doubts and dispel his anxiety, and thus each of us be left to himself without trouble. I shall then be inexpressibly happy. In my insignificance, relying on the Emperor's love and affection, I have emptied my whole heart in extreme fear and reverence.

The contents of the letter of the American envoy do not indicate that a reply is expected; nor should I. The ruler of a colonial state dare not commit such a breach as to trouble the honorable board to forward a reply.

I solicit your intelligent glance and your indulgence.

Edward B. Drew to guardian of Kang-Hoa and ex officio general and governor, June 7, 1871.

The undersigned has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter addressed to his excellency the minister, inclosing a copy of one from the government to the board of rites, Peking. The contents thereof have been made known to the minister and admiral; and I am instructed to reply that they regret to see a disposition on the part of the government to decline all friendly discussion of the business which his excellency is sent to transact; and instead of apologizing for the unprovoked attack upon our vessels, the course of the military authorities is justified.

The admiral hoped it would prove that the attack was unauthorized, and that when the news of it came to the King he would disavow it, and send a high official to consult with the minister.

The admiral concluded to allow sufficient time to elapse for this to be done before taking any further steps. Three or four days of the time allowed still remain, and if, at the expiration, no disposition is manifested on the part of His Majesty looking to peaceful consultation and arrangement, the admiral and minister will then feel at liberty to pursue such a course as they may deem proper. In consequence of the shortness of the time now remaining for you to come to a decision, I deem it better to send this short reply rather than wait to make a full answer to your note.

The minister and admiral direct me to say that while they highly appreciate the kindly disposition manifested in sending the presents, they cannot, under existing circumstances, be accepted, and are therefore respectfully declined.

Admiral Rodgers to Commander H. P. Blake.

U. S. S. COLORADO, ISLE BOISÉE ANCHORAGE,
Corea, June 9, 1871.

SIR: The attack to be made upon the Corean forts on the Salée River, which recently treacherously fired on our surveying party, is committed to you.

The attacking force will consist of the "Monocacy," "Palos," the four armed steam-launches, and the armed launches and boats of the fleet; the latter conveying the landing force detailed from the ships, under the immediate command of Commander L. A. Kimberly.

The vessels are to approach the point selected for anchorage, shelling the forts and drawing out the soldiers occupying them, before the boats are permitted to leave the ships to make the landing.

When the enemy shall have been driven out of their works, the force under Commander Kimberly will effect a landing, the armed launches supporting and covering the debarkation. The most serious difficulties which I apprehend lie in the natural obstacles of rocks, shoal water, and furious currents; and if it should be found impossible to hold the vessels in the position necessary to secure the boats and to cover the force on shore, you will embark the landing party at your discretion.

The object sought in this expedition being simply to take and destroy the forts which have fired on our vessels, and to hold them long enough to demonstrate our ability to punish such offenses at pleasure, it is my present purpose to withdraw the whole force after a period of about twenty-two hours has elapsed, or at the last of the flood-tide of the day following the capture.

Should you decide that the position gained may be held indefinitely long, or that there is a prospect of any material advantage in doing so, you will then, by steam launch, communicate with me.

The only object sought by the expedition to this country is to make such a treaty as the minister has been instructed by the Government to secure, if he may; and you will therefore take advantage of any overtures which may be made toward peace, if they shall seem to you to offer a reasonable opportunity of attaining the ends which the Government has in view, or to afford a cover for the withdrawal of your force should that be desirable; referring, of course, the matter of terms to be granted to the minister and myself.

All that I have here written has been amply discussed; but should incidents arise giving an unexpected complexion to the aspect of affairs, you must use your discretion.

Anything you shall decide upon will, I am sure, meet deserved approval.

Wishing you and your command success and a safe return,

I am, &c.,

JOHN RODGERS.

F. F. Low to Edward B. Drew.

SIR: It is the intention of the admiral to send an expedition to-morrow to Fort du Conde to take and destroy it, if possible. The whole will be under the immediate command of Homer C. Blake, esquire, U. S. N., who will be furnished with full and explicit instructions by the admiral. I desire you to accompany Captain Blake on the "Palos" to facilitate communicating with the native officials, if opportunity offers.

As the object of my visit to Corea is to open negotiations with a view to making a treaty, this fact should be kept prominently in view; and the admiral has so instructed Captain Blake. The naval forces are simply a means to an end. If, therefore, at any time during the absence of the expedition, overtures should be made by which it would appear that there is a reasonable prospect of a minister being sent to confer and consult with me, and that further offensive operations would be likely to embarrass friendly negotiations, it is my desire that all hostile action should cease as soon as it can be done with safety and honor. The decision touching this latter point will rest with Captain Blake, guided by his instructions; but you are at liberty to make known my views to him if you deem it advisable.

I am, &c.,

FREDERICK F. LOW.

Translation of dispatch brought by a junk and intercepted by the expedition to Fort du Conde, on the 10th June.

Cheng, guardian of Kang-Hoa-fu, Corea, ex-officio general and governor, makes a reply to his excellency the American minister.

I beg to observe that your honorable dispatch contains many things I had not anticipated. I am still [as when writing you before] perplexed and pained. As your excellency said you were coming on a peaceful and friendly errand, our court proposing to treat you in a befitting manner, before [receiving from you information of your arrival,] sent officials of the third rank to inquire whether your voyage had been prosperous, and further to ask what the business was which you wanted to discuss and arrange.

This was the course of politeness, but contrary to expectation your subordinate officials said that those persons were not of high rank, denied them an interview, [with your excellency,] and sent them back. Before the officials who had been sent to inquire of the fatigues of your voyage got back to the capital, your honorable vessels suddenly entered our narrow pass [from the sea.] Although you had said that you would inflict no injury, yet, as the vessels on board which you came [up the river] were vessels of war, and were full of implements of war, our people and soldiers could not but be filled with alarm and suspicion, and knew not what to make of it. Now, I apprehend that the way of concord and the rule of propriety in entering another country do not justify this. As this place has before been the scene of battle, it is always strictly guarded. Although I deeply regret the firing affair—induced by the sudden sight of an unusual thing—and the alarming of your people, still, to defend a pass leading into your territory is what you would do were the case your own.

Your blaming us recently—as is shown by the [demand for an] apology is truly incomprehensible. Your excellency's insistence upon meeting a high official with whom to consult and settle matters, I presume from your letter of last spring, had reference solely to the affairs of the two merchant vessels in the year 1866. Of these, one was destroyed, while the crew of the other was rescued; and you wished to get at the reason for this difference of treatment, and to make provision for future cases of disaster to American vessels on our coast. That one of the vessels [alluded to] was a trader of your country was not known to us; and the violent and lawless Tsuy-Lan-heen, who came in her, himself brought on the destruction that occurred—it was not our people who maliciously commenced it. The dispatches that have passed first and last to clear up your suspicions [in this case] have not been few, and it is not now worth while to discuss it further.

As to rescuing American vessels in distress, our country already has a regulation on this point, and there is, therefore, no necessity for going further and laying it down after consultation.

Again, as our country and yours are separated several myriad li, as if our borders were under a different heaven, we do not interfere with each other's tranquillity; then without waiting to lay it down in a definitive *compact peace exists already in the very fact [of our distance and non-interference.]

To go into a lengthy discussion and debate for more or less, while friendship is what is wished for, will only lead to trouble. With these considerations your excellency can clearly decide which course would be advantageous and which the reverse. Instead of taking such steps as you please, you should rather reflect and consider well what I have said.

Why should you have been so narrow as to decline the trifling presents offered? I cannot sustain my regrets at this.

Mr. Drew to Cheng, guardian of Kang-Hoa prefecture, ex-officio general and governor.

The soldiers and officers of your honorable country who were taken prisoners by us in the fight of the 11th instant, are now held on board our ships, where they are being supplied with food and taken care of. If your excellency desires their return, they will be released on requisition by you, accompanied by a distinct undertaking that they shall not fight against us again.

A necessary communication.

Translation of a dispatch received 15th June, 1871, on Guerriere Island, by hand of two messengers from the magistrate of Fu-Ping prefecture.

Li, guardian general of Fu-Ping prefecture, Corea, makes a communication in reply. I have received and read the dispatch handed upon the sea-shore, viz, that which was to be forwarded to his excellency the authority of Kang-Hoa. Your honorable ships, coming with professions of friendliness and amity, delayed our military plans and caused us consequent loss. His excellency the magistrate of Kang-Hoa, has already incurred our court's severe reprimand. He already is under punishment, but is retained at his post. He is calling out and selecting soldiers and braves, and is steadily preparing picked and keen (men and material) with the purpose of satisfying in the fullest degree his anger; I therefore do not dare to forward your communication for his perusal. The question as to whether or no our soldiers taken prisoners shall be released and returned rests alone with you for decision. At the beginning of the breach between us, the joining of battle was first from your honored part. How then do you now say "joining battle will not be allowed?" (See note.) If you shall come to join battle, then with battle will we meet you, and there's an end (of the discussion.) He therefore makes this reply.

A necessary reply is above communicated to his excellency the American imperial commissioner, Tung-Chih, 10th year, 4th moon, 27th day, (June 14, 1871.)

NOTE.—He takes the passage of Mr. Drew's dispatch stating that a condition of the release of the prisoners would be a promise that they shall not again take up arms against us, and making the phrase apply generally to all Korean soldiers, asks "Since fighting was at first upon your own motion, with what propriety do you now say 'joining battle will not be allowed?'"

Translation of dispatch brought on board United States steamer Colorado, June 12, 1871.

Li, guardian general of Foo-Ping prefecture, makes a communication.

Politeness, of course, characterized our reception of you since your honorable ships came professing friendship and amity. But the course of friendship and amity, where shall we find in your abrupt dismissal of our officials who came with inquiries as to your suffering, [on the voyage;] in your wrongly entering the territory of Kuan-Hai,

* The two characters used in Chinese for "treaty" mean literally peace-compact.

(locality of the action of 11th instant,) ignoring your ship's short-comings from the right, and only blaming our soldiers for attempting to ward off calamity; in your utter unwillingness to listen, and your sole interest upon raising a disturbance, when the affairs had already been completely solved in correspondence?

Looking at it now, one can know thus much for certain: under outward professions of friendship you cherish false and deceitful designs. To come to your landing, and thoroughly displaying your forte of committing public buildings to the flames, burning cottages, stealing property, sweeping up everything to the veriest trifle. These are the actions of thieves and spies. In your ships you have brought many of our kingdom's outlaws, rebellious brigands who have forfeited life, to connect yourselves with and collect such a following as guides to our neighborhoods. This is to become the lair whither pirates flee.

The upshot will be a wild and disorderly discharge of gun and cannon, the battering down of walled town and fort, the slaying and injuring army and people. Where was such unsparring and implacable savagery ever exceeded? You come with professions of friendship and amity, and wish us to treat you with politeness, and your actions, forsooth, are such as these. Not only will every urchin of our kingdom spit at and curse you, but more yet in the world but will indignantly sympathize with us, and debar you from intercourse, and break off such as you already hold. I had not thought that such as these would have been the actions of one intrusted with his kingdom's commission to bind in friendship another kingdom.

In those sea-ports where your ships shall hereafter arrive, who will be willing again to meet you with politeness, discuss the obligations of good faith and renew friendship? I conceal the shame I feel for your honorable vessels, the shame I feel for your honorable country.

A necessary dispatch is above communicated to the secretary of the American imperial commissioners.

Edw. B. Drew to Guardian of Foo-Ping Prefecture.

I had the honor to receive your note, dated the 12th instant, in which you complained in unbecoming language of the results which necessarily followed the wanton attack upon our vessels.

Correspondence between officials, of whatever rank, should contain none other than respectful and polite language; and as you choose to disregard the rule in this respect, it did not occur to me, until your communication came this morning, that a reply was expected.

The occurrences of the last few days, and the necessary consequences of the evil acts of your officials, of which neither you nor your government have just grounds of complaint. The minister and admiral regret the necessity which compelled this action. They hoped your government would make such reparation as would render forcible redress unnecessary. Ample time was allowed for this to be done; but instead of responding to our overtures for peace the government remained silent, and the officials from whom we heard, yourself among the number, apparently justified the attack upon our vessels. Under these circumstances how could you expect immunity? The operations of the naval forces have been confined to destroying the places from which we were assaulted and routing the soldiers that defended them; although you cannot fail to be aware that a large district of country, which contains many villages, lies within the reach of the guns of our ships, and which remains unmolested. This ought to afford convincing proof that we have no disposition to make indiscriminate warfare upon your country or your people.

The minister and admiral, as was announced to your government in advance, desire peace. They are ready to treat all friendly overtures in a reciprocal spirit, and it is to be hoped that your government will adopt a wise and prudent course, so that in the future all trouble may be avoided.

It is desired that you will forward the inclosed dispatch to His Majesty, the King of Corea.

TUNG CHIH, 10th year, 4th moon, 2th day, (June 15, 1871.)

No. 15.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to China, charged with a special mission to Corea, had the honor to announce by letter, written and sent from Peking in March last, that the Government of the United States desired to come to some definite understanding with that of His Majesty with reference to the protection and rescue of seamen who might be wrecked upon the islands and coasts of Corea, and thus remove in advance all cause of a rupture of friendly relations between the two countries. To carry out this intention and allow an opportunity for all matters to be discussed and settled in a spirit of amity and good will, His Majesty was informed that the undersigned would leave his post in China temporarily and go to Corea; that he would go in ships of war, accompanied by an admiral, in order to add dignity to his mission, and not with any design of harming the people as long as the vessels and the men on board were treated with consideration and kindness. His Majesty was also informed that as we were animated by friendly motives we should expect to be received and treated in a friendly way, and the undersigned expressed the hope that a minister of suitable rank would be deputed to meet him, upon the arrival of the ships on the coast, to whom full particulars of the business could be made known, and with whom it could be discussed with a view to amicable settlement. Upon his arrival at this point no persons of suitable rank presented themselves, nor were those who came furnished with any evidence of their having been sent by the government. These men were received with politeness by the person next in rank to the envoy. They were informed that the undersigned would remain at this place some days, in order that His Majesty might send a suitable person to meet him; in the mean time some of the smaller vessels of the fleet would be engaged in exploring the channels and islands. They were requested to inform the local magistrates and the people of the admiral's intention, so that no cause of difficulty might arise between the surveying vessels and the people. The views and intentions of the undersigned were frankly explained to the persons who came, in the full expectation that as soon as His Majesty became aware of them no delay would occur in taking steps to comply with the reasonable requests made.

After a delay of one day to allow the admiral's intentions to be made known, the surveying vessels started on their errand of humanity, and after proceeding a few miles from the anchorage, they were, without notice, wantonly fired upon by forts and masked batteries, to which the vessels replied. No gun was fired from the vessels, or menace made, until after the batteries on shore commenced the attack. After silencing the batteries the vessels returned and reported the outrageous conduct of the military authorities. Even after all this had occurred, so great was the desire of the admiral and the undersigned for peace that it was concluded to allow ten days to elapse before taking any further action, in the hope that it would be found that the attack was unauthorized, and that His Majesty would cause a suitable apology to be sent, and also a minister, as had been suggested. The local magistrate here and the magistrate at Kang-Hoa were informed of our lenient disposition in order that future hostilities might be avoided. These peaceful overtures being declined, or neglected, left no other course open to the admiral than to seek redress by arms, as is usual among all civilized nations, for the wrongs and insults which our vessels had suffered. This has been fully done. The forts have been destroyed, and the armies defending them routed and scattered. Many hundreds of the soldiers were killed and wounded, and others are prisoners on board our ships.

The latter will be treated with humanity and kindness, and, upon a proper engagement being entered into that they shall not again take up arms against us, will be released and sent to their homes. It is the custom of my country to treat all prisoners that fall into our hands with humanity, and the undersigned begs to assure His Majesty that those now held captive on board our ships will suffer neither insult nor injury.

The events of the past few days afford convincing proofs of our power whenever we choose to exert it. In the present instance the admiral concluded to go no further than destroying the fortifications that had assaulted his vessels, although well-established precedent would sanction the moving of our forces against any and all places of the kingdom. Although possessed of the power, my Government does not seek war or conquest. It does not wish to acquire a single inch of your territory; nor does it seek control over your people. It has no desire to disturb the institutions of the country, or interfere in any matters of local concern. On the contrary, it desires to cultivate friendly relations with His Majesty as the sovereign of an independent nation. My Government wishes to be at peace with all countries, neither giving just grounds for offense, nor allowing unprovoked assaults or insults to its vessels or people to go unredressed. When its citizens offend against the laws and customs of other countries they are duly apprehended and punished. This cannot be done unless some arrangement is made by which they can be arrested and given up for trial and punishment. Arrangements now exist for doing this in China and Japan. Why should not Corea enter into similar engagements? Will not a definite understanding on this point prevent irritation and ill-feeling? To discuss and arrange this question, as well as to provide for the protection and rescue of those who may, by misfortune, be cast upon the shores of your kingdom, are the chief objects which the undersigned had in view in coming here.

These objects he is still anxious to accomplish, and is prepared to exercise patience and forbearance in order that further hostilities may be avoided. It remains for His Majesty to decide whether the ends aimed at shall be attained peaceably, in accordance with the earnest desire of the undersigned and his Government, or whether our peaceful overtures will be met in the future, as they have been in the past, by force of arms.

The undersigned trusts that His Majesty will, upon a careful review of the whole question, conclude to meet these advances in a just and friendly spirit, and that a person of suitable rank will soon be sent to consult, with a view of arranging the questions which are likely to disturb amicable relations. The undersigned hopes for a speedy and frank reply to this note.

The undersigned has the honor to wish His Majesty health and happiness.

TUNG-CHIH, 10th year, 4th moon, and 27th day, (June 14, 1871.)

NOTE.—This dispatch was returned by the prefect with a note, saying that he dare not forward it.

Translation of dispatch from the magistrate of Foo-Ping-Foo, received from Guerrière Island at 10 a. m. on Saturday, June 17.

Li, guardian general of Foo-Ping Prefecture, Corea, makes the following communication in reply to Mr. Drew, acting secretary of legation:

Your dispatch has been attentively read. Its only purport is to place the blame upon the local, civil, and military authorities. It is now unnecessary to multiply elaborate discussions as to who has been in the right, and who the reverse, in what has taken place; the duty of us, the local authorities, is that we all (according to the commands of His Majesty) should confine ourselves to defending [the districts committed to our care] or to giving battle, and to these things alone.

I dare not send up to the court the dispatch now to hand from his excellency, and beg respectfully to return it herewith.

As you must have seen that we have not fired on the men of your honorable ships landing for water, but have let them come on shore, you must, I presume, be aware that we, too, do not pride ourselves on our power to kill and injure people.

A necessary communication in reply.

No. 17.

Mr. Drew, acting secretary of legation, makes the following communication to Li, guardian general of Fu Ping prefecture.

I had the honor to receive, by the hand of a messenger yesterday morning, your note of that day, returning a dispatch from his excellency the minister to His Majesty the King. In your note you say that it is not within your province to forward the dispatch to its destination, and intimate that further correspondence will not be likely to serve any useful purpose.

I am instructed by his excellency to say, in reply, that your refusal to forward his dispatch to the government seems extraordinary, and that he is unwilling to believe your course would have the sanction of His Majesty were he aware of the real facts. It is hardly possible that His Majesty would so far disregard the established rules common among all nations as deliberately to obstruct all channels of communication between an ambassador of a friendly nation and the government of Corea; thus closing the door to all attempts at the settlement of differences that now exist, or that may hereafter arise, by amicable negotiation.

I am further instructed by his excellency to say that, as he contemplates a prolonged stay in the vicinity of the capital, he has concluded to retain the dispatch until means are found to forward it to its destination; and he indulges the hope that you will, upon reflection, conclude to transmit it, or make known to His Majesty that his excellency desires to send one. This is especially desirable; for if His Majesty frustrates all efforts to open negotiation the situation will be relieved of embarrassment in case the minister and admiral are compelled to seek other means to bring the business with which his excellency is intrusted to the notice of the court. A refusal by order of the government will also show to the nations of Europe, as well as to the United States, that Corea persistently declines to hold communication with an ambassador especially sent on an errand of peace and humanity.

If, however, you conclude to adhere to the determination indicated in your note, I deem it my duty distinctly to inform you that for your refusal to perform a service incumbent upon all officials of every nation, the same responsibility will attach to His Majesty as if the act was done by his express order.

No. 18.

Translation of a dispatch from the prefect of Foo Ping to Mr. Drew; received June 20, 1871.

Li, guardian general of Foo Ping prefecture, makes a communication in reply.

To the reply which I had the honor to send you the other day, I had not expected there would be a rejoinder. But I have now to acknowledge your answer, expressing surprise that I do not dare to forward his excellency's dispatch to the court, and inquiring into the matter. An explanation of my reasons is therefore indispensable.

Although the place where your honored ships came to anchor on their arrival here* was amply suitable for intercourse and correspondence, yet you, ascending the tide, entered the narrows, and thus caused those holding the place to open fire upon you. As we had written, expressing regret at the infelicity of that affair, you might have passed it over; but no!—on the contrary, you went up a second time and fought a battle, in which many of our people were killed or wounded. Our court is terribly incensed at this, and no longer believes in the [alleged] peaceful nature of your visit. Under these circumstances, although his excellency wishes a dispatch to be forwarded, yet, in view of the utter irreconcilability of a foreign minister's writing our sovereign direct on terms of equality with what is due to rank, dignity, and ceremonial propriety, how could I, an humble official, venture to transmit it? Our court would certainly severely censure and disgrace me for such an act; and how could I escape this punishment? And is this a matter of no concern to his excellency? It is, after repeatedly and unremittingly revolving the matter in my mind, that, dreading the law and holding to the canons of usage, I dare not recklessly forward the dispatch.

The business which his excellency has encountered the hardships of a long voyage to consult about and arrange can, in all probability, I presume, be nothing else than that he does not fully know why, of two vessels [which came to our shores] one was rescued and the other destroyed; and because he is solicitous for the future, lest in the course of their voyages vessels may perhaps again meet with unforeseen disasters, he therefore desires to make a compact of peace, [treaty,] forever preventing the infliction of injury; and this is the way matters stand.

But can this be pronounced other than a manifestation of extreme over-anxiety and the taking of unnecessary trouble? As to the case of the vessel which was involved in misfortune by those on board her, who brought the catastrophe upon themselves, this affair was verily of a kind totally unexpected to us. As to vessels losing their course in fogs at sea, or being driven in by stress of weather, these, and all similar dangers and disasters, concern human life; that this country will with fidelity rescue mariners and send them forward by land, as they desire, is recorded as our established law, enduring as the elements. In this we imitate Heaven's fostering care of mankind, and make no discrimination between those nations which are remote and those which are near. Therefore it is that the local officials along the coast are, without exception, in a state of anxious concern day and night; and among these officials I am an unworthy one. With the spirits of heaven and earth watching above and about me, how dare I use empty or deceitful expressions? I only hope that his excellency will no longer be over-solicitous and needlessly trouble himself about these matters.

Although you have not consulted about and settled any business, yet granted that you had done so, the results would have been to the above effect and nothing more. There is no need for a compact of peace, and friendly feeling will be naturally found in what I have above stated.*

Of what the unworthy officer writing has heard of as the discussions of the crowded halls of our court he has now made frank disclosure; yet, his own proper duties are limited to holding his jurisdiction or doing battle, and to these things only.

A necessary reply. To the American Chief Secretary.

No. 36.

Mr. Low to Mr. Fish.

No. 75.] ON BOARD UNITED STATES FLAG-SHIP COLORADO, Harbor of Chefoo, China, July 6, 1871. (Received August 21.)

SIR: I have the honor to report my arrival at this port on the 5th instant, having left the anchorage near Boisé Island on the 3d. In my former dispatches I endeavored to furnish you with a succinct narrative of events as they occurred after my arrival and during my stay on the coast of Corea; the efforts that were made to carry out your instructions and provide some adequate measures for the safety and rescue of shipwrecked mariners; the reasons for the hostile action of the fleet against the Corean government, and the considerations which induced the admiral and myself to confine the operations of the Navy within the narrowest limits compatible with the honor of the Government of the United States; the safety of our people navigating these seas, and those residing upon Chinese soil. I now have to inform you that all my efforts failed to induce the government of Corea to enter into negotiations with a view to concluding a treaty, such as my instructions contemplated, or to discuss with me that or any other question. In concluding the history of these proceedings, I deem it not inappropriate to review the whole question of intercourse with Corea, in which the safety, welfare, and interests of the citizens and subjects of civilized and Christian governments are so largely involved; the attitude of the Corean government in the past, and the small probability of any voluntary change in the future. I also deem it proper to offer some observations, which may be of service to the Government of the United States in determining the proper course to be pursued to prevent the lives and property of our citizens from being sacrificed. Corea is now the only nation on the earth claiming to be civilized; that absolutely refuses to hold intercourse of any sort with the Christian countries of Europe and America. Up to within a few years Corea has attracted little notice; and it may be presumed that her isolated position and the reputed poverty of her people would continue to afford immunity, notwithstanding her exceptional attitude toward foreign nations, did not considerations of humanity dictate a different course. The opening and rapid increase of trade with Japan, China, and Russian Manchuria, which required vessels to skirt the coasts of Corea in their voyages, brought prominently into view the undesirability of allowing a country lying directly in the track of a great commerce, bounded on three sides by the sea, to remain with its coasts, outlying islands, and dangerous passages, totally unexplored. The Corean government would neither make these surveys itself, nor allow other nations to do it without incurring great risk. The history of all attempts to survey the coasts and islands goes to show that every obstacle was thrown in the way by the officials and the people—objection being made to the landing of surveying parties to make astronomical observations, while the lives of those engaged in such work were endangered when these warnings were disregarded. The wreck and total destruction of several foreign vessels and their cargoes, during the past ten years, and the massacre by the natives of the crew of one vessel certainly, and perhaps more, brought Corea into more general notice. The circumstances of the loss of the American schooner General Sherman, and the massacre of her crew, in 1866, are too well known to require mention of the details here.

The United States steamer Wachusett visited the coast in 1867 to inquire into the circumstances, without obtaining any information whatever, and the visit, by direction of the admiral in command of the fleet in these seas, of the United States steamer Shenandoah, in 1868, resulted in obtaining statements from the Corean local officials in regard to it, the truth of which is not supported by other and more reliable testimony, which I have been able to obtain. The commander of the Shenandoah was prohibited from going to the spot where the Sherman was wrecked to make inquiries and thus learn the real facts, and when her boats attempted to ascend the river they were fired upon from forts commanding its entrance, which compelled the vessel to return without obtaining further intelligence.

During his stay Captain Febiger desired to correspond with the government in order to obtain an official explanation, but was informed that, as he did not come in obedience to the direct orders of the President, correspondence between him and the court could not be permitted. During the same year another American schooner, the Surprise, had been wrecked and become a total loss, but the officers and crew were safely sent through to China by land. This circumstance led many to believe in the truth of the stories told by the Corean officials about the wanton acts of the persons on board the Sherman, which brought down the wrath of the people and caused the destruction of the vessel and those on board. This opinion was strengthened by a report which came to the consul-general at Shanghai concerning the anxiety of the Corean government in regard to the Sherman affair, and that it was proposed to send an embassy to the United States to explain the matter, a full account of which was embodied in his dispatches of 24th April, 1868, to the State Department. It is undoubtedly true that the recommendation of the consul-general, that an attempt be made to open negotiations with Corea, was based chiefly upon the information before referred to. It is also true, I suspect, that it was this intelligence more than anything else that led the Government to anticipate favorable results from the recent attempt at friendly negotiation. It is proper for me to say here that all my experience and information lead me to believe that the safety of the crew of the Surprise is due to the fact that the vessel was a total wreck, and therefore the crew could not, if spared, charge the government and people with robbery and plunder of their property, or cause their Government to make demands for redress and reparation, which would not have been the case with the other vessel. I also feel bound to say that the consul-general's informant fabricated, for ulterior and base purposes, the information embodied in the dispatches before referred to. There is no reason to suppose that it contained the least shadow of truth; on the contrary, the evidence is most conclusive that there never was any intention on the part of the government of Corea to offer an apology or afford the least reparation for what I am now convinced was a great outrage upon the persons and property of citizens of the United States. All the evidence obtainable goes to prove that the government of Corea was and is determined to maintain its original status—non-intercourse with any Western nation, and hostile resistance to all attempts of foreign governments to establish relations for whatever purpose.

The considerations which induced the United States to send a special mission to Corea this year are of course more fully known to the Department than to me. It is sufficient for me to say that my instructions appeared to contemplate such action as would be likely to induce the government of Corea to agree to a treaty which would have for its chief if not only object the protection and rescue of the lives and property of mariners who might by misfortune be cast upon these shores. In accordance with the letter and spirit of these instructions I undertook to carry them out. No time was designated for carrying them out, this being left to the discretion of myself and the admiral of the fleet, who was directed to accompany me.

Considerations affecting American interests in China, too important to be overlooked or disregarded, prevented an early compliance with the instructions; besides, I deemed it better to delay the matter until the Korean embassy should have visited Peking, which would afford the Chinese government an opportunity to explain the peaceful and humane purposes of the mission. In addition to this, I wrote a dispatch to the King of Corea, frankly explaining the purposes which I desired to accomplish, and giving assurances of our friendly disposition. To forward this letter to its destination, and make sure that it would reach the King of Corea, I sought and obtained the good offices of the Chinese government. To further guard against any question being raised which might furnish a pretext for declining to treat with me as the accredited agent of my Government, I waited until I could receive a "full power" before starting on my mission. My previous dispatches will have made known to you the anxiety I felt in regard to the matter, and the scrupulous care taken to avoid, if possible, all chance of hostilities, unless forced upon us in a manner from which there would be no honorable escape. That hostilities did occur under circumstances exhibiting great treachery and wantonness you have been fully advised; and also of our failure to obtain any word of apology or regret, either from the government or the local officials. It is a noteworthy fact, which should be stated in this connection, that the copy of the letter from the court to the Peking government (see inclosure 5 in dispatch No. 74) was not sent to me until the 6th June, five days after the attack upon our vessels, although the fact of our presence on the coast was known at the capital several days prior to the arrival of the fleet at the anchorage near Boisé Island. From this circumstance it would appear that the government did not desire that any warning should be given of its hostile intentions; but as soon as defeat had, in their opinion, overtaken us, the copy of the letter was sent for my information. This view is supported by documents and official orders found in the captured forts on the 10th and 11th instants. Everything goes to prove that the government was anxious to entrap the vessels in a position where great damage could be inflicted without chance of escape. No intimation was given in advance of their hostile intent, which would have put the vessels on their guard; on the contrary, the people who came to see us, upon being informed of the admiral's intention to send out the surveying vessels, expressed no dissent, but rather gave tacit assurances of friendly treatment. Of the first attack, the delay afterward allowed the Koreans to afford an opportunity for apology and reparation, the efforts of both the admiral and myself to avoid further hostilities, with the reasons therefor, the engagement of the 10th and 11th June and the results, the attempt to open negotiations afterward, and the repeated refusal of the local authorities to forward my dispatch to the court, you will have learned from previous dispatches.

In the opinion of the admiral his forces were insufficient to justify an attempt to reach the capital without great risk, and feeling confident that, unless this could be done, any advance would have no effect upon the government, further offensive movements seemed inexpedient. After waiting long enough to demonstrate the fact that there was no probability of the government responding to our overtures, I concluded to withdraw and submit the whole question to the President for his decision. Prior to leaving, I caused a dispatch to be sent to the prefect of Fu-Ping Fu, explaining the cause of my departure, copy of which you will find herewith. (Inclosure No. 1.)

The delicate situation of affairs in China rendered great caution necessary in our proceedings. The news of a defeat of our arms in Corea would be spread throughout China, enlarged and embellished as orientals only can do, and would seriously injure our prestige and endanger our people residing there. This consideration alone would have led me to point out to the admiral the absolute necessity for the second attack.

It appeared to me indispensable that the fleet should not leave Corea while there remained any reasonable grounds for the Government to believe that we had been defeated by force of arms. As I anticipated would be the case, the Koreans believed that we were defeated on the 1st of June, and so reported it to China. This news spread far and near, causing much excitement among the Chinese and great anxiety to foreigners.

The same report was very likely sent to Europe and America by telegraph. It remains to be seen what form the native report of the second engagement will take. For the same reason I deemed it wise to exercise great caution after the events of the 10th and 11th of June. It did not seem prudent to take the risk of defeat, when any success we might probably achieve would not be likely to accomplish the main object for which I went.

In view of these considerations, and the additional one that hostile operations against a foreign country should not, except under the most peculiar circumstances, admitting of no delay, be carried on without the express sanction of the Government, previously obtained, I concluded to pursue the course above indicated.

Having exhausted the power in me vested by the instructions of the Department, it now remains for the Government of the United States to decide upon the policy to be pursued in the future. Having had the benefit of some personal experience, and an opportunity to gain considerable information, I deem it not inappropriate to submit some observations upon affairs in Corea, coupled with those in China.

The two are so closely connected that in considering the one the other should not be lost sight of.

So far as the object sought to be attained through the recent expedition to Corea is concerned, no question can, I imagine, be raised as to its importance, or the duty of the Government of the United States in connection therewith. The narrow limits within which I was instructed to confine negotiations clearly showed that it was not the intention of the United States to engage in any operations calculated to disturb the internal relations of Corea, or force upon her any agreement looking to trade. I indulged a hope that it would not be impossible to so impress upon that government the duty of all nations to protect and succor their citizens and subjects wherever they may go in the prosecution of legalized commerce, that it would recognize the propriety of this, and agree to some fixed rule by which it could be done in Corea. I trusted that the objects sought might be gained without the use or even the display of force on either side. These overtures having been rejected in a peremptory, insulting, and hostile manner, no hope remains of accomplishing the result by peaceful means. It now becomes the duty of all civilized and Christian governments to carefully consider what their rights are, and their duty to their citizens and subjects when these rights are trampled upon by countries which reject and set at defiance the law of nations as well as the laws of humanity.

It will hardly be contended, I imagine, that the natural law, or the right of self-preservation, will permit any nation occupying territory bordering upon the sea to so far exclude itself from all intercourse that it will neither adopt means to survey its coasts, islands, and channels, nor allow this to be done by others; nor is it consistent with the principles of humanity that an isolated nation shall be allowed to maltreat and massacre without question those whom the perils of the sea cast upon its shores.

On the contrary, the sea is the great highway of nations, which no country is at liberty to obstruct with impunity, and where natural obstacles and dangers exist, all governments have a right to demand that they shall be clearly defined and marked, so that they may be avoided. It is also a right of all countries, which should be jealously guarded, to provide adequate means for the safety and protection of its mariners and the recovery of their property. This no nation can properly deny.

That Corea will not voluntarily make any arrangements by which these rights can be secured is settled beyond a doubt. The question now is, whether western nations will permit this unhappy condition of things to continue, or whether active and efficient means will be adopted to correct existing evils. In determining a policy for the future, the influence which the attitude and action of Corea will exert upon China and Japan should not be lost sight of. This consideration engaged my serious attention from the moment your instructions reached me. The unhappy impression which the failure of the French expedition in 1866 created among the Chinese induced me to guard, as far as possible, against similar results in case we failed to accomplish the object sought. As an important step in this direction, I deemed it advisable to communicate to the Chinese government in substance what the mission was expected to accomplish, and also the spirit of amity and friendliness with which I was instructed to conduct all negotiations with Corea. It is not unlikely that my statement of the actual facts will be received and accepted as correct by the imperial government of China; that while we failed to accomplish what we had a right to hope for and expect in the matter of negotiations, we suffered no defeat at the hands of the Korean armies, but that, on the contrary, we inflicted great injury upon them for their unprovoked assault. But even if unsuccessful in this, it will exercise little influence upon the officials that are naturally inimical to foreigners, or the people.

The Korean government will exult over the fact that it is able to keep foreign nations from entering its territory, and prevent their ministers from communicating with its high officers.

This will react upon China, and prevent further concessions being made. It will also furnish additional arguments to the anti-foreign party, who insist upon the right and duty of China to expel all foreigners.

Notwithstanding our significant military success, it may be doubted whether even the King of Korea is aware of the real facts in regard to the disaster to his arms. It is so manifestly the disposition and policy of oriental officials to misrepresent misfortunes when their reputation is involved, that the central government is rarely advised of the real truth. If I am correct in this supposition, it is not unlikely that the events of the 10th and 11th June were reported in China as Korean victories, and possibly to the King of Korea also. Nor will the Korean government be made to feel the force of foreign arms until the seat of government is menaced or occupied by foreign troops.

As the case stands, foreign governments should decide either to let Korea alone, and allow her to burn, pillage, destroy, and massacre all that come within her reach without question or demand for redress, or organize and send such a force as will be able to insure success, without unnecessary risk, in breaking down the barriers that stand in the way of intercourse. No further efforts at conciliatory negotiation should be made, nor should mere demonstrations of force be attempted in the expectation that favorable results will follow.

They will serve no useful purpose, and be likely to end in harm. Every fresh attempt and failure to accomplish practical results in Korea only tend to render the situation in China more insecure.

With reference to the policy which western nations will sooner or later find it their duty to adopt toward Korea, I have decided opinions; and of the necessity for an early decision to prevent great disasters, I am profoundly impressed. Aside from the pressing necessity for immediate action to insure the rescue and protection of mariners, delay only renders the task more difficult of accomplishment. And every year that the Korean government is allowed to continue in its exclusiveness, increases the peril to the lives and property of foreign residents in China. If no adequate measures be taken to avert the impending storm in the East, the result will, I fear, be disastrous. I write this without haste or passion, guided solely by a sense of duty which cannot be overlooked or evaded. As is well known to the Department, I am opposed to making war upon Korea or any other country for the sole purpose of opening them to foreign trade, or extending it when once established. My opinions are based upon facts and considerations of greater importance than mere mercantile advantages, although these should not be overlooked by any government that desires to maintain an honorable and influential position among the nations of the earth. It may not be improper for me to remark in this connection that, in my opinion, the commercial advantages which Korea would offer, if opened to trade, have been greatly underestimated hitherto.

In regard to the means necessary to reasonably assure success, should the United States conclude to continue in its efforts to bring Korea to terms, the reports of Admiral Rodgers to the Navy Department will furnish accurate and trustworthy data. All commercial nations holding intercourse with China and Japan are equally concerned with the United States in the proper solution of this question, and as the interests of all are so inseparably linked together in these countries, perhaps the objections to departing from the traditional policy which governs the United

In intrusting me with this mission to Corea, you said: "The Department relies upon you, in fulfilling these instructions, to exercise prudence and discretion, to maintain firmly the right of the United States to have their seamen protected, to avoid a conflict by force unless it cannot be avoided without dishonor, and to seek in all proper ways the harmonious and friendly assistance of the Chinese government."

These instructions I have, to the best of my ability, endeavored to carry out, and I trust that my action may receive the approval of the President.

Edward B. Drew, acting secretary of legation, to Li, guardian general of Foo-Ping prefecture.

I had the honor to receive your note of 20th June, in which you reiterate your refusal to forward a dispatch from his excellency the minister to the court. You also decline to inform His Majesty that his excellency desires to communicate with the government. In reply, I would observe that it is quite beyond my province to enter into a discussion respecting the proprieties of diplomatic correspondence and intercourse; nor does our former correspondence justify the belief that such delicate and responsible powers are confided to you by your government.

With reference to the policy and practices of your government, about which you make positive statements and give voluntary assurances, I have to say that, until better satisfied of your authority, these statements and assurances cannot be accepted by his excellency as a reply to inquiries he might have made had an opportunity been afforded for him to explain the business in detail; and until this can be done in a convenient and proper manner it is quite unnecessary for officials, of whatever rank, to assume to know what his business is, or to gratuitously assign reasons for the action of His Majesty in declining to open communication with a foreign envoy, sent by his government to transact business of the highest importance. His excellency instructs me to say that coming, as he did, in obedience to the express orders of his Government, in the interest of humanity, without menace or hostile intent, all of which was announced to His Majesty in advance, he had a right to expect a courteous and civil reception, and that he would be allowed to explain in person, either to His Majesty or to a high minister designated for the purpose, the wishes of the Government of the United States preparatory to discussing, and agreeing, if possible, upon some definite mode of conducting affairs between the two countries in the future.

To remove, as far as practicable, the doubts of the local officials and the people, which the presence of the vessels might have raised, and to give assurances of our friendly disposition, you were, by permission of the minister, informed that we desired peace, and that there was no intention, either on the part of his excellency or the admiral, of interfering with the people, disturbing the government or the local institutions, or seeking control over a single foot of your territory. Instead of being received in a manner befitting the dignity of the Government he represents, and afforded an opportunity to make known the business which he was instructed to bring to the notice of your government, the civilities and courtesies due to a minister of his rank have been withheld, and all his efforts to open communication with the government have been frustrated. Your refusal to send the dispatches is quite in keeping with what had preceded, and your reasons for declining to perform the service are, I feel bound to say, frivolous and evasive. While waiting at this anchorage to receive such communication as His Majesty might choose to send, and consult with such persons, of suitable rank, as might be designated to meet him, the admiral concluded to render his smaller vessels useful to commerce and humanity by employing them in exploring the difficult and dangerous channels which are so numerous on the coasts of your country. Information was given in advance, of his intention, with the request that the surveying party should not be interfered with. Notwithstanding this timely caution and these assurances of good faith, the vessels were, without notice, wantonly and treacherously assaulted from your forts and masked batteries, and the utmost efforts of the military authorities were used to destroy the vessels and the people on board. Fortunately, the skill and power of the military were not equal to the base and treacherous design of the officers that directed the attack. Instead of making an apology for this outrage, the government remained silent, and the local officials from whom we heard mildly deprecated the necessity but justified the act. After waiting a reasonable time for apology and reparation, the admiral proceeded to seek redress in the only manner possible, according to the rules and practices of civilized nations. That the punishment inflicted was severe you are well aware. At the same time the moderation of the admiral in confining his measures of redress to the forts and places from which the first attack upon his squadron came, must be as apparent to your government as it will be to the world when the circumstances are made known.

I am directed to say, in conclusion, that in the opinion of his excellency all reasonable efforts have been put forth to accomplish what his Government desired without the use of force, or even the display of it, further than it became necessary to redress unprovoked wrongs. These friendly overtures having failed to produce any favorable results, he feels that further correspondence or delay is alike unnecessary. From what he has seen, he is firmly convinced that the government of Corea has from the first determined to repel all advances toward friendly negotiation, and that the course of moderation and conciliation, which his excellency adopted and frankly made known, has had no other effect than to enlarge the pretensions and encourage the hostility of His Majesty and those acting under his authority. That the Government of the United States will be disappointed when it learns all the facts is quite clear. What course it will deem proper to pursue in view of all the circumstances it is not within my province to predict. It can scarcely be expected that the United States, or the governments of Europe, will continue to submit tamely to the haughty dictum of His Majesty, or rest content with his persistent refusal to hold direct communication with the ministers that may be sent on public business. Nor will it furnish just grounds for complaint on the part of His Majesty were foreign governments to use the power necessary to enforce compliance with their reasonable demands. In view of the gravity of the situation, his excellency deems it expedient to report fully the existing condition of affairs to his Government, and take its instructions before proceeding further. In the mean time he will feel at liberty to withdraw temporarily to some other point on the coast of Corea or China. Some of the vessels may be employed on the coast surveying during his absence, and it is to be hoped they will not be interfered with or molested.

I would further observe that if any of my countrymen should be, unfortunately, wrecked upon the coasts or islands, it is expected that the assurances of His Majesty to the board of rites will be made good, and the people be humanely treated and forwarded to their country. Any expenses incurred on this account will be readily paid by the Government of the United States.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Fish.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, July 26, 1871. (Received September 20.)

SIR: The translation of the petition from the Chinese laborers in Peru to the American minister in Lima, which gave occasion to the inclosed correspondence, was sent to the Department by Mr. Low, and need not, therefore, be duplicated. When I transmitted the original paper to Prince Kung, I endeavored to point out one mode open to him of at least doing something to relieve the wrongs complained of by his countrymen in Peru, (inclosure A,) and in addition I personally urged it upon the members of the Foreign Office as a desirable step to show that the Emperor did not altogether ignore the complaints of his people in foreign lands.

These officials expressed their sympathy with their suffering countrymen, regretted that they should have been inveigled into such a miserable, cruel, servitude, and hoped that the evils would soon be mitigated, but they had no vivid sense of their own responsibilities in the matter, and made no inquiries as to the most desirable means of doing anything.

The answer of Prince Kung is much in this sense, and is a confession of entire inability to relieve the petitioners, (inclosure B.) though I think he is disposed to aid them, if he could see his way clear to the manner.

I have sent copies of the two dispatches to the United States legation at Lima, for the information of the Chinese there.

When all the circumstances are considered, I am not surprised at the prince's reply.

This government has now one representative abroad, and they are watching with great solicitude the reception Chung-how meets in Europe, as well as France in particular, and would not think of sending another envoy until his return. They have no treaty with Peru, and it has not yet entered into their international code to make the first proposals to negotiate with any nation. This seems to them, therefore, to close the way to make even a remonstrance to the Peruvian authorities, or to ask their good offices, on the ground of humanity and self-interest, to protect the defenseless and the ignorant, and uphold the rights of these unhappy and oppressed laborers who have been brought to their shores. In urging this government to make a direct application to our own in this behalf, I suggested a course which they could adopt without risk of any entanglements, and involved only the writing of a letter to another power to request it to help them to do what they acknowledged was a desirable thing, and which would show the world that they had heard these complaints.

But none of these arguments moved the Peking official, whose secluded position and prejudices of education and etiquette prevent from learning the true state of the world, and availing themselves of the opportunities offered them.

The approaching majority of their young sovereign, involving, as it must, a number of changes in the administration, may have had its influence in deterring them from entering upon a new path like this, until they were sure how it might be regarded.

At present they content themselves with crying non possumus to every new proposal, and standing on their reserved rights; though I do not regard this present effort as having been altogether in vain.

I have, &c.,

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

A.

S. Wells Williams to Prince Kung.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Peking, June 8, 1871.

SIR: In the month of June, 1869, the United States minister, J. Ross Browne, sent to your imperial highness a complaint which the Chinese living in Peru had presented to the United States envoy residing at Lima, stating that they were very harshly treated by their masters; to which your highness's reply was received. Mr. Henry M. Brent, the United States chargé d'affaires at Lima, has now forwarded another complaint presented to him by the Chinese laborers in Peru, setting forth their grievances and harsh treatment, worse than before, and asking that he would make their condition known to the Emperor, and see if an envoy could be sent to live in Peru, or whether the American minister could act as such and help them. It seems from the perusal of this petition, as well as the last, that the condition of these laborers is very lamentable. Far off in a distant land, they have met this suffering and misery; they are like a bird in a cage, out of which there is no escape.

The petition which they have sent I now submit for your highness's perusal, that you may devise measures for their deliverance and succor. If you decide to agree to their request, and make the United States minister at Lima the protector of the Chinese living in that land, it will be necessary to make the proposal direct to the President; and if he is willing to allow and instruct the American minister there to act in this capacity for awhile, (if the Peruvian government is also willing to have him do so,) then the arrangement can be effected. Hereafter, if China and Peru should enter into negotiations, the stipulations of the treaty could secure the welfare of the Chinese in that country. Just now it would be advisable to instruct the high officers at Canton to proclaim through all the districts and towns in Kwang-Chan prefecture, warning the people not to engage themselves to go to Peru as laborers, so that they may not fall into similar distress. I now inclose the original copy of the complaint made by the Chinese laborers of their distressed condition for your highness's perusal.

I have the honor to be, sir, your highness's obedient servant,

S. WELLS WILLIAMS.

His Imperial Highness PRINCE KUNG, &c., &c.

B.

Prince Kung to S. Wells Williams.

TING-CHI, 10th year, 5th moon, 30th day, (July 17, 1871.)

Prince Kung, chief secretary of state for foreign affairs, herewith sends a reply.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's dispatch of the 8th ultimo, in which you inform me that Mr. Brent, the United States chargé d'affaires at Lima, had sent a second complaint, made to him by the Chinese laborers in Peru, of the harsh treatment they received there, and that you accordingly inclosed the original copy of this paper for my examination, and to devise such measures for their relief as might be possible, &c., &c.

In relation to this matter I may here refer to the former memorial from the Chinese laborers in Peru, setting forth the cruel treatment of their masters, which was made known to me by Mr. Ross Browne. I replied to him at the time, requesting that he would write to the American minister in Peru, asking him to kindly examine into the truth of these complaints, and to devise some way of lending the sufferers a helping hand. It was also ordered at the same time that no merchants of a non-treaty power should be allowed to open an office for hiring laborers, and all natives were prohibited from engaging themselves to such, or going to Macao for that purpose. These regulations were communicated to all the foreign ministers to transmit to their countrymen, so that all might know that no laborers could be engaged or sent off from Macao. In May of last year Mr. Low informed me that the American minister in Peru had represented the hardships experienced by the Chinese laborers to the government at Lima.

From these, as well as the dispatch from your excellency now before me, it is manifest how much the miserable condition of the Chinese laborers in Peru has moved the sympathies of the American officials there and here. Judging from these documents, and the reports given in the newspapers, it appears that in no country are these laborers treated with so much cruelty as in Peru, and they are secretly and illegally hired as coolies only in Macao. It was plainly stated in the dispatch sent to the foreign ministers in June, 1869, which they were requested to make known to their countrymen that it was henceforth illegal to open emigration offices in Macao, and no coolies could be shipped from there. This was done in order to prevent Chinese subjects from being inveigled into such evils in future. Though there is every probability that those prohibitions were made known by the resident ministers to their consuls, yet the Foreign Office has deemed it advisable to send a copy of the dispatch now under reply to the governor general at Canton, that he may make known to the people at large that they are not to go to Macao to engage themselves as laborers; and if necessary, to reissue the rules forbidding foreign merchants to open emigration offices there. He has also been directed to confer with the consuls at Canton how to carry these things into effect.

In regard to the best method to alleviate the sufferings of these Chinese laborers, so that they may no longer be subjected to these troubles, I am at present deliberating, and shall expect to avail myself of your admirable suggestions in the matter.

[Extract.]

No. 80.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Chefoo, August 5, 1871. (Received October 23.)

SIR: The result of the trials of those charged with participation in the Tien-tsin massacre last year was that twenty were convicted and sentenced to death, and twenty-five others, besides the two local officials, were ordered to be banished. Sixteen of the twenty first mentioned were convicted of the murder of the French, and the remainder, of killing the three Russians. The sixteen were executed, but the sentence of the other four was temporarily suspended at the suggestion of the Russian minister, as I was then informed. Subsequently I learned that this action was taken because the Russian minister declined to accept the punishment decreed to the four culprits in full satisfaction for the crime, nor would that, or any other number of executions, be considered as ample, unless the guilt of those accused be established by a joint examination in which the Russian consul should take part. It was finally agreed that the four men in question should be re-examined in the manner proposed. After a searching investigation the Russian consul general became satisfied that two of the accused were guilty of the murder of his nationals, and that the other two, while aiding and abetting, did not actually commit any overt act.

When the result of the re-examination became known, the friends of the least guilty parties petitioned the consul general to get his consent to the commutation of their punishment, to which reply was returned that any such action would be transcending the powers of the consul general. The matter was then referred to Peking, and finally to St. Petersburg; the Russian minister consenting that the execution of the sentence upon all might be suspended until instructions from his government could be received. Thus matters stood at the beginning of April, when I left Peking.

I am now informed by the Russian minister, who is temporarily residing here for the summer, that agreeably to instructions received, investing him with authority to consent to such an arrangement as he deemed proper, by which substantial justice should be done, he had consented that the sentences of the two least guilty might be commuted to banishment for life. The action of the Russian minister in the re-examination of the case was, I think, wise. It will serve as a precedent in the future, should similar cases unfortunately occur, and will impress the Chinese with this truth: that a given number of executions will not meet the demands of justice unless the guilt of those accused be proven. The leniency shown by the Russian government ought to teach both officials and people that foreign nations desire the punishment of the guilty only, which should be meted out according to the measure of their guilt.

It is proper to add that the result of this examination goes far to disprove the assertion which has obtained general credence, that the men executed at Tien-tsin last autumn were purchased victims, the greater portion if not all of whom were innocent, and that the really guilty ones escaped punishment altogether. That many of those deserving punishment escaped is quite probable, but no evidence worthy of credence was ever brought to my notice which tended to show that those who did suffer were innocent.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, September 20, 1871.

SIR: With reference to your dispatch of the 20th of June last, (No. 74,) detailing the events connected with the expedition to Corea, I have to inform you that the Department approves your general course of proceeding on the occasion referred to, but thinks that your communications should have been addressed to the principal minister of foreign affairs instead of the King. Their being thus addressed may be appealed to as justification for their not being received.

It is to be regretted that in the communication of June 18 (inclosure No. 17) by Mr. Drew, acting secretary of legation, addressed to Li, guardian general of Fu-Ping prefecture, the declaration of intention to make "a prolonged stay in the vicinity of the capital" was made, and was accompanied by the expression of a determination "to retain the dispatch until means are found to forward it to its destination." This refers to a dispatch which the Coreans had declined to receive. This declaration was not carried out. The minister left Corea about sixteen days after its date without having found means to forward the dispatch to its destination. But for this unfulfilled promise or threat the Coreans would be without justification in alleging that all that had been contemplated or intended had been accomplished.

*Mr. Davis to Mr. Low.

No. 57.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, October 19, 1871.

SIR: The delay in answering your No. 56 has not been caused by a disposition to disapprove of your reply to the Foreign Office note on the subject of missions. On the contrary, the President regards it as wise and judicious.

Two versions of these regulations have found their way to the Department—the translation inclosed in your No. 56, and a translation apparently made from a French version, presented to the houses of Parliament in Great Britain, in June or July last, and printed in British Blue Book, entitled "China, No. 3, 1871." These versions differ widely in form and expression, and, to some extent, in sense.

* This correspondence has been transmitted to the ministers of the United States in London, Paris, Berlin, St. Petersburg, Vienna, and Florence, with instructions to transmit a copy in each case to the foreign minister. (See ante, note to Mr. Low's dispatch to Mr. Fish, of March 30, 1871.)

The version presented to Parliament has been or will be made the subject of instructions by Her Majesty's government to Mr. Wade. A copy of these proposed instructions was communicated to this Department by Her Majesty's chargé at Washington in August last. A copy is herewith inclosed, and also a copy of the version to which they relate.

The most material variance between the two versions is in the designation of the missionaries against whom the Chinese Foreign Office complain. Your version limits the complaints to missionaries of the Roman Church. The British translation, following the French version, represents the complaints against "Christians." For instance, the British version renders the beginning of the first article or rule as follows: "The Christians, when they found an orphanage, give no notice to the authorities and appear to act with mystery." Your translation of the same sentence reads, "The establishment of asylums for training up children by the Romanists has hitherto not been reported to the authorities, and, as these institutions are carefully kept private." &c., &c.. From the English version of the accompanying note from the Yamen, it is evident that the Chinese Foreign Office recognizes that there are in China Christian missionaries of different faiths; for they say that "the people in general, unaware of the difference which exists between Protestantism and Catholicism, confound these two religions under this latter denomination." Your version is to the same effect.

Under these circumstances it may be well to re-examine the original, and ascertain which version is correct. Both, however, agree in the statement that the government of China is apprehensive of a popular outbreak which may endanger the peace of the country and its relations with the United States and the European powers, and that, therefore, it has determined to submit to the representatives of the foreign powers a plan for regulating the condition of Christians in China. Your prompt and able answer to these propositions leaves little to be said by the Department.

The rights of citizens of the United States in China are well defined by treaty. So long as they attend peaceably to their affairs they are to be placed on a common footing of amity and good-will with subjects of China, and are to receive and enjoy for themselves, and everything appertaining to them, protection and defense from all insults and injuries. They have the right to reside at any of the ports open to foreign commerce, to rent houses and places of business, or to build such upon sites which they have the right to hire. They have secured to them the right to build churches and cemeteries, and they may teach or worship in those churches without being harassed, persecuted, interfered with or molested. These are some of the rights which are expressly and in terms granted to the United States, for their citizens, by the treaty of 1858. If I rightly apprehend the spirit of the note of the Foreign Office, and of the regulations which accompany it, there is, to state it in the least objectionable form, an apprehension in the Yamen that it may become necessary to curtail some of these rights, in consequence of the alleged conduct of French missionaries. This idea cannot be entertained for one moment by the United States.

The President will see with deep regret any attempt to place a foreign ecclesiastic, as such, on a different footing from other foreigners residing in China. It is a fundamental principle in the United States that all persons, of every sect, faith, or race, are equal before the law. They make no distinction in favor of any ecclesiastical organization. Prelates, priests, and ministers can claim equal protection here, and enjoy equal rank in the eye of the civil law. The United States ask no more in China than they confer at home. Should the peace of the empire be disturbed by efforts from any quarter to induce or compel the government to confer unusual civil rights on foreign ecclesiastics, you will make it plain that the United States have no sympathy with such a movement, and regard it as outside of the treaty rights which have been conferred upon the western nations. Should these demands, however, be complied with, this Government will then consider whether, under the thirtieth article of the treaty of 1858, a similar right will not at once inure to the benefit of all the public officers, merchants, and citizens of the United States.

The President would look with equal regret upon any attempt to withdraw the native Christians from the jurisdiction of the Emperor without his free consent, or to convert the churches founded by the missionaries into asylums. He can well conceive that the enjoyment of such a right might, as intimated by the Yamen, operate for the nominal and apparent conversion of desperadoes and criminals, who need a place of refuge to escape from punishment. On the other hand, he is mindful that the faith of the empire is pledged to the United States that not only citizens of the United States, but Chinese converts, who peaceably teach and practice the principles of Christianity, shall in no case be interfered with or molested. He feels confident, therefore, and expects that whatever may be the disposition of the turbulent and evil-disposed among the subjects of the Emperor, the native converts to Christianity will enjoy the full measure of protection guaranteed to them by the treaty of 1858. Except so far as the guarantee of that treaty extends, the President cannot permit the officials of the United States to participate in any attempt to disturb the natural relations between the Emperor and his Christian subjects. He particularly desires it to be understood that the profession of the Christian faith is not regarded by the officers of the United States as a protection against punishment for crime. Ecclesiastical asylums for criminals have never existed in this country, nor will they be planted elsewhere through its agency.

This Government has studiously and steadfastly observed its treaty engagements with China. The policy of the President and of his administration was elaborately set forth in the dispatch of August 31, 1869, to Mr. Bancroft, a copy of which was inclosed in Mr. Fish's No. 2 to you. The President has seen no reason to change that policy. On the contrary, the events which have occurred since that dispatch was written have the more convinced him of its justice. We stand upon our treaty rights; we ask no more, we expect no less. If other nations demand more, if they advance pretensions inconsistent with the dignity of China as an independent power, we are no parties to such acts. Our influence, so far as it may be legitimately and peacefully exerted, will be used to prevent such demands or pretensions, should there be serious reason to apprehend that they will be put forth. We feel that the government of the Emperor is actuated by friendly feelings towards the United States. We recognize the existence, to a limited extent, of the popular feeling and danger of outbreak which are set forth in the note of the Foreign Office. As far as we can, consistently with the duty which the government owes to those who have the right to claim its protection, we desire to aid the government of the Emperor in calming that feeling and in preventing such outbreak.

Should other nations seek our advice, or counsel with us on this subject, we shall not fail to urge these views. But in order to urge them with success, we must be in a position to say that the Chinese government is able and anxious to perform all its international duties, whether founded upon treaty or on well-settled principles of public law. We could speak with still greater force if we could give an assurance that it is disposed to enlarge its intercourse with the West, and to revise its treaties in that spirit. The guarantees for peace lie in this direction rather than in the revival of a restrictive policy.

With these general principles stated, it is not necessary to refer in detail to the note of the Foreign Office, or to the rules. Your reply to them has anticipated much that I should have otherwise said. I content myself with saying that as no complaint is made against the American missionaries, so there is no necessity to make such rules for their observance.

A copy of these instructions will be sent to the various treaty powers. You will communicate the substance of them to Prince Kung.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

J. C. B. DAVIS,
Acting Secretary.

FREDERICK F. LOW, Esq.

WASHINGTON, August 24, 1871. (Received August 25.)

SIR: In compliance with instructions which I have received from Earl Granville, I have the honor to transmit a copy of a draught of a dispatch which Her Majesty's government propose to address to Mr. Wade, Her Majesty's minister in China, respecting the circular of the Chinese government on the subject of religious missions in that empire.

I have, &c.,

F. J. PAKENHAM.

FOREIGN OFFICE, August, 1871.

SIR: Her Majesty's government have hitherto abstained from offering any observations upon the circular of the Chinese government on the subject of religious missions, of which a translation has been communicated to them by the French chargé d'affaires, in the expectation that they might have received some reports from you regarding it. As, however, they learn from your telegraphic dispatches that it will be some time before they are in possession of your views, they consider that they cannot allow this important paper to remain longer unnoticed, and I have accordingly now to state to you the impression which has been made by it upon Her Majesty's government.

Her Majesty's government must, in the first place, protest against the general assertions contained in the circular and accompanying regulations with regard to missionary enterprise in China, no distinction being made between the proceedings of missionaries over whom Her Majesty's government have no control, and of the British missionaries for whose actions alone Great Britain be held responsible. They must moreover remark that of the instances of alleged abuses cited, there is not one which [is] in any way connected with any British missionary establishment.

Her Majesty's government might accordingly have contented themselves with replying to the Chinese government that the circular did not allege any complaint against British subjects, and that they could not enter a discussion of matters not directly affecting the relations between Great Britain and China.

Her Majesty's government do not, however, desire to lay too much stress upon the point. They believe it to be the common interest and desire of all the governments having treaties with China, to co-operate with the government of the empire in maintaining the relations between China and their respective countries on the most friendly footing, and Her Majesty's government will always be ready to consider any representations which the government of China may have to offer with that object.

On the particular question to which the circular relates, the policy and practice of the government of Great Britain have been unmistakable. They have uniformly declared, and now repeat, that they do not claim to afford any species of protection to Chinese Christians which may be construed as withdrawing them from their native allegiance, nor do they desire to secure to British missionaries any privileges or immunities beyond those granted by treaty to other British subjects. The bishop of Victoria was requested to intimate this to the Protestant missionary societies, in the letter addressed to him by Mr. Hammond, by the Earl of Clarendon's direction, on November 13, 1869, and to point out that they would "do well to warn converts that, although the Chinese government may be bound by treaty not to persecute, on account of their conversion, Chinese subjects who may embrace Christianity, there is no provision in the treaty by which a claim can be made, on behalf of converts, for exemption from the obligations of their natural allegiance, and from the jurisdiction of the local authorities. Under the creed of their adoption, as under that of their birth, Chinese converts to Christianity still owe obedience to the law of China, and if they assume to set themselves above those laws in reliance upon foreign protection, they must take the consequences of their own indiscretion, for no British authority, at all events, can interfere to save them."

On the other hand, Her Majesty's government cannot forget that the free exercise of the Christian religion in China is stipulated for by the eighth article of the treaty of June 26, 1858, which states that "the Christian religion, as professed by Protestants or Roman Catholics, inculcates the practice of virtue, and teaches man to do as he would be done by. Persons teaching or professing it, therefore, alike shall be entitled to the protection of the Chinese authorities; nor shall any such, peaceably pursuing their calling and not offending the laws, be persecuted or interfered with."

Her Majesty's government, therefore, although they have given it to be most distinctly understood that conversion to Christianity gives no title to British protection against the operations of the laws of the land, could not be indifferent to the persecution of Christians for professing the Christian faith.

The impracticable nature of the regulations proposed by the Chinese government has been so convincingly shown in the note from Mr. Low, the representative of the United States to the Yamen, on the 20th of March last, that it is unnecessary for Her Majesty's government to do more than refer to some of the principal objections to their acceptance.

The first regulation does not apply to the British missionary societies, as they do not support any orphanages in China. Her Majesty's government could not obviously accede to regulations which they had no power to enforce. If the missionaries of other countries have conducted such institutions in a manner to give just cause of suspicion to the people of China, Her Majesty's government feel no doubt that, on a proper representation being made of the facts, the cause of complaint will be removed, but they cannot admit that such an atrocious crime as the massacre at Tien-tsin can be excused by ascribing it to the prejudices of the ignorant.

The second regulation requires that woman ought no longer to enter churches, nor should Sisters of Charity live in China to teach religion. The objection to woman frequenting the Christian churches has, Her Majesty's government understand, been met at Fatschau and elsewhere by a screen having been erected to divide the sexes. To prevent woman altogether from attending divine worship would be in violation of the freedom of religion provided in the treaty, and would be contrary to the fundamental principles of Christianity. As the Chinese government are most probably aware, there are no Sisters of Charity attached to the British missionary societies; but Her Majesty's government could not countenance any regulation which would cast a slur upon a sisterhood whose blameless lives and noble acts of devotion in the cause of humanity are known throughout the world.

The third and fourth articles, as respects Chinese Christians, have already been dealt with in the preceding part of this dispatch, but Her Majesty's government cannot allow the claim that the missionaries residing in China must conform to the laws and customs of China to pass unchallenged. It is the duty of a missionary, as of every other British subject, to avoid giving offense, as far as possible, to the Chinese authorities and people, but he does not forfeit the rights to which he is entitled under the treaty as a British subject because of his missionary character.

The fifth article seems to be directed against French missionaries.

The ninth article of the British treaty contains provisions to prevent any abuses of passports borne by British subjects, and no passports are granted by British diplomatic or consular authorities to persons not of British nationality.

In this regulation, as in the third, fourth, and fifth, mention is made of occurrences in Sze-chuen. Her Majesty's government have urged upon the Chinese government the expediency of their opening this province to foreign trade, and establishing a port there at which foreign consuls should reside. If the statements which have been made to the government of Peking with regard to the irregular proceedings of foreign missionaries and their converts are well founded, the Chinese Government would do well to consider whether the presence of foreign consular authorities is not required to control the improper or ill-directed exercise of the treaty privileges conferred on their countrymen.

Her Majesty's government believe that there are no British Protestant missionary establishments in Sze-chuen, but it is impossible to prevent enterprising persons penetrating through a country. Sooner or later they will find their way, and the true interest of China is to facilitate rather than to restrict the flow of foreign enterprise, and to direct it in the manner most advantageous to that mutually beneficial commercial intercourse on which the prosperity and happiness of nations so largely depend.

Besides showing, as Mr. Low has pointed out, a complete misconception of the nature of the Christian religion, the sixth regulation is open to the objection that by constituting the Christians in China a class separated from the rest of the population, it would lead to the very evil of which it is the desire of the Chinese government to get rid, as the Christians would inevitably regard that separation as conferring on them privileges for the maintenance of which they must trust to the protection of the powers in whose treaties with China the freedom of the Christian religion is provided for.

The seventh regulation calls for no special observation.

The eighth regulation does not apply to British missionaries who have no ecclesiastical property in China to reclaim, and seems to refer to misunderstandings with regard to the operation of the sixth article of the treaty with France of October 25, 1860.

Her Majesty's government trust that the Chinese government will not suppose that in withholding their assent to these regulations they are actuated by any other motive than the wish to avoid embarrassing a question, already of sufficient difficulty, by cumbersome and impracticable regulations.

The remedy for the alleged assumption of missionaries of a protective jurisdiction over native Christians, which constitute the gist of the accusations brought forward in the circular and regulations, appears to Her Majesty's government to be sufficiently afforded by the treaties.

If British missionaries behave improperly they should "be handed over to the nearest consul for punishment," like other British subjects, as provided in the ninth article of the treaty of Tien-tsin. If the local authorities consider that Her Majesty's consuls do not in any instance afford redress for their complaints they can appeal through the government at Peking to Her Majesty's minister in the ordinary course of international usage. Both Her Majesty's minister and consuls have extensive powers for maintaining the peace, order, and good government of Her Majesty's subjects in China, and if those powers should be proved to be inadequate, Her Majesty's government would readily increase them, but until it can be proved that Her Majesty's minister and consuls are unable to control Her Majesty's subjects in China by the exercise of the powers confided to them, Her Majesty's government must decline to supplement the existing treaties by regulations which, although only intended to deal with a particular class of British subjects, would undoubtedly subject the whole British community in China to a constant interference in their intercourse with the native population of a most vexatious description.

CIRCULAR OF THE CHINESE GOVERNMENT, ON THE SUBJECT OF MISSIONARIES; COMMUNICATED BY THE FRENCH CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES.

Note from the Yamén on the subject of Missions.

[Extracted from British Blue Book, "China, No. 3, 1871," as translated into French and from French into English.]

[Translation.]

The object which the powers and China had before them originally in signing treaties was to establish a permanent situation which would insure them reciprocal advantages and remove abuses. However, the experience of the last few years has demonstrated that not only do these treaties not attain this desired end of permanency, but also that, up to the present time, they are difficult to carry into execution. Trade has in no degree occasioned differences between China and the powers. The same cannot be said of the missions, which engender ever-increasing abuses. Although in the first instance it may have been declared that the primary object of the missions was to exhort men to virtue, Catholicism, in causing vexation to the people, has produced a contrary effect in China. [This regrettable result] is solely attributable to the inefficacy of the plan of action [followed in this matter.] It is, therefore, urgent that steps should be taken to remedy this evil and to search for a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. In fact, this question is one bearing upon those which influence the leading interests of the peace of nations, as well as those of their trade, which are equally considerable. Wherever the Catholic missionaries have appeared they have drawn upon themselves the animadversion of the people, and your excellency is not ignorant that cases which have arisen during the course of several years embraced points of disagreement of every kind.

The first Catholic missionaries who established themselves in China were called "litterates (lettrés) of the West." The greater part of the conversions took place at that time among respectable people. On the other hand, since the conclusion of the treaties took place, (1860,) the majority of the converts are persons without virtue; so that that religion, whose object is to exhort men to virtue, no longer enjoys any consideration. From that moment consciences have become a prey to uneasiness. The Christians have none the less continued, under the shadow of missionary influence, to mislead and oppress the people; thence arose renewed uneasiness, then quarrels between Christians and non-Christians, and, at last, disturbances. The authorities proceed to investigate the affair; the missionaries make common cause with the Christians, and support them in their insubordination against the same authorities. Thereupon the feeling of disquiet which pervades the people assumes greater proportions. Yet more; veteran rebels, beyond the pale of the law, amateurs in intrigue, seek a refuge in the church, and lean upon her influence in order to commit disorders. At this moment the animosity of the people, already deep, degenerates gradually into a hate which, at length, reaches its paroxysm. The people in general, unaware of the difference which exists between Protestantism and Catholicism, confound these two religions under this latter denomination. They do not grasp the distinction which should be made between the different nations of which Europe is composed, and give to Europeans the generic name of "men from without;" so that, when troubles break out, foreigners residing in China are all exposed to the same dangers. Even in the provinces where conflicts have not yet taken place, uneasiness and suspicion will certainly appear among the people. Is not such a state of things of a nature to occasion a lively feeling of irritation, and, as a result, grave disorders? The differences which exist between the religious and the nationalities are truths which still are beyond the comprehension of the masses, in spite of the constant efforts which have been exerted in order to make them appreciate their nature. The prince and the members of the Yamén, during the ten years in which they have been at the head of affairs, have been a prey to incessant anxiety. These precautions have been justified by the events at Tien-tsin, the suddenness of which was overwhelming. The proceedings against the functionaries [compromised] have been begun, the murderers have suffered capital punishment, an indemnity has been paid, and relief given; but, although the affair may to-day be almost settled, the prince and the members of the Yamén cannot throw off the uneasiness which they feel. In fact, if this policy is the only one on which one can rely [to settle] the differences between Christians and non-Christians, it will become more precarious in proportion to the necessity there will be to recur to it oftener, and the disorders like those of Tien-tsin will be repeated more terribly each time. If the question is looked at under its present aspect, the question is, how is it possible to be on good terms and to live on either side in peace? It is not only to the hatred engendered by the suppressed animosities of the people, but decidedly also to the provocations of the Christians, that the conflicts on the missionary question which arise in these provinces must be attributed. If, on one side, these conflicts may have been brought about by the relative incapacity of the local administration, they can certainly also be attributed to the conduct of the high Chinese and European functionaries charged with the direction of affairs, [affecting the two countries,] who, knowing the want of conciliation in the attitude of the missionaries and Christians, show no good will in seeking for the means of remedying the evil.

With regard to the Europeans, they only aim at getting rid of the difficulties of the moment, without troubling themselves whether by so doing consciences are disturbed; to employ coercion is all that is thought of. On the other hand, the local authorities have only one object, that of bringing the matter to a close. Care for the future goes for nothing in this short-sighted policy. But if we seek, in concert with the Europeans, to secure by efficacious means a really lasting understanding, we do not find among these latter the desire to found the discussion on equitable bases. When this discussion arises, they place before us unacceptable means which they wish to impose on us by force, in order to be able to put a stop to the matter. That is, in truth, not the good and true way to take care of the interests of the two countries. Anxious about the whole matter, and sincerely desirous that concord and peace should reign forever between China and Europe, the prince and the members of the Yamén are bound to seek the best means to secure this result. Their belief is, that there are ecclesiastics everywhere in Europe, and that their presence abroad is there without danger to good harmony. The maintenance of this happy state of things is, doubtless, due to the employment of certain means, and to this fact, that ecclesiastics and Christians abstain from provoking conflicts. The prince and the members of the Yamén have heard that these same ecclesiastics, to whatever nationality they might belong, respected the law and customs of the country where they dwelt; that they were not allowed to constitute in them a kind of exceptional independence for themselves: and that the faults of every kind, such as contraventions of the law, insubordination towards the authority of functionaries, abuses and usurpations of powers, acts prejudicial to the reputation of people, and oppressive towards the people which provoke its suspicions and its resentment, are there severely repressed. If the missionaries, before constructing the religious establishments in China, and preaching their doctrine there, avoided making themselves odious to the principal men and people, the suspicions would disappear to give place to a mutual confidence, concord would be permanent; one would not see churches destroyed and religion attacked. If these same missionaries, in pursuit of their work, could inspire in the masses the conviction that their acts are not opposed to their teaching; if, remaining deaf to the instigations of the Christians, they avoided, by denying themselves, all interference in the local administration, giving the support of their influence to arbitrary and oppressive acts which engender hatred among the notables and the people, they might live in perfect harmony with the people, and the functionaries would be in a position to protect them. Far different is the conduct of the persons who now come to China to propagate therein the Christian religion. From the information which the prince and the Yamén have gathered, (respecting the duties imposed upon them by their priesthood,) these persons found as it were among us an undetermined number of states within the state. How, under these conditions, can we hope that a durable understanding should be established, and to prevent the governors and the governed uniting against them in common hostility?

The prince and the members of the Yamén are impressed with the desire to ward off from henceforth eventualities so menacing. In fact, they fear in all sincerity lest, after the arrangement of the Tien-tsin affair, the animosity of the ignorant Christians of the empire should take a more decided tone of insolent bluster, that the bitterness of the popular resentment should increase, and that so much accumulated bad feeling, causing a sudden explosion, should bring about a catastrophe. It would then be no longer possible for the local authorities, nor for the high provincial functionaries, nor even for the Tsung-li Yamén, to assert their authority. In the event of a general rising in China, the Emperor will be able to appoint high dignitaries to order them to assemble everywhere imposing forces; but the greatest rigor does not reach the masses, and when their anger manifests itself, there are persons who refuse to yield their heads to the executioner. Then, when the evil becomes irremediable, and when the wish we all have to preserve so great interests will no longer be effectual, the men who direct the international affairs of China and of Europe will not be suffered to decline the responsibility which falls on them. In short, in the direction of affairs, the important point in China as in Europe is to satisfy opinion. If, failing in this duty, oppression and violence are employed, a general rising will at last take place. There are moments when the supreme authority is disregarded. If the high functionaries of China and the Europeans, on whom rests the responsibility of the affairs which now form the object of our anxiety, remaining unmoved spectators of a situation which threatens the greatest danger to the Chinese people, as well as to strangers, traders, and individuals, make no effort to find a solution which may effectually remedy the evil, it will follow that it will be out of their power to deal in a satisfactory manner with the matters which interest the public. Consequently, with the view of protecting the great interests of general peace, and of remedying the abuses above pointed out, the prince and the members of the Yamén have the honor to submit, for your excellency's examination, a plan of regulation in eight articles, which has also been communicated to the representatives of other powers.

DRAUGHT OF REGULATIONS.

[From British Blue Book "China, No. 3, 1871."]

[Translation.]

ARTICLE 1. The Christians, when they found an orphanage, give no notice to the authorities, and appear to act with mystery; hence the suspicions and hatred of the people. In ceasing to receive children, the evil rumors which are now in circulation would at the same time disappear. If, however, there is a wish to continue this work, only the children of necessitous Christians must be received, and then the authorities ought to be informed, who would note the day on which the child entered, the name of its parents, and the day on which it left. It would also be necessary that power should be given to strangers to adopt these children, and then a good result would be arrived at. Lastly, when it is a question of non-Christian children, the high officials ought to give orders to the local authorities, who should select proper agents who could take all the measures which appeared suitable to them.

In China the laws which regulate orphanages are, that on the entrance and on the departure of the children note is made of the person who leaves them, or of the person who adopts them, of the declaration made to the authorities, and of the permission given to the parents to visit their children. When they have become bigger, they may be adopted by some one having no children, or taken back by the parents themselves, and then, no matter in what religion they have been brought up, they return to the religion of their fathers. The child ought in everything also to be treated well. In exercising this work of charity, it becomes a most worthy work.

We have heard it said that in every country matters are conducted in this respect very nearly as in China. How does it happen that once arrived in our country foreigners no longer follow these customs? They take no note of the family to which the child belongs, and they do not give notice to the authorities. Once the child has entered the house other persons are not allowed to adopt it, nor are the parents permitted to take it back again, nor even to visit it. All this nourishes suspicions and excites the hatred of the people, and by degrees a case like that of Tien-tsin is arrived at. Although we have denied in a report all those rumors of the tearing out of eyes and hearts, the people, however, still preserve doubts on the subject, and even if we succeed in closing their lips we cannot drive away these doubts from their minds. It is this kind of uneasiness which gives rise to terrible events. It would be a good thing to abolish the foreign orphanages, and to transport them to Europe, where they could practice their charity at their ease; it would then belong to the Chinese to come to the aid of these children. Besides, in every province we have numerous orphanages, and yet the foreigners wish to lend us at any price an assistance of which we have not the slightest need. It is certainly with good intentions they thus act; but it is not the less true that their conduct produces suspicion and excites anger. It would be far preferable if each one exercised his charity in his own country, and then no lamentable event could arise.

ARTICLE 2. Women ought no longer to enter the churches, nor should Sisters of Charity live in China to teach religion. This measure will only render the Christians more respectable, and will result in silencing evil rumors.

In China a good reputation and modesty are most important matters; men and women are not even allowed to shake hands nor to live together; there ought to be a kind of line of separation which cannot be overstepped. After the treaty full liberty was given to the Christians, and then men and women went together to church; hence rumors among the public. There are some places even where men and women are together not only at church, but also in the interior of the house. The public, looking at this in a light manner, harbors suspicions, and thinks that things contrary to propriety take place.

ARTICLE 3. The missionaries residing in China must conform to the laws and customs of China. They are not permitted to place themselves in a kind of exceptional independence, to show themselves recalcitrant to the authority of the government and of the officials, to attribute to themselves powers which do not belong to them, to injure the reputation of men, to oppress the people, to asperse the doctrine of Confucius, by which they give ground for the suspicions, the resentments, and the indignation of the masses. The missionaries must submit themselves, like everybody, to the authority of the local officials; and the Christian Chinese must, in every case, be treated according to the common law; with the exception of the expenses of theatrical solemnities, and of the worship of local protecting divinities from which they are dispensed from contributing to, the Christians cannot escape the requisitions and forced labor, and are constrained to accept, like everybody else, the charges imposed by the local administration. With stronger reason they cannot refuse to pay, in their integrity, the land taxes and the rents; nor can the missionaries advise them and support them in infringing the common law. Cases for litigation between Christians and non-Christians are under the equitable jurisdiction of the authorities, and cannot be left to the patronage of the missionaries. The latter cannot keep away from the courts Christians, prosecutors or defendants, which, in a trial, leads to delays and prejudices the parties interested. In the case in which missionaries allow themselves to be mixed up in affairs beyond their province, the local authorities ought to send their verbal or written communications to the high provincial functionaries, who will refer them in their turn to the Tsung-li Yamèn, in order that a decision may be eventually taken as to the repatriation of these same missionaries. In the case where Christians, in suits respecting matrimonial alliances or property in land, plume themselves upon their position of Christians to invoke the intervention of the missionaries, they will be severely punished by the authorities.

China honors the religion of Confucius; that of Buddha and of Tao, as well as the doctrine of Lamae, is also professed there. Therefore, it is contrary to usage that the latter, although they may not be Chinese, should ignore the decisions of the Chinese authorities by approving or blaming them. We hear it said that the missionaries in foreign countries are subject to the legislation of the country in which they live, and that they are forbidden to make themselves independent, to contravene the law, to usurp authority, to attack the character of people or to prejudice them, or to arouse the suspicion and the resentment of the people. Similarly the missionaries who teach their religion in China ought to submit themselves to the authority of the magistrates of this country; nevertheless they are vauntingly independent, and do not recognize the authority of the officials. Do they not thus place themselves without the pale of the law? The Christians in China remain Chinese subjects, and are only the more constrained to remain faithful to their duties. In no case can a difference be established between them and the rest of the nation. The Christians in the towns and in the country ought to live in good harmony with their fellow-countrymen. Yet, in matters affecting the public when popular subscriptions are opened or forced labor required, they put forward their position as Christians to escape these burdens. They themselves create an exception, [in their favor.] How avoid that the rest of the nation accept this exception, [against them?] Yet more, they refuse the taxes and forced labor, they intimidate the officials, they oppress those who do not belong to their religion. The foreign missionaries do not fully understand the situation; not only do they give an asylum to Christians who are guilty of crimes, and refuse to deliver them up to justice, but they also consent to protect unjustly those who have only become converts because they have committed some crime. In the provinces the missionaries make themselves the advocates before the local authorities of the Christians who have suits. Witness that Christian woman of Sze-chuen who exacted from her tenants payments of a nature which were not due to her, and ultimately committed a murder. A French bishop took upon himself to address a dispatch to the authorities in order to plead for this woman, and procured her acquittal. This deed aroused animosities among the people of Sze-chuen, which have lasted to this day. In the Kwei-chow, Christians who go to law style themselves Christians "in the charge sheet," ("acte d'accusation,") with the sole view of gaining their cause. This is a well-known abuse. It happens also that two families being united by matrimonial ties, one is converted to Christianity, then compels the other, who is not converted, to break off the alliance. Among people of the same blood, one has seen fathers and elder brothers, after having been converted, lay an accusation for non-fulfillment of family duties against their children and younger brothers, for the sole reason that these latter had refused to be converted. These acts are encouraged by the missionaries. Are not such practices of a nature to excite to the highest degree the popular indignation?

ARTICLE 4. Chinese and foreigners living together ought to be governed by the same laws. For example, if a man kills another he ought to be punished, if a Chinaman, according to the Chinese law; if he is a foreigner, according to the law of his country. In thus acting, order will reign; it matters little the manner in which the Chinese or the foreigners treat the case, a punishment is all that is necessary. But that punishment once inflicted, they must not come and claim indemnities, and above all they must not seek the soi-disant abettor of the crime to exact from him a certain sum. It belongs to the local authorities to adjudicate on the differences which may arise between the Christians and the people. If it is a Pagan who has committed wrongs against a Christian, he ought to be punished more or less severely, according to the gravity of the fault; similarly if it is a question of a Christian accused by a Pagan. The official ought to adjudicate with the most perfect justice and the greatest impartiality.

If a Christian conducts himself altogether contrary to the laws, the local authority takes evidence; and if some one accuses this Christian, the latter is seized and judged. But the missionaries must not then come forward to defend him and to exculpate him. If the case arises of a missionary preventing a Christian giving himself up to the commands of the authority, the Christian alone ought not to be punished, but also the missionary, or at least he ought to be sent back to his own country.

In the sixth year of the reign of Tung Chih, a missionary, M. Mahileau, was killed in the Sze-chuen. The murderer, named Jan Lao-won, was arrested, and condemned to death. But besides that, M. Mihieres accused a man who formed part of the class of literates ("lettrés") of having been the instigator of that murder, in order to exact from him an indemnity of 80,000 taels.

The individuals who commit disorders ordinarily belong to the lowest class of the people. When they are guilty of some crime, they are seized and punished; but accusations ought not to be brought against the literates ("lettrés") to exact from them large indemnities. Such conduct excites hatred.

In the eighth year of the reign of Tung Chih, a missionary, M. Rigaud, was killed in the Sze-chuen; the cause of the murder was an alliance between two families, which fell through. Tchung Tiang-tune and Ly Tchoun-tang judged this case. They caused the murderer of M. Rigaud to be arrested, a man named Ho-tsai, and the murderer of a Christian named Lion-fou, both belonging to the lowest class. One was condemned to have his head cut off, the other to be hanged. The Christians further killed some of the people; every year there were conflicts between creditors and debtors, rapes, and fires.

The instigators of all this were Wang Shue-ting, Tchang Tien-shin, and others. It was desired to seize and punish them, but they did not surrender themselves to the commands of the authority. Further, the Christians again, under the leadership of a priest named Tan Fou-tchen, killed Tchao Yung-lin, and 200 other persons. The surrender of this missionary was demanded; but the Abbé Mibières said that he had left for Europe, and that there was no means of arranging this case. Hence great anger among the inhabitants of Sze-chuen.

ARTICLE 5. The passports given to the French missionaries who penetrate into the interior ought clearly to bear mention of the province and of the prefecture where they intend to repair. The names and titles of the bearer, and these conditions, that he will not be able clandestinely to betake himself to another province, and that the passport is personal, will be equally comprised in this document. The missionary ought not to pass through the custom-house and toll-bar contraband articles of merchandise which are liable to duty. On his arrival at a destination other than that designated in the passport, or if this document has been handed over to a Christian Chinaman with the object of making him pass himself off as a missionary, the said passport shall be canceled. On the other hand, if it be ascertained that the bearer has gained possession of it by pecuniary payment, or that he has committed some other serious breach of the law, the individual who shall have thus falsely assumed the position of a missionary shall be punished, and the real missionary shall be sent back to his own country. In order that the control may be exercised everywhere, the name of the missionary shall be inserted in the passport, in Chinese characters, which will be taken as proof. The passport shall be canceled in cases where the titular should have gone back to his own country, should have died, or should have abandoned missionary work. Passports will not be granted in the provinces where there are rebels, nor even hereafter for those where the imperial army is operating, with the evident object of securing loyally the safeguard of the missionaries.

In support of the above scheme the Yamén will recall a missionary case which occurred in the Kwei-chow, where a certain Tchao acted as missionary, albeit his name had no place in the passport register. The Yamén received a letter on this subject from Mr. Interpreter Deveria, in which the latter showed how, according to an old French register, the murdered missionary Tchao had received a passport, dated the 2d day of the 6th month of the 4th year of Tong-che, in which he was called Joué-lo-sse; that this name of Tchao was erroneous; that the victim was really the said Joué-lo-sse; that, on the other hand, the same Joué-lo-sse was inserted under No. 325 as going to Sze-chuen, and thence to Kwei-chow. However, the Yamén was able to convince itself that neither this name of Tchao nor that of Joué-lo-sse figured on its passport register. There was, therefore, a double mistake in the name of the missionary and in that of his residence. How, then, could one establish an identity and secure to the party interested efficacious protection?

There was also an affair of murder committed by the missionary Spingaert on the person of a Russian. This Spingaert was first of all a missionary, then entered the Prussian legation as constable. He none the less retained his passport, so that he handed it over to some one else, or lost it, so that not only an abuse, in passing as a missionary, occurred, but grave inconveniences to public affairs might have arisen in case the said passport had fallen into the hands of the rebels. On the other hand, the dignity of missionaries seems to us to be seriously injured by such irregularities.

ARTICLE 6. The aim of the missionaries being to exhort men to virtue, it is befitting that, before admitting an individual to the privileges of religion, he should be examined as to whether he has undergone any sentence or committed any crime. If the examination be in his favor he may become a Christian; if the contrary, he should not be allowed to become one. One ought, moreover, to act as the ministers of our religion do, who give notice to the inspectors of the ten families, and cause the name of the person to be entered in the register with this purpose. In the same way the missionaries ought to give notice to the authorities, who will take note of the day of the month and of the year of admittance, of the country, and of the station in life of the individual, and will ascertain if he has ever undergone any sentence, or if he has ever changed his name. By acting thus all confusion will be avoided. If a Christian should be sent on a mission, and he should die on the way, notice should be given to the proper authority. If, after being converted, a person commits some crime, he should be dismissed, and no longer regarded as belonging to the religion. Every month, or at least every three months, the authorities ought to be informed of the number or conversions. The authorities, also, should act as they do in regard to our temples, that is to say, they should go every month, or at least every three months, to inspect the missions. This course will do no harm to religion, but, on the contrary, will insure tranquillity.

In the ninth year of the reign of Tung-Chih, the government of the Kwei-chow gave notice to the Yamén that at Kwei-ting-shien some people, who were formerly nothing better than thieves, were forming a part of a militia of which the Christians, Yen Yushing and Lia Tchang-shine, were the leaders. Passing themselves off as Christians these men were highly thought of; however, they committed all sorts of disturbances killed Wang Tiang-pao and Tsouo-ing-ho, seriously wounded three other persons, and carried off from the houses not only money, but also all the objects which they contained, even down to the very cattle. In the eighth year of the reign of Tung-Chih, the governor of Kwei-chow again warned our Yamén that at Tsoun-i-shien a petition had been addressed, with the object of declaring that some rebels, of whom the leaders were Soung Yu-chan, Tang Cheun-hien, Tang Yen-chony, Tien Yuen-yuen, had embraced the Catholic religion, and that they still continued within and without the town to stir up indescribable and countless disturbances and troubles. In the same place also some people named Yang Shi-pouo, Lion Kai-wen, Chang Shioo-ning, Hono Wen-tieon, Tehao Wen-gan, had embraced the Catholic religion; and were even employed in the interior of the mission. However, outside, they practiced all sorts of exactions upon the orphans, and intimidated those who were poor in spirit. They went perpetually to the Yamén, and undertook to regulate the trials. In an affair between a Christian and a countryman, if the mandarin administered justice to the latter, they collected the Christians, invaded the Yamén, and forced the authorities to reverse the sentence. If, in spite of that, the mandarin would not give the Christian up to them, they returned with the card of a missionary, and claimed on his behalf the liberty of their friend. Besides, they committed all sorts of attempts upon persons and properties; if resistance was offered them they struck blows and did not even fear to kill, and were guilty, besides, of many other crimes.

ARTICLE 7. The missionaries ought to observe Chinese customs, and to deviate from them in no respect; for instance, they ought not to make use of seals, the use of which is reserved for functionaries alone. It is not allowed them to send dispatches to a Yamén, whatever may be their importance. If, however, for an urgent matter it should be absolutely necessary to write, they may do it; but taking good care not to speak of matters beyond the subject, and making use, like people belonging to the class of literates, of the Sing-tieh, (petition.) When the missionaries visit a great mandarin, they must observe the same ceremonies as those exacted from the literates; if they visit a mandarin of inferior rank, they must also conform to the customary ceremonies. They must not unceremoniously go into the Yaméns and bring disorder and confusion into the affair.

In the sixth year of the reign of Tung-Chih, the governor of the Sze-chuen wrote to us that the French bishop, Monseigneur Pluchon, had, in a letter which he sent to the authorities, made use of an official seal manufactured by himself.

In the seventh year of the reign of Tung-Chih, Monseigneur Faurie, bishop of the Kwei-chow, handed to the officer charged with the remission of the letters of the government a dispatch to the address of the Yamén to ask that marks of distinction should be accorded to a Taoutae, called Toun-Wen, and to other persons besides.

In the Chan-tung a missionary presented himself off as Sinn-fou, (provincial governor.)

In Sze-chuen and Kwei-chow missionaries took upon themselves to demand the recall of mandarins who had not arranged their affairs to their satisfaction. So it is not only the authority of simple functionaries that they assume; they claim, further, a power which the sovereign alone possesses. After such acts how could general indignation fail to be aroused?

ARTICLE 8. Missionaries shall not be allowed to claim, as belonging to the church, the property which it may please them to designate; in this way no difficulty will arise. If the missionaries wish to buy a portion of land on which to build a church, or hire a house in which to take up their residence, they must, before concluding the bargain, go with the real proprietor and make a declaration to the local authority, who will examine whether the Tung-Chony presents any obstacle. If the official decides that no inconvenience arises for the Tung-Chony, it will then be necessary to ask the consent of the inhabitants of the place. These two formalities fulfilled, it will be necessary besides, in the text of the contract, to follow the ruling published in the fourth year of the reign of Tong-tche, that is to say, to declare that the land belongs with full rights to Chinese Christians. It will not be allowed in the purchase of properties to make a transfer making use of another name than that of the real purchaser; it will also be forbidden to make this transfer in a manner contrary to law, following the advice of dishonest people.

The missionaries residing constantly in China must strive to inspire confidence, so as not to excite the discontent and aversion of the people; but, on the contrary, to live on good terms with them without ever exciting suspicion. At this moment there is almost always discord between the two parties, and the cause of it is the conduct of the Christians. So as regards the property of the church there have been claims during these last years in all the provinces, and the missionaries exact the restitution without troubling themselves as to whether it wounds the susceptibility of the people or is injurious to their interests. Besides there are fine houses belonging to the literates that they claim and expel the proprietor from them at the shortest notice. But what is worse, and what wounds the dignity of the people, is that they often claim as their property Yaméns, places of assembly, temples held in high respect by the literates and the inhabitants of the neighborhood.

Certainly, in each province are houses which formerly belonged to the church; but note must be taken of the number of years which have passed since, and it must be remembered that Christians sold these houses, and that they have, perhaps, passed through the hands of several proprietors. It must also be considered that the house was, perhaps, old and dilapidated when sold, and that the purchaser has, perhaps, incurred great expense in repairs, or has even built a new one. The missionaries take no account of all this; they exact the restitution, and do not even offer the least indemnity. Sometimes they even ask for repairs to be made, or if not, for a sum of money. Such conduct excites the indignation of the people, who look with no favorable eye on the missionaries. Such being the case no friendship can exist.

The facts which are stated in this memorandum have been chosen as examples among many others to demonstrate what is irregular in the acts of the missionaries, and to prove the impossibility of Christians and non-Christians living harmoniously.

It is urgent, therefore, to seek a remedy for the evil; both one and the other will find it to their advantage, and it will obviate this sole question of the missions becoming fatal to the great interests of peace between China and the West.

We do not attempt to enumerate the many matters which are agitating in the provinces. The object is to separate the tares from the good grain, to punish the wicked in the interest of the good. With respect to commerce, for instance, merchants guilty of dishonesty are severely punished in order to protect the honor of commerce in general. From the time that the missionaries admit every one, without taking care to distinguish between the good and the bad, these last pour into the Christian community and support themselves on the missionaries to molest people of property, and despise the authority of the magistrates. Under these conditions the resentment of the multitude grows deep. If the entire Chinese people should, like the inhabitants of Tien-tsin, come to detest foreigners, the supreme authority itself could no longer be able to interpose efficaciously. Such are the dangers which the present situation implies.

The rules which we now propose are the last expression of our firm will to protect the missionaries, and have nothing in their import hostile to them. If they sincerely endeavor to conform themselves to them, good harmony might be maintained; if, on the other hand, the missionaries consider these same rules in the light of attempts upon their independence, or contrary to their rites, they may cease to preach their religion in China. The Chinese government treats its Christian and its non-Christian subjects on a footing of perfect equality; that is the evident proof that it is not opposed to the work of the missions. In return, the missionaries, allowing themselves to be duped by the Christians, do not adhere faithfully to their duties. From this state of things a hatred of the masses must result, which it will be very difficult to combat, and a general overthrow of order, which will make all protection an impossibility. It would be far better from henceforth to speak the truth frankly.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE GENERAL,
Shanghai, August 22, 1871. (Received Oct. 23.)

SIR: On the 21st of June, 1870, occurred the massacre at Tien-tsin. The consul for France at that port, the vice-consul the interpreter of the French legation at Peking, and his wife, a Roman Catholic priest, nine Sisters of Charity, a French subject engaged in trade, and his wife, and three Russians (one a lady) were most barbarously murdered. It has been asserted also that very many Chinese connected with the consulate, the Catholic cathedral, the hospital for native children under the control of the Sisters of Charity, and with various mercantile establishments were similarly sacrificed.

It is important to know the causes which led to the massacre, the circumstances which attended it, and the course pursued by the government toward the offenders. Such knowledge will throw light on the Chinese character and the condition of the Chinese mind, and it will instruct us how to deal with this imperfectly known people. History, it is said, repeats itself. If the massacre was the result of causes which are still operative, we may see a renewal of its horrors. It stands out in the course of our relations with China with dread prominence. It should be made a beacon of warning.

To the citizens of Western states the Chinese people offer a complete riddle. They are pronounced by some observers the most peaceful and industrious race under the sun. By others they are declared to be crafty, rapacious, and cruel. One person gives them a foremost place among the nations, and predicts that a few years will correct the slight evils which exist in their system. Another holds that their nationality is decayed and their stock worn out; that they are too far gone to accept ameliorations of their religion or policy. To many they seem possessed of a chief share of the wealth of the world, which is described as having flowed to their shore for centuries. Others say that their towns and cities are squalid, and that beggary is seen on all sides. One is of opinion that education is so universally diffused that there is scarcely a man in the empire who cannot read and write. Another proclaims that they are groveling in depths of ignorance and superstition.

Mr. Burlingame, with that wealth of generosity which characterized him, nourished in his imagination the more attractive qualities of the Chinese. There was so much that was exalted and honorable in his views, so much that touched the generous sentiments of the age, so much withal that was true and capable of demonstration, that he aroused the enthusiasm of our people. He was only less successful in Great Britain, in North Germany, and in Russia. France alone distrusted him and his client, profoundly and consistently.

But even while the wandering eloquent envoy was pursuing his mission, news of outrages committed in widely separated parts of the empire threw discredit upon his representations. He was only a few months in his grave when the news of the fearful tragedy at Tien-tsin was flashed to the ends of the earth. During the next few months the items of information received from China contained indications that the Government was preparing for war; that further outrages were greatly feared, and some minor ones actually committed; that redress at Tien-tsin was tardy and inefficient. A little later reports were published that the government had put out a decree intended to expel missionaries from the interior of the empire, and to hamper their efforts at the ports. The last effects of Mr. Burlingame's glowing statements were then effaced, and an impression left that the Chinese entertained an unyielding, bitter hatred of foreigners.

Where, then, shall the mind rest when it contemplates the Chinese qualities and disposition, the future of foreign intercourse and of the empire. The prevailing tendency among foreigners in China is to debase the Chinese to a very low place in the scale of nations, to belittle their intellectual capacity, to condemn their morals, to declare them destitute of vitality and energy. Each person who argues the case finds facts ready for his use which seem to him to demonstrate his own particular view.

I confess that the case is different with me. Faith in the race is a matter of intuition with me. I find here a steady adherence to the traditions of the past, a sober devotion to the calls arising in the various relations of life, an absence of shiftlessness, an honest and at least somewhat earnest grappling with the necessities and difficulties which beset men in their humbler stages of progress, a capacity to moralize withal, an enduring sense of right and wrong. These all form what must be considered an essentially satisfactory basis and groundwork of national character. Among the people there is practical sense, among the gentry scholarly instincts, the desire for advancement, the disposition to work for it with earnestness and constancy. Among the rulers, a sense of dignity, breadth of view, considering their information and patriotic feeling. Who will say that such a people have not a future more wonderful even than their past? Why will not the wheels of progress and empire roll on until the countries of Asia witness again their course?

It is of course true that different races exhibit generally different capacities and qualities. But we are likely to be deceived by appearances, and to attribute to differences of stock peculiarities which might be explained by a statement of differing circumstances.

Holding fast to this idea, we may proceed to investigate the causes of the massacre, just as we would a similar case elsewhere occurring. If like causes will produce like effects in China as elsewhere, if ordinary rules of evidence and an ordinary spirit of justice are to be regarded, we ought to set down naught to malice until malice is fairly proven. We ought to ascertain by careful inquiry what induced and actuated the malice. We ought to discriminate between its developments and the general tendencies of the people, if we find special circumstances existing to which we can trace the occasion of the massacre in whole or in part.

In truth, there were many and diverse causes of the massacre. Elements of danger flowed in from widely separated sources. Their combined stream was resistless.

In exhibiting these causes, I shall state—

First. The general elements of hostility to foreigners, the general reasons why the Chinese dislike and distrust us.

Second. The forms which this distrust has taken, having reference practically to the forms exhibited at Tien-tsin.

Third. The special circumstances of an exciting character which were present and active at Tien-tsin.

Foremost among the influences of a general character which are averse to foreigners, may be set down

PREJUDICES OF RACE.

We all know that prejudices of race exist everywhere. Those entertained by the white people of the United States toward the blacks offer a ready and strong instance. I suppose it would be difficult to find, even among the most advanced advocates of equal rights, a single respectable white man in America who would be willing to sustain intimate relations with one of the despised race. Aversion to the negro has its correlative in that universally felt for the Indian. Not all the pages of romance and of poetry devoted to illustrations of their higher qualities have been able to affect greatly the current of sentiment against them. So, the Chinaman who visits our shores must meet unconcealed suspicion and hatred. We invite emigration from other countries, and no power is strong enough to turn or check any of the streams which make its tide. Hostility to the Chinese is so great that immigration is limited to a fraction of its normal flow.

Prejudices and antipathies of race are so strong, indeed, that we expect the most serious consequences when people of different stocks are brought suddenly into intimate relations. The question is not, will hostile feeling follow such contact, but how may intercourse between races of different characteristics be carried on so that the fewest conflicts shall occur?

A second reason why the Chinese are averse to foreigners may be found in

THE EXCLUSIVE POLICY OF THE EMPIRE.

The situation of China is such that she has been able to work out her development for the most part free from foreign intercourse. Her territory extends from the Pacific on the east to mountains on the west, which offer an almost equally impassable barrier. On the north are mountains and vast stretches of desert, on the south the jungles of the tropics. Within her boundaries are many water-courses forming admirable channels for communication and commerce. There are widely extended and fertile plains. The climate is agreeable everywhere, and marked by similar features.

It is not a matter for wonder that a people living in the undisturbed possession of such a country should avoid intercourse with the outside world, and that, having successfully done this for a long period, they should cling to their policy with a strength that can be measured only by its antiquity, and by the numbers of the empire.

A third reason why the Chinese are averse to foreigners may be found in the fact that

THEY ARE AN IGNORANT PEOPLE.

There are perhaps 25,000 characters in the Chinese language. A good knowledge of 10,000 of these would suffice for the requirements of any of the higher walks of life, say of statesmanship; but such knowledge implies a great deal of study. Seven-eighths of all the characters in the language have been formed from 2,000 symbols; until these are known neither the sound nor the sense of a compound word would be more apparent to a Chinaman than to any one else; but the meaning of a compounded character is seldom deducible from the symbols. Each character has still to be learned, just as words are in other languages.

It will be understood that the practical difficulties of the language are very great. It is about the result, however, that we need to be informed.

I am assured that about three Chinamen in each one hundred can read works written in a full or classical style. The number of women would be one in a thousand.

The Chinese, then, must be set down an uneducated people. As such they are necessarily superstitious and suspicious. They cannot justly estimate the bearing and weight of the facts which they observe. They are likely to imagine that they are beset by dangers and difficulties where none exist.

A fourth reason may be found in

DIFFERENCES OF RELIGION.

It is often said that the Chinese are very tolerant of religious opinions; that in fact the greatest difficulty met by the Christian missionary arises from the apparent absence of religious sentiment.

If this be so, the Chinese are comparatively free from influences which have in all ages and countries greatly affected the minds of men. It is not necessary to recount struggles to defend or to impose faiths which are exhibited in history, the division of races into ranks and castes dependent upon priestly influence. With mankind at large it is believed that conceptions of supernatural agencies, of future states of existence, of divinely imposed rewards and punishments, are universal. It cannot be that the Chinese are exceptional in this respect. If so, why do temples for the worship of superior powers exist everywhere in the land? why does the priestly class form a considerable fraction of the population?

It is perfectly safe to say that China has her confirmed beliefs. If this is so, the incoming of people to proselyte must be regarded with great disfavor. I should so believe if I recognized no elements of discord excepting those which must spring from the priests. If they are earnest men they will cherish their faith from a sense of duty. If they are simply selfish they will do so to preserve their authority and power. In either case, missionaries must expect the hostility of a class that has seldom failed to play a prominent part in the control of states.

But whether the introduction of new religions by ordinary methods would or would not give rise to hostile feeling, it is certain that methods have been resorted to which have occasioned the ill-will of government and people in a marked degree.

Various allegations have been made against Roman Catholic missionaries. It has been alleged that the bishop of one of the western provinces resides in a palace which vies with that of the viceroy; that he uses a palanquin decorated in a way allowed only to the highest officials of the empire, and that his progresses from one part of his diocese to another are made in a regal way. It has been asserted that the priests claim the right to correspond with the officials on terms of equality; that they combine with and arrange combinations among their converts to defeat the objects of the government; that they claim for their converts various unusual and objectionable immunities; that in fact they are building up a rule within the territorial rule which is very dangerous to the state.

One who has studied the history of the Roman Church cannot be surprised when he hears that China is seriously alarmed; but we can estimate the actual danger more perfectly than she. Any exposition of her fears which she is likely to make will exhibit many puerilities. Yet we must admit that her statesmen would be unwise if they should fail to study the problems which the presence of the church presents.

A fifth occasion of the hostility of the Chinese may be found in

THE OPIUM TRADE.

The value of the opium imported into Hong-Kong in the year 1870 was, (Mexican).....	$62, 988, 624
The tea exported from China reached the value of.....	$40, 376, 849
The silk, the value of.....	32, 021, 916
A difference of.....	<hr/> 9, 410, 141

Sixth-sevenths of the products of the empire, valuable for exportation, are thus consumed in a drug which is absolutely deleterious to the people. Let people interested gloss over the opium trade as they will, let the government and people of Great Britain plead that opium is necessary to correct the diet of the Chinese, the fact remains that the connection of foreigners with it is a blot upon their civilization, an occasion of deep and bitter resentment on the part of the Chinese.

A sixth occasion of hostile feeling may be found in

THE EXTRATERRITORIAL SYSTEM.

As you are aware, clauses exist in the treaties between China and western states by which the citizens of the latter are freed from the control of the territorial authorities, and made subject only to the functionaries of their own countries.

Such a condition of intercourse cannot be otherwise than distasteful to China. It is based on the undisguised assumption that foreign states cannot trust her to act with justice toward their people. It is a standing humiliation, and occasion of resentment. The government is in many respects a proud one. The nation entertains a radical belief in its own superiority. When, therefore, western states, by force of arms, impose upon China an unusual system, one which they would never yield to others, it is not wonderful that deep resentment is aroused, and that prominent statesmen have been led to declare that they will not long submit to the indignity.

It would be difficult to say that the extraterritorial system is not often productive of injustice to the Chinese. We cannot always have wise, upright, and unprejudiced judges in our eastern establishments, men who know what substantial justice is and are prepared to yield it to despised Chinese suitors, in face of foreigners and their interests. And even should substantial justice be accorded, the interests, passions, and prejudices of the Chinese will often lead to the most serious disagreements. A few years ago the viceroy at Nanking, in presenting a case on behalf of some poor boat-people, whose vessels had been sunk by a foreign steamer, declared that the frequency of such accidents had so aroused the people along the river that he feared they would endeavor to make reprisals should the foreign courts continue to refuse redress. More lately the viceroy at Tien-tsin became incensed because an unfavorable judgment had been given in a similar case, and threatened to seize and hold the steamer until payment should be made. The people of Shanghai once seized and maltreated the native magistrate because he had not procured a favorable decision in a case which had aroused their sympathies.

A seventh reason why the Chinese dislike foreigners may be found in

THE TEMPER AND TONE SOMETIMES EXHIBITED BY FOREIGN OFFICIALS AND OTHERS.

A prominent instance of the rampant style sometimes used by foreign representatives is that of M. Bellonet, detailed by Mr. Burlingame in the diplomatic correspondence of 1866. Such instances have been rare at Peking, where foreign governments have been well represented, as a rule. At the ports, the case is different. The mercantile communities demand that the consuls shall be vigorous. These have often no way to show vigor, excepting by complaining to the native officials in a strenuous way. Gun-boats have been used to effect the settlement of disputes, property has been seized, and lives sacrificed at the bidding of consuls.

The disposition to override the more mildly disposed Chinese is frequently seen at the foreign settlements. Older residents and men of refinement treat the natives with uniform consideration. Younger men, new-comers, and those low in the social scale, are seen to push them rudely in the streets, and to strike them with whips when riding and driving. Masters of ships and steamers have, in times now I hope passed by, carelessly run down native boats, not stopping sometimes to pick up the unfortunates.

Our reputation with the government and people has been greatly affected in this way, the kindness, the generosity, the deference, the high qualities shown by very many foreigners finding its more apparent and powerful opposing influence at the harshness and brutality exhibited by others.

An eighth occasion of hostile feeling may be found in

THE UTTERANCES OF THE FOREIGN PRESS.

The impersonal aggregate tendency of foreigners in China is toward aggressive measures. I have heretofore explained this, and urged that it is natural and commendable. I do not esteem the man who, in full view of the many imperfections of this system and the undeveloped state of their country, thinks that all is going on well in China. I wish the representatives of the civilization of the West to be urgent, but ever respectful. It is our duty to set before the Chinese the golden opportunities they are losing, and the dangers which assail them. I hold that this may be done in such manner that animosity will not be aroused. I know that both officials and people are ready to receive advice, and that they seek for it from men whose counsels they have come to respect. Confidence grows slowly with them, but is firmly rooted.

The foreign press represents the aggressive tendency of foreigners, and being printed for them does so in a radical way. Its temper is not always just, its information often defective and partial, its expressions severe. The Chinese know more or less of what appears in its columns.

I do not doubt that very much rancor is thus occasioned. The general result must be beneficial, however, even though the press has no more grateful task to perform than to hold up, as it were, a mirror in which the Chinese may see their deformities.

Having thus recounted certain inevitable and indisputable causes calculated to draw down upon us the ill-will of the Chinese, causes the tendency and scope of which we can estimate but the effects of which must be determined by experience, I pass on to state the forms which this ill-will took at Tien-tsin.

At this point my task becomes an unpleasant one. I have spoken of my faith in the Chinese. The story that is to be told will seem to belie my favorable declarations. I shall have to recount some of their superstitions. They are dark and hideous, and the lurid light of the massacre will exhibit them in their worst aspects. Let it be remembered, then, that the good sense and the good will of the Chinese are so great that, in the main, our relations move smoothly, that the massacre is after all an exceptional incident in our intercourse.

Soon after the massacre occurred, Teeng Kwo-Fan, viceroy of Chihli, the province in which Tien-tsin is situated, a man who has played a prominent part in the recent history of the empire, was sent to investigate its causes. With him was associated Chung-How, now ambassador to France, a commissioner of foreign trade, and honorably engaged in many matters of a special character. About one month after the date of the massacre these high officers put out a proclamation, (page 125, British Blue Book, China, No. 1, 1871,) in which they stated various charges that the people of Tien-tsin had preferred against the members of the Roman Catholic establishments. These were as follows:

1. That they kidnapped and bewitched people.

2. That they mutilated bodies to obtain ingredients for the concoction of medicines, even killing children to this end.

3. That the priests were given to the seduction of women.

At a later moment I shall inquire what immediate reasons, real or apparent, the Chinese had to believe these charges. But I will show first that such charges were not new at the empire, but have been widely urged in different parts of it, and indeed that they are founded upon beliefs and superstitious common among the Chinese, apart from their intercourse with foreigners.

The first charge which I have recited is that of kidnapping.

Under this head I quote from the North China Herald of June 23, 1870, as follows :

Thirty-five years ago a writer complains that kidnapping is growing more and more common in Canton. The way was, "for kidnappers to give notice to the parents that if a certain sum were sent, within a certain time to a certain place, the girl would be returned, otherwise she would be sold as a slave." A little later mention is made of the crime at Peking and Macao. That notable publication, the Peking Gazette, spoke of it as "a gross infraction of the laws, which ought to be carefully investigated and prohibited." In 1833 we find a complaint in the Canton Circular that there are "several hundred of kidnappers in and about the city of Canton, who are constantly carrying off and selling young women and children, and gain their livelihood by this infamous traffic." "In 1834 a censor complained to the Emperor about a system of kidnapping children and young persons in Peking."

Kidnapping, indeed, is fully recognized and provided for in the penal code of China. As the paragraphs are long and explicit, I content myself by giving the following résumé by Mr. Wade, the British representative at Peking. (Blue Book, p. 40.)

It is laid down in the second by-law, appended to the statute, against "the obtaining possession of persons by unlawful means, or the sale of persons so obtained possession of, as amended in the year 1801, and again in 1806, that whosoever shall entice away a boy or a girl, either for sale, for purposes of marriage, concubinage, or adoption, whether the same be bond or free, whether the sale of the same shall have been completed or not, shall, if the person stolen were no party to the act, be punished, the principals by being garroted after detention in prison till the autumn assize, the accessories with 100 blows of the heavier bamboo, and banished 3,000 li."

The bewitching of people, referred to in connection with foreigners, seems to be effected, according to the Chinese, by the use of drugs, the purpose being to facilitate kidnapping.

Mr. Wade at the same place quotes the provisions of the penal code where drugs are used in kidnapping, as follows :

If a child, boy or girl, be kidnapped by the use of medicated cakes, to stupefy, or by other bewitchments, the principal shall be strangled at once, and the accessories banished to the frontier, there to do military service.

The following curious case is quoted by Mr. Wade from a Chinese case book, printed in the year 1834.

In the year 1808 the governor of Canton memorialized that Lin-a-Kuei and his wife, Nee Liang, went about the country in a boat begging, in company with one Li-a-San. It so happened that Li-a-San met with a venomous snake, and having been told by some one, whose name he did not know, that the poison of snakes could be converted into a stupefying drug, he killed it, burnt it, and taking the remains on board the boat, arranged with Lin-a-Kuei to set about stupefying and kidnapping children.

The boat arrived at a place in Kai-ping-Sisim just as a popular festival was in progress, and it occurred to Lin-a-Kuei to make his wife dress up as a respectable spectator of the feast, to furnish her with the drug, and set her to stupefy and kidnap a female child. In the street of the village the woman met with Chin-a-tui, the daughter of Chin Hon-tsung, carrying some cash with which to purchase cakes. She rubbed some of the drug on the child's head, who at once became bewitched and followed her to the boat, into which she was forcibly carried by Lin-a-Kuei. Chin-a-tui screamed, whereupon the woman Liang gagged her with her hand. The boat then got under way, and on reaching an unfrequented spot, Lin-a-Kuei ordered the woman Liang to bind the child and dose her with a stupefying draught. The woman Liang then held her down with a plank across her shoulders; and while Li-a-San held her hands and feet, Lin-a-Kuei cut the sinews of her wrists and ankles. Her eyes were pierced by the woman Liang with a needle. Having thus cobbled and blinded her they intended to make her support the company by sending her out to beg. In this case Li-a-San died in prison; the woman Liang and Lin-a-Kuei were sentenced to summary decapitation, in accordance with the provisions of the code in cases where robbery (kidnapping) has been committed by means of stupefying drugs.

THE MUTILATION OF BODIES TO OBTAIN INGREDIENTS FOR THE CONCOCTION OF MEDICINES, AND THE MURDER OF PEOPLE TO THIS END.

The writer in the North China Herald, from whom I have before quoted, says :

Dr. Porter Smith has shown us that the idea of children's bodies being used in the manufacture of medicine is familiar to the Chinese. He points out that the last of the sixteen great classes, into which all medical substances are divided in the Penn-Tsan-Kang-Muh, is devoted to a description of, at least, thirty-nine kinds of medicines derived from the human body, in its various conditions of sex and age. The skin, bones, flesh, brain, nails, sweat, blood, tears, and many other secretions too numerous to mention, are all directed to be used as medicine.

The sixth annual report of the Hankow Medical Mission Hospital contains the following statements :

The Chinese believe that any sick or unsound part of the human body may be recovered or renewed by appropriating the similar part of another person in whom that organ is sound.

From the same report I quote again :

Eyes and other portions of the human body, removed in the course of hospital practice among the Chinese, are often preserved in spirits of wine as interesting and instructive memorials. This is just the way in which the natives make preparations from such disgusting things for actual medical use.

The North China Herald of July 22, 1870, gives an extract from a Peking letter, as follows :

The Peking Gazette of July 5 contains some interesting matter in connection with Chinese civilization generally, and more particularly with the theory of the treatment of disease by means of portions of the human body cut off for the purpose. Ma-Haim Yi, the governor general of the two kiangs, memorializes the throne to the effect, that a young girl of Kiang-Ming-Fu cut off two joints of one of her fingers and put them into the medicine which her mother was taking for a disease which the physician had pronounced incurable.

The traditional and orthodox custom for which, as the memorial says, there are numerous precedents, even in recent years, is to use a portion of the flesh of the thigh. This, the young girl, aged only fifteen, actually attempted to do, but had not either strength or courage to do. The governor general indulges in boundless laudation of this most commendable act of filial piety, which had, of course, its reward in the immediate recovery of the mother. He begs that the Emperor will bestow some exemplary reward on the child, such as the erection of a triumphal arch in the neighborhood to commemorate the act. By this means, he says, filial piety all over the world will receive encouragement. The Emperor in his reply refers the matter to the Li-pu (board of rites) for consideration.

Mr. Wade, in his memorandum on the Chinese law upon kidnapping, gives the following note :

In a case where a woman, calling herself a curer of toothache, procured an abortion of an illegitimate child, the bones of which were stewed and formed a portion of a philter for producing insensibility to punishment, the chief criminal was strangled in accordance with the enactments against such as practice and teach magical arts how to endure punishment.

Six days before the massacre the Tantar at Chinkiang issued the following proclamation :

Whereas, of late, whenever young children have been kidnapped at various places along the river (Yangtse) by means of stupefying drugs, it has always transpired, through the depositions taken from time to time by the local authorities, that the culprits had taken passage in steamers and conveyed their children to Shanghai, where they were sold for the purpose of having their eyes scooped out and their private parts cut off, to be used in the preparation of mysterious drugs, a fact also now lamentable! And whereas it is presumed that the captains and Chinese stewards who traverse the rivers and coasts on board the steamers are not wanting in benevolence and rectitude, a special appeal is made to them, to be careful in noting whether they have any passengers travelling without their families, but having in charge any young boys or girls, and if such persons cannot give a good account of themselves, while their appearance is clearly suspicious, to watch them, and lay private information against them at the custom-house, on their arrival in port. The customs officials will, thereupon, seize the individuals and forward them to the Tantar for trial and punishment.

The British consul at Chefoo, writing to his superior at Peking, under date of July 1, 1870, (Blue Book, p. 77,) records the following conversation with the Tantar, (chief local magistrate,) at his post:

I communicated the particulars of the massacre to the Tantar, who, when I mentioned that the dreadful outbreak owed its origin to the false reports previously circulated with reference to the kidnapping and mutilation of children by the French missionaries, interrupted me with the question: Oh! now tell me what is the real truth about this matter. Do they really make away with children as the people say? I replied that I was astonished to find a man so well informed as the Tantar asking such a question; he must know as well as myself how thoroughly baseless were these calumnies, which had no foundation in reason, however much they might be strengthened by ignorance and superstition, and added, that it was precisely because the authorities at Tien-tsin apparently had resembled him in admitting even the appearance of a doubt on the subject, that the mob had become incited to the degree of which information has reached us. A long argument ensued, the Tantar maintaining that accusations which have endured for three hundred years must have at least some foundation in fact, and that the Roman Catholics, by their secret practices and objectionable doctrines, have themselves to blame for any popular resentment they may provoke.

Tseng Kwo-Fan, governor general, and at one time generalissimo, is quoted by Sun, prefect of Yang-Chow, in a letter dated September 6, 1868, and printed in the British Blue Book, China, 1868, No. 2, as saying:

The missionaries must not return for several months. I will refer their case to the Tsung-li Yamen, (Board of Foreign Affairs,) and when the yamen, after consultation with the foreign ministers, informs me that it has come to the conclusion that the missionaries really do not abstract brains and eyes, I will, myself, issue proclamation to that effect to the gentry and to the people at Yang-Chow, after which the missionaries may return.

Matter of this sort may be detailed without limit. There is no end to the stories adverse to foreigners, to vile imputations against them which circulate among the Chinese, stories and imputations which are ever tinged by vices familiar among them, or firmly based in superstitions they have cherished for centuries. I have not quoted from anonymous placards or documents intended to be incendiary.

I have taken matter put out by high Chinese officials. The case I have made is indubitable.

Touching the charge that I have further recounted as found in proclamation of Tseng Kwo-Fan, and Chunghow, to wit:

THAT THE PRIESTS ARE GIVEN TO THE SEDUCTION OF WOMEN,

I need say little.

- I am told that the Chinese, who would be naturally disposed to distrust profoundly the celibacy of the Roman Catholic priests, place as little faith in them, in this respect, as they do in the Buddhist priests, who are notoriously vicious. A book has been recently printed in Chinese, and largely circulated, which contains the vilest stories imaginable of the lewdness of the priests, repeated with particularity and great variety of detail. I doubt not that it receives the implicit faith of a great portion of its readers.

Going back in a general way over the charges thus made against foreigners, I have to remark that they should not surprise us. They have, in the first place, a substratum of fact.

Kidnapping has been practiced extensively in China by foreigners, or by Chinese in the employ of foreigners. I refer to the coolie trade, the last of which has not yet been seen. I do not doubt that in years gone by the number of Chinese carried off against their will, to be sold into a servitude from which death might be esteemed a happy relief, has reached annually ten times that of the foreign men and women murdered at Tien-tsin.

There is no direct evidence to connect the charge of kidnapping, alleged at Tien-tsin, with the outrages of the coolie trade; but as communication between the south of China, where they have occurred, and that port is constant, it may well be supposed that the facts were known there, at least in a general way.

No further basis for the charge that foreigners mutilate bodies occurs to me than the fact that we frequently make post-mortem examinations, and that we preserve specimens of abnormal human growth in spirits. Dr. Porter Smith says that these specimens "often speak illustrated volumes to the credulous Chinese."

The use of the wafer, so called, in the administration of the Lord's Supper, has given rise, it is said, to many absurd stories, the Chinese attributing to it the ability to render the person eating it infatuated with the person administering it, and with the religion. The book referred to above, the "Death Blow to Corrupt Doctrines," is full of stories of love-potions administered by the priests.

Nor are the tales prevalent among the Chinese, that children are killed by foreigners, entirely without a seeming support in facts.

The Romanists are said to have implicit faith in the saving efficacy of infant baptism. As a consequence they receive young children into their hospitals in the last stages of sickness; this practice, and the frequency of deaths giving support to the belief that they have occasion to use the bodies of children for mysterious purposes.

The secrecy, or perhaps it should be said the privacy, observed in the Roman Catholic hospitals and asylums gives rise to many suspicions. I quote as follows from a synopsis of the celebrated Missionary Circular. (Note to Rule 1.)

It is the custom in China for the superiors of native asylums to report all particulars touching the inmates to the magistrates. Parents of children can see them. If any one wishes to adopt a child it can be done, and parents may, when they wish, take their own home again. Similar regulations, we understand, exist in foreign countries, but in China when once a child is put into an asylum it can never be visited again, the parents cannot get it back, no one else can adopt it. Such a mode gives rise to grave suspicions, and though it has been proved that nothing like the gouging out of eyes or cutting out hearts is practiced, yet owing to this secret mode of managing the asylums the people still have doubts.

One cause of the outbreak upon the Rev. Mr. Taylor's mission at Yang-Chow, about which I wrote at length last year, (Diplomatic Correspondence, 1870, p. 349,) was the fact that, contrary to Chinese ideas of modesty, the male and female members of the mission were seen to exhibit an apparently unrestrained intimacy.

As in other countries the confessional in China has been the occasion of bitterly adverse criticism. The practice of allowing men and women to mix indiscriminately in public worship has given rise to denunciations such as were visited upon Christians in Pagan Rome. The Missionary Circular touches this point also.

of Shanghai, dwells forcibly on the fact that there is much in the disposition of the Chinese to impute to foreigners mysterious and malicious practices to remind us of the belief in witchcraft prevalent in Europe and America one hundred and fifty years ago. I requote from his article what is said touching this delusion, by Lecky, in his book, "Rationalism in Europe:"

The predisposition to believe in the miraculous was so great that it constructed out of a small germ of reality the vast and complicated system of witchcraft; accumulated around it an immense mass of the most varied and circumstantial evidence; persuaded all the ablest men for many centuries that it was incontestably true; conducted it unshaken through the scrutiny of the law courts of every European nation, and consigned tens of thousands of victims to a fearful and unlamented death. It resulted not from accidental circumstances, individual eccentricities, or even scientific ignorance, but from a general predisposition to see satanic agency in life.

One peculiar feature of the witchcraft delusion was that the persons charged as witches frequently, and with great particularity, confessed their evil agency. We now understand that, in consequence of the excitement of the public, persons so feared that they might become the vehicle of satanic influence that they at last came to be convinced that the spell was upon them. It was only a different phase of that constitution of the human mind which permits one person to witness angels attending his way, heaven itself opening to his upturned view, while it inflicts upon another constant visions of devils and visitation of all dire influences.

So it is possible that the belief in the malpractices of the Roman Catholic missionaries has so affected the people that different individuals have come to believe they have themselves, or in their families, suffered from their malevolence.

It is certain that Chinese have, at different times, given evidence directly incriminating foreigners. Such is the tenor of the Chinkiang Taulais proclamation, and it is directly declared in the report of the governor general at Nanking. (Diplomatic Correspondence, 1870, page 366.) He says:

One kidnapper was taken almost in the act, and when before the authorities he stated that a man named Choo-Teh-Shing, belonging to the Roman Catholic establishment, was his principal.

The popular belief in the mysterious practices of foreigners has been strengthened, doubtless, by an important agency. The use of torture is common in China. It is permitted, even required, by the laws of the empire. No man can be punished for the commission of a crime which he has not confessed. Magistrates, therefore, torture persons, of whose guilt they are convinced, until they procure confessions.

Such an engine is terrible for harm. It has been the chosen resource of despotism and intolerance in all ages. There is no evidence which cannot be wrung out by its use. There is no crime, the confession of which cannot be procured. Men will die at the stake rather than face the agencies of a thousand deaths, which it may inflict. He who holds it wields a greater power than that of life and death.

I need not that confessions have been wrung from many poor wretches in China incriminating foreigners in whatever way prevalent superstitious have demanded. Nor is it necessary that actual malice should be present. People demand the use of torture where its use is common, and refuse to believe statements not made under its pains. The suspected person, on the other hand, hastens, in anticipation of torture, to confess the offenses of which popular opinion has pronounced him guilty.

Having thus briefly reviewed the reasons why the Chinese distrust and dislike foreigners, and the general forms which this distrust and dislike have taken, having reference always to the forms exhibited at Tien-tsin, I proceed now to deal with the massacre, my task for the moment being to indicate

THE SPECIAL CIRCUMSTANCES OF AN EXCITING CHARACTER WHICH WERE PRESENT AND ACTIVE AT TIEN-TSIN.

These circumstances will most clearly appear if stated in the course of a general description of Tien-tsin, of the events preceding the massacre, and of the massacre itself.

The city of Tien-tsin is situated on the right bank of the river Pesho, sixty miles from the gulf of Pechili. It is at the head of navigation for sea-going craft, native and foreign; and the sea-port for Peking, and an immense district lying north and west of that city. The population numbered about 400,000.

A populous suburb extends from the river above the native city to the foreign settlement. The neighborhood of Chung How's yamen and the French consulate is also well-built over. The bridge of boats connects these districts, and is used by travelers toward the capital and the north. It is closed when in use, and open when a central boat is displaced to allow the passage of river craft. The prominent native officials resident at Tien-tsin were the superintendent of trade, the tantai, the chi-fu, and the che-hsien.

The first of these was Chung How, of whom I have already spoken. He is a Tartar, and said to be related to the imperial family. He is an able man, ambitious to be useful and to advance himself. He had been many years at Tien-tsin, and had succeeded in drawing the government into enterprises of which he had charge. The drilling of troops after European methods was one of these, and the establishment of an arsenal and of powder-works were others. Having met him, and been long familiar with his reputation, I judge that he is well disposed toward foreigners, and likely to be just in his dealings with them.

Next in grade was the tantai, sometimes called by foreigners the intendant. He was the chief local executive officer, and had charge of one-half the province, if I am rightly informed. Under him were the chi-fu, or fue, called by foreigners the prefect, and the che-hsien, called indiscriminately the sub-prefect and the district magistrate. These two were in fact the peace-officers of the city. They were banished after the massacre because of their failure to maintain order. (Decree of October 15, 1870, Blue Book, page 224.) Both had judicial functions and control of the police of the city.

It is impossible to offer from any foreign source or sources an original narrative of the massacre, as but a few foreigners who were near the scene were saved, and these saw only a small part of it. One gentleman named Coutres was in the yamen of Chung How, when in or near it the French consul was first assailed, but he seems to have made no detailed statement, while the particulars narrated by him from time to time vary so greatly that one is indisposed to credit anything he says which is not supported by independent evidence.

There are, however, three letters extant, which throw a flood of light on the subject. The first of these was written by Chung-How to the Foreign Office at Peking on the 19th of June, two days before the massacre; the second, by the French consul to his minister on the morning of the 21st; and the third, by Chung How to the Foreign Office on the afternoon of the fatal day.

The first of these, as given in the Blue Book, page 12, reads:

You have doubtless received my letter of the 4th of June, on which I requested you would deign to bestow your attention.

At the beginning of this month, the popular mind being disturbed in consequence of an extraordinary long drought and want of rain, rumors of all sorts prevailed. The first of these was to the effect that young children were being drugged and kidnapped. This was followed by a story that bodies of children had been laid bare in the public cemeteries on the eastern bank of the river. The district magistrate of Tien-tsin made inquiries into the case, from which it appeared that these children had been buried by the Sisters of Charity. It was then further stated that the eyes and hearts of these children had been torn out, but there was no evidence of this. Later on, the prefect and district magistrate apprehended two kidnapers named Chang-Chuan and Kuo-Kuai, who having been convicted of drugging and kidnapping, were put to death on the spot, by the local magistrates, in obedience to orders contained in a circular issued by his excellency the governor general of Chih-li. Although they confessed having torn out eyes and hearts for the manufacture of drugs, yet their statements in no way implicated Christians.

Subsequently, Shen Hsi-pao, a teacher in the Roman Catholic establishment, returning home in company with his pupil, Wu Cheng, was mistaken by the people for a kidnapper, and was arrested and assaulted, but on investigation of the case by the magistrate, it was proved that they were really teacher and pupil, and that no kidnapping had taken place. He was sent to me. I informed the Catholic missionaries, and they took him away.

On the 18th of June, Wu-Lan-Chen, the kidnapper of Li-so, was caught at Fao-hua K'ou by some natives of the place, and sent before the magistrate. He implicated Wang San and other residents in the Roman Catholic establishments. Chou Tansai reports that on this he proceeded in person to the French consulate, and had a conversation with Monsieur Fontanier, the French consul, on the subject; that he gave him the minutes he read; and that the consul for his part, in view of the great number of stories in circulation, agreed to take action.

I now forward for your information a copy of the deposition of Wu-lan-chen, made before the district magistrate. As soon as the case has been thoroughly investigated, and action taken, I will report further. Meanwhile I have the honor to present this note.

With respectful compliments.

Wu-lan-chen's statement, (a kidnapper apprehended June 18.)

I am a native of Ning Chin Swien, and 19 years of age. My father and grandfather are still alive. My father's name is Wu Tsun, and he is in his 45th year. My mother's maiden name was Fang. I have no brothers. I married in the first month of the present year. As I had nothing to do at home, I left my home on the 18th of February and went by land to Cheng-chia K'ou, and came on by a relation's boat to Tien-tsin, where I gain my living as a sailor. Up to this time I was not acquainted with Wang-san of the Ho-Lou, (one of the Roman Catholic buildings is indicated,) but on the 13th June he drugged me and carried me off to the Roman Catholic church at Ho-Lou. I was not allowed to go into the inner rooms, nor did I see any foreigner. I went, indeed, only to the threshold. Wang San urged me to become a Catholic. I at first refused. Wang San said he would have my life. This put me in a great fright, and I then consented. He gave four dollars to a man named T'ang, to keep for me. On the 14th he gave me a packet containing a stupefying drug, and told me to go all over the country and kidnap men by means of this drug. The drug was a fine powder wrapped up in a paper. I went to Mu-chang-tzu, and there met a man of about 20 years of age, and wearing a light blue coat and trowsers. I put some of the drug in the palm of my hand and rubbed it on his face. He became quite silly and followed me, and I hurried back to the Roman Catholic church, and handed him over into Wang San's keeping. For this Wang San paid me five dollars, and gave me another packet of the drug, which I took to Tao-hua-ssu village, where I saw the individual Li-So drawing water. I stupefied him with the powder, and he followed me in the same way as the first man had done. But I was caught by some of the villagers and brought before the magistrate. There are seven other men in the Roman Catholic church besides myself who were engaged in kidnapping. Every evening we slept inside the barrier in the church. Wang San was our chief. Every morning he brought out some powders from the inner room and gave one to each man, as well as 300 cash to buy food with. If we did not succeed in drugging any one before the evening, we gave back the powders to Wang San. Of the other seven engaged in this work, I know Wang San and Wang Ush are natives of I-chow-ch'eng; Liu Hsias, and Lin Ha, and Linuh natives of Tu Kou-i, in the district of Ch'ing-nou. The other man's name I do not know.

Wang San is about twenty years old; has a fair complexion, slightly marked with the small-pox. After I had been drugged by Wang San and carried off to the church, he gave me an antidote, which I drank and immediately recovered my senses. Wang San then told me that when such nostrums have been used, some sweet grass, a cicadas shell, and a certain insect should be dried before the fire and ground to powder, and then worked up with oil of sesame. A draught of the hot decoction of this will bring people round at once. Yesterday, when I was caught in Tao-Nua-ssu village, the people asked me what to do, and I told them to give Li-So this antidote, and said he would recover after drinking it. The five dollars I received for kidnapping the man from Mu-chang-tzu I concealed in the belt of my trowsers, but when I was seized at Tao-hua-ssu I lost them. When I was living in the Roman Catholic establishment, every day before I went out Wang San gave me a red-colored powder to take as snuff. After a pinch of it I felt very brave, and thought of nothing but kidnapping people. When I returned in the evening, Wang San gave a draught of medicine as an antidote, which brought me to my senses, but by that time the gates were shut and I could not get out.

The following is Consul Fontanier's letter:

Our little town of Tien-tsin, generally so quiet, has been troubled for several days by shouting and mobs in the neighborhood of the establishment of the Sisters of Mercy, and of the consulate. The sisters were accused of tearing out children's eyes. Those who were more bold exhumed the dead that came from their hospital. Finally the tantai came and presented to me the depositions of several witnesses, declaring that they had been victims of the kidnappers employed by our missionaries.* I had no trouble in proving to him that all these reports were the work of ill-will, but the tantai having come officially. I promised him, at his reiterated demand, that I would watch that our Sisters of Mercy should not, for the future, employ any but persons of proved good character.

Some hours after, the che-hsien came to the consulate, accompanied by a delegate from Chung How, with the intention of bringing about, on the spot, an official search at the domicile of the Sisters and of the Lazarist missionaries. But as he was so ill-advised as to become angry, and even to threaten me with the anger of the populace, wishing apparently to exact from me that which his superiors had left entirely to my judgment, I profited by his conduct to terminate the interview, reminding him that it was only with the commissioner for the three northern ports that I intended to continue this matter, but that I made him none the less responsible for the consequences of the troubles with which he seemed to threaten me, for I was confident that he alone was the instigator of them.

I requested the delegate of Chung How to inform his excellency of the result of my interview with the Che-hsien, until I should myself go to complain to him of the improper conduct of this magistrate. I had the satisfaction of receiving next morning a visit from Chung How. He spoke very ill to me of the Che-hsien, trying all the time to exculpate him. He complained of the little consideration given to his observations by the local authorities, when he had attempted to deny the false reports spread against our missionaries, having at last been obliged to let them take a step in which he refused to join, which again gained for him the epithet of "the right arm of the Europeans."

This little incident, which might have taken a bad turn but for the intervention of Chung How, appears to-day to be almost at an end, Chung How having besides promised me to publish, in the course of a few days, a small proclamation to allay the excitement.

Chung How's second letter is as follows:

"I presume that your excellencies have already had under consideration my letter of the 19th instant, reporting on the kidnapping at Tein-tsin, the implication of the Roman Catholic establishments by these proceedings, and the threatening rumors which were abroad.

On June 20, I went to Monsieur Fontanier, and begged him to come to my yamen, that we might together examine the kidnapper, and so ascertain the truth or the falsehood of the rumors which were abroad. To this Monsieur Fontanier responded that the Roman Catholics had been guilty of no practices of the sort, and that he had no jurisdiction. I then asked Monsieur Fontanier to at once send for Pere Chevrier, that I might myself examine him, informing him at the same time that unless this matter was sifted to the bottom, and the Roman Catholics proved clearly to be guiltless, it would be impossible to quiet the suspicions of the people, which were then so determinedly aroused. Pere Chevrier, who had been sent for, and Monsieur Fontanier, begged that the intendant, prefect, and magistrate would go to the Roman Catholic establishment and see for themselves. With a view to subsequent proceedings, I accordingly proposed to send those officers with the prisoner, Wu-lan-chen, on the 21st instant, to the cathedral, that he might point out the localities alluded to in his statement, and, if possible, identify from among the Chinese of the establishment his acquaintance and confederate, Wang-san, and the others. Pere Chevrier perfectly consented, and the arrangement was concluded then and there. Accordingly, at 10 o'clock to-day the intendant, Chou, the prefect, Chang, and the magistrate, Lin, took the man Wa-lan-chen to the French cathedral, where they met Pere Chevrier, who was very civil and respectful. The prisoner was directed to proceed to and point out the places he had visited. It was then found that the mat-shed and barrier-gate mentioned in his evidence did not exist on the premises, and that he could point out nothing to support the truth of his statements. As for the man Wang-San, and the others implicated by the prisoner, he could not identify any one of them. The officers brought the man back to my yamen, and informed me of the results of their investigation. By and by Pere Chevrier came to the yamen to consult as to certain measures to be taken for the future. We agreed that henceforth all deaths occurring at the hospital should be reported to the officials, who would examine the bodies and see them buried; also that a return should be sent in of the pupils in their schools, and of the children, male and female, supported by them; and, to disarm suspicion, that no opposition should be made to the officials examining their establishments at any time they wished. After taking leave of Pere Chevrier, I was in the act of drawing up a proclamation, which I was anxious to get out at once in order to dispel the suspicions of the people and quiet the minds of foreigners and Chinese, when, at 2 o'clock, I suddenly heard that a disturbance had arisen between some people belonging to the cathedral and a crowd of idlers. I sent a military officer to suppress them, when I heard that Monsieur Fontanier had come to the yamen. On going out to meet him I saw that the consul, whose demeanor was furious, had two pistols in his belt, and that a foreigner, who accompanied him, was armed with a sword. They rushed toward me, and as soon as Monsieur Fontanier came up to me he began talking in an indecorous manner, drew a pistol from his belt, and fired it in my presence. The shot, fortunately, did not take effect and he was seized. I could not accept Monsieur Fontanier's challenge, and so withdrew.

On entering the room he began to break up the cups and other articles on the tables, keeping up, at the same time, an incessant storm of abuse. I went out again to see him, and told him that the crowd had a very threatening aspect; that as the entire fire brigade was with him, evidently intending to assist, I was afraid of a disturbance, and advised him not to go outside. He, however, reckless of his life, rushed out of the yamen. I sent some men after him to escort him on his way. Monsieur Fontanier met the magistrate Liu, who was endeavoring to control the mob, and who tried to keep him back, but he fired at this officer, hitting one of his servants. The mob, enraged at this outrageous conduct on the part of the consul, at once pursued, surrounded, and killed him. They then set fire to the cathedral, but the fire was put down before it had time to spread. They also destroyed the establishment of the Sisters of Charity and the Protestant chapel inside the city. At this time, while the mob was raging, it was suppressed by me, in conjunction with my colleagues, civil and military, and by a force sent by myself, while I sent information to the consuls to allay their apprehensions, informing them of the steps I had taken. The mob found ten children in the establishment of the Sisters of Charity. The excitement is subsiding. This is a true account of the origin and progress of the disturbance.

This affair arose in the first place from the suspicions and hostility of the people being excited by an idle rumor that the children buried from the hospital have had their eyes and hearts cut out; and, in the second place, from the confession of the kidnapper, Wu-Lan-chen, implicating people belonging to the Roman Catholic establishment. I am memorializing His Majesty on the origin of the disturbances as ascertained, and have ordered the immediate arrest and punishment of the ring-leaders. It is my further duty to acquaint your excellencies at once with all the details of the collision and riot. I beg you will have the goodness to inform the French minister as soon as possible.

Without comment at this point, I will now offer two other statements of the massacre, one from a foreign, the other from a native source. The former appeared in the North China Herald of July 14, 1870, from an "occasional contributor," writing from Tien-tsiu. It is as follows:

"On Tuesday, the 21st June, a Chinese mob, with the connivance of the mandarin, and especially of Chung How, the governor of Tien-tsin, simultaneously attacked the French consulate, the Catholic Church mission, and the hospital of the Sisters of Charity. It was at two o'clock that the assault commenced. The French consul, Monsieur Fontanier, seeing himself menaced and his windows broken by stones, left the consulate in uniform, and insisted on being accompanied by a petty mandarin (who was looking on at the mob without impeding them) to the yamen of Chung How, and there he demanded protection for the consulate, the persons who were resident, and for himself.

He also asked Chung How to protect the Sisters of Charity and their hospital, as he had by that time heard they were in danger. Chung How told him that he could not protect any of the persons whom he had named. Remonstrance took place, and as the French consul had a revolver in his hand that he had brought to defend himself, Chung How got frightened and left the room. The French consul then addressed his demand for protection to another mandarin, and he was answered that nothing could be done to help him. Some altercation took place, when one of the soldiers of the yamen stabbed the French consul in the thigh with a spear, and in that wounded state, with the blood having reddened the whole side of his white linen trousers, the consul went to the door of the yamen, and, holding up the French flag, asked leave to pass. The soldiers and mob seemed awed for a moment, but it was for a moment only. They fell upon the unfortunate consul, pierced him with spears and swords, and, after mutilating him, threw his corpse into the river. It has been said that the consul fired at Chung How, or at one of the mandarins, and that he killed a servant of the yamen; but, fortunately for the cause of truth, a Frenchman named Contres was in the yamen in the next room, where he, too, had fled for protection, and he declares that, up to the last, there was no shot fired, and that he saw the first wound inflicted on the consul by a soldier with a spear. M. Contres also witnessed the consul advance in a bleeding state to the door, and saw the first of the brutal murder. Meanwhile, the mob, after allowing the French consul to go toward the yamen, immediately broke open the consulate, and cruelly murdered Monsieur and Madame Thomassen, and the Abbe Chevrier, and another Catholic priest. M. Thomassen was an attaché to the French legation at Peking, and had only arrived the day previous from France with his newly married and beautiful young bride. It is reported that, in the terrible moment of impending death, M. Thomassen killed several Chinese, in order to defend himself and his wife. The mob, led on by soldiers, then set fire to the consulate and the church of the Catholic mission, and burnt all other inmates who could not escape. Simultaneously with the assault on the French consulate, the mob and soldiery surrounded the hospital of the French Sisters of Charity. Having set fire to a portion of the building, they entered the gates and dragged all the sisters into the street. There they stripped them naked, exposed them to the public gaze, plucked out their eyes, cut off their breasts, ripped them open, dragged out their hearts, and deliberately cut them to pieces, and divided portions of their flesh among the infuriated mob. No European witnessed these outrages on humanity save the poor victims, who, in the presence of each other, passed through the terrible ordeal and perished, without any support in that extreme hour of misery and torment, save their confidence in a merciful God, whose behests they had endeavored to fulfill among a barbarous people at the peril of their lives. Chinese spectators of the bloody scene relate other horrors perpetrated on those innocent ladies that cannot be mentioned. The lady superioress, it is said, was cut in twain while yet alive. God alone and the sisters know all they endured of moral agony and bodily sufferings. Their modesty outraged, their purity defiled, their poor frail frames torn asunder, their blood scattered, and their lives destroyed by savages, whose murderous rage inflicted all these and other outrages amidst a scene of horror that alone would be too terrible to encounter.

No sooner had the mob and the soldiers glutted their thirst for human blood on the sisters, than they burnt the entire hospital. Nearly one hundred orphan children who had been received into the orphanage attached to the hospital perished in the flames. The mutilated members of the dead sisters were thrown into the burning ruins, and thus, together with the little children they were charitably nurturing, was the holocaust complete.

Such a tale of horror would suffice; but more still remains to be told. Mr. N. Protopopoff, a Russian merchant, with his wife, to whom he had been married only two days, were met in the town of Tien-tsin by the same infuriated mob and soldiery, and attacked with spears and swords. Mr. Protopopoff fell almost immediately, and was cruelly murdered. His wife, who was on a spirited horse, fled for her life; but, being repulsed from the road, turned back and attempted to leap an open sewer in the town. She fell with her horse, but, extricating herself, hid for a few minutes in the sewer, until she was dragged out and killed by the mob. The bodies of these two Russians were thrown into the river, and afterwards recovered by their friends. They had been stripped naked and subjected to most barbarous usage.

A French merchant, Monsieur Chalmdiser, hearing that the Sisters of Charity were attacked, tried to get near the hospital to defend them, but he was caught in the street and hacked to pieces. His wife, on hearing of her husband's death, fled to the house of a native Christian and remained there till night, when, disguised in a Chinese dress, she ventured to her house, thinking to see the body of her dead husband. After a fruitless search she endeavored to get back to the Chinese house, but, being discovered by some of Chung Hou's trained troops, she was killed by them in the street.

About fifty Cantonese men, who were suspected of being on intimate terms with Europeans, were murdered during the excitement; and even toward the end of the day some miscreants were prowling about the foreign settlements. One of them was taken with a loaded pistol, and he confessed that he had been sent to kill some of the Europeans in the customs-service.

From this harrowing recital one turns with a sense of relief to the other narrative of the massacre, to which I have referred as coming from a native source. It purports to be a letter from a Cantonese at Tien-tsin, written for the information of his fellow-provincials residing at Chefoo. It is given at page 73 of the Blue Book :

"For some months past it has been reported about Tien-tsin that the foreigners' Roman Catholic mission, (Tien Chu Tang,) hospital, (Jentsze-tang,) and missionary chapel (Li pai tang) habitually caused native converts to administer drugs to other converts, and to send them out in all directions to kidnap infant children, to be brought to the church to have their eyes and hearts dug out. This has gone on for a long time, and came to the knowledge of the people, and several of the kidnappers had been seized and handed over to the authorities. On being placed on trial they made confessions of their crimes, whereon the district magistrate and the people also became filled with indignation. Some were even recovered from the precincts of the mission buildings. At length, at ten o'clock in the morning of the 21st of June, the prefect and the magistrate of Tien-tsin went in person to the mission buildings for the purpose of laying hold of a head man of the kidnappers, named Wang-san, but did not succeed in apprehending him, and they (the two officials) returned home. The people, however, still remained in assemblage around the mission buildings without dispersing. Some of them threw stones and entered the building, and the gate-keepers were unable to keep them out. The foreigners, therefore, came out with their arms to offer intimidation, but the crowd, notwithstanding, grew greater and greater. Close by the Roman Catholic church was the French consulate, and the French consul, seeing that it was impossible to maintain order, went, with a vice-consul of his, both carrying arms in their hands, to the imperial commissioner's residence. They went in and sought to compel the imperial commissioner himself to go and maintain order, but the imperial commissioner refused to go. The foreigners, hereupon, fired off their pistols, and wounded with a sword an aide-de-camp of the commissioner. The people outside the gate, under the impression that the imperial commissioner was being attacked, raised an outcry and sounded their gongs, whereupon instantly a crowd collected from all quarters. The French consul went outside the gate, and there met the district magistrate, whereupon the foreigners again fired. This aroused still further the anger of the populace, who pursued the consul to the gateway of the mission buildings, where they killed both the consul and the vice-consul.

They next made an entry into the mission buildings, and dealt blows indiscriminately, setting fire to the place at the same time. The mission buildings were burnt down to the ground; and they further proceeded to burn the hospital. At the three places they rescued in all more than two hundred infants belonging to the people, and killed sixteen of the French men and women. They plundered the merchant establishment called the Fu-chang-hong, in Chen-she street, where a Frenchman and his wife were also killed. The people then felt that their indignation was assuaged. Among them were certain evil-disposed persons who wanted to plunder the foreign mercantile establishments, and destroy the foreign settlement, but, fortunately, when preparing to do so, they were prevented by the foreign drilled troops who were mustered for the purpose. Robberies are still being committed, night after night, by evil-disposed persons at the dwellings of the converts. After the affair occurred, the authorities issued proclamations to tranquilize the people and prohibit disturbance and now matters are quieting down into their accustomed state. During the last few days Earl Tseng has been ordered to come to Tien-tsin and inquire into the matter, and a high officer has been sent from Peking to maintain order. At the present moment all the foreigners have retreated to the settlement, where they maintain patrols by day and night unceasingly for their own safety. I accordingly write this for your information, and am only sorry that the disturbance has entirely broken up trade.

It is reiterated in these statements, and in a great mass of evidence which I have examined, that the rumors about the malpractices of the Roman Catholic missionaries became conspicuously current about one month before the massacre. Governor Low heard of the excitement so early as the 5th of June. (Diplomatic Correspondence, 1870, page 356.) This may have had its origin in the active malevolence of some individual or individuals, or in the circumstance that an epidemic occurred in the hospital at this time. (See Governor Low's dispatch above quoted.) I incline to the latter belief, but at a later moment will discuss the question, how far the excitement and the massacre were brought about by the efforts of individuals. For the moment, it is sufficient to say that circumstances seemed to implicate the 'sisters. They were connected with the establishment from which burials were daily taking place. Their doors were ever closed to the public. They were employing agents to recruit children. They were receiving these even when they were in the last gasps of life. People had visited the cemeteries and found in each of several of the coffins sent by the sisters that two bodies had been interred. They had taken this method to avert the suspicion that was growing up against them. At this moment two persons were arrested and executed on the charge of kidnapping. Then followed proclamations by the magistrates, declaring that children were being kidnapped in all directions, and that their brains, eyes, and hearts were extracted for medicine.

One can imagine that an undefined dread, begot of the belief that horrible deeds were being perpetrated in a mysterious way, fell upon the great city.

At last occurred the arrest of Wu-lan-chen, and his examination. He acknowledged that he was a kidnapper, but claimed that he was an unwilling agent of the Romanists. He had been bewitched, and under continued bewitchment had gone out to bewitch others.

We should dwell a few moments on this strange story. The witness declares that he has been kidnapped by one Wang-San, of the Catholic mission; that under the influence of a drug administered by Wang-Sen he has kidnapped other persons, that Wang-Sen has kidnapped six persons besides himself and used them to prey for others. He speaks with much particularity, describes the drugs, the antidote to the one he was empowered to use, the places where he found his victims, their age and dress, and, as we may infer from Chung How's letter, the rooms in the mission establishment where he was confined at night.

It would be difficult to imagine a tale more likely to excite the populace of a Chinese city. It tallies exactly with the superstitious beliefs that prevail among the Chinese. It was doubtless repeated with aggravations and illustrations drawn from old stories of the malevolence of foreigners. Taken in connection with the existing excitement and the predisposition of the people, it was enough to prepare them to take a dire revenge.

This was the condition of matters when, on the morning of the 21st, the Tautai, prefect and magistrate, in pursuance of the arrangement effected between Chung How and Père Cheverier, went to the cathedral, and were shown over it and the premises attacked; Wu Lan-chen was brought to identify Wang-San, (a person of that name was actually in the service of the missionaries,) but failed to do so. He failed also when asked to point out the apartments which he had spoken of in his evidence. The officials, satisfied with the result of their investigations, reported to Chung How, who was soon joined by the amiable Père Cheverier, and arranged with him that certain precautionary measures should be observed for the future. He then proceeded, as he says, to prepare the proclamation he had promised to issue, and was anxious to get out, but was interrupted by the receipt of information that a disturbance had occurred near the consulate and the cathedral. Soon after, according to Chung How, Monsieur Fontanier appeared. He complained bitterly of the action of the mob, and demanded that his excellency should go with him to put an end to the trouble. Monsieur Fontanier then left the yamen and made his way toward the consulate, but, upon meeting the magistrate of Tien-tsin, fired upon that officer. Chung How claims that this was the signal for the work of destruction and death.

Up to a certain point, Chung How's statement is in perfect accord with Monsieur Fontanier's letter, and thereafter the circumstances blend to support the greater part of what he says. From other sources of information we may fill up gaps in his narrative, and reach a more complete conception of the massacre.

I have heretofore alluded to the evidence of a Frenchman named Coutres. Touching the death of Monsieur Fontanier and his secretary, he made the following statement to Mr. Lay, (Blue Book, page 33:)

As regards the death of the French consul and his secretary, I have examined Monsieur Coutres, a Frenchman, living not far from the French consulate, and he tells me that he heard a great outcry in the morning, and saw the people assembling from every quarter. Their cry was "kill the foreigners," (not "kill the sisters.") He ran into the French consulate, found all in confusion, and saw Monsieur Simon leave the yamen (the consulate is probably nearest,) with his writer; the consul had not been able to get his writer to go alone with his dispatch to Chung How.

"Monsieur Coutres went home then, and returning again soon, the Chinese told him that the consul had now gone himself to protest against the outrages. He rushed to the yamen and had much difficulty in getting protection, the officials in the courtyard being those who principally attacked him. He was kept in the yamen all night, and came down with Chung How in the morning. He did not see the French consul killed.

We may suppose that the Chinese, some of them, as we shall see, determined to create trouble, had gathered near the cathedral and consulate, to learn the result of the investigation which was being made; that they were not satisfied when the officials came out empty handed, and that they then began to call out at and revile the people in the two establishments. At this point the consul, becoming alarmed, and seeing the impracticability of dispersing the mob unaided, proceeded to Chung How's yamen for the purpose of asking assistance. Governor Low thinks that he reached the yamen "in a state of excitement bordering upon insanity."*

The fact that the consul was able to leave the house, and that Monsieur Coutres passed to and from it twice is evidence that, up to a moment later than that when the consul started for the imperial commissioner's residence, the crowd had not proceeded to extremes.

I shall not stop to inquire whether Monsieur Fontanier did or did not fire off his pistol in the yamen of Chung How. He may have done so by accident, or in a passion, or with the intention to force Chung How, who, after the fashion of most Chinese officials, was probably in a state of helpless consternation, to go with him and quiet the mob.

And if Monsieur Fontanier discharged his pistol at the magistrate, the same explanations could be offered, or it might be said that he saw death staring him in the face, and used his pistol with a forlorn hope to drive back the surging crowd, or still believing that the magistrate had brought about the trouble, with the intent to die not unavenged upon him.

It would, of course, be interesting to know the exact facts, but they are not indispensably necessary to our knowledge of the massacre in its practical bearings. A study of the whole case leaves strongly upon my mind the conviction that, in all human probability, the outburst would have come in spite of any action the consul could take. He was in those moments a feather driven by the wind.

* Monsieur Fontanier had been interpreter to the French legation at Peking, and it is said was relieved because he had been repeatedly violent at the foreign office. Wan-Saang, one of the most prominent members of the foreign office, was so displeased at the conduct of Monsieur Fontanier that he declared to one of the foreign ministers his unwillingness to allow him to act as interpreter. I have other evidence that the consul was a man of an ungovernable temper.

Nor is it necessary to dwell upon the horrible scenes attending the massacre. The correspondent of the North China Herald, whose report I have quoted, has done this at length. It is sufficient to say that the destruction of life and property was complete, and attended with circumstances of a harrowing nature. I do not, however, find anything in the evidence to support his statement that a large number of Cantonese were killed. The letter of the Cantonese, also quoted, is silent on this point, a fact which raises a strong presumption that none of the writers, fellow provincials, were sacrificed. In the same way I find no evidence that a large number, or indeed any, children perished in the flames of the hospital; and it may be questioned whether the sisters were subjected to all the fiendish cruelties which the correspondent details. The victims of a mob are generally killed red-handed, and the mutilation of their bodies takes place at a later moment.

The statements and opinions which I have thus offered point to a gradual growth of excitement, culminating in the deeds of blood which have been described. But when one learns of such an excitement he naturally suspects that there must have been active malcontents at work, skillfully fanning the growing flame, and afterwards, perhaps, urging on the work of death. In this instance we have seen that Monsieur Fontanier was disposed to implicate the district magistrate as the fomentor of trouble. Count Rochechouart, French minister at Peking, was so satisfied of the guilt of that officer and the prefect that he demanded their execution. Some persons have held that Chung How must have foreseen the result, and, while they are indisposed to believe that he was actively criminal, they think that he cannot be excused from responsibility. There are even those who hold that the massacre was a part of a general scheme which had been elaborated by the government of China for the expulsion of foreigners from the empire.

It now becomes my duty to review the massacre in connection with the questions thus raised. I shall endeavor to do this in a spirit of fairness, not yielding to mere suspicions on the one hand, nor yet refusing to give facts the weight which they deserve. I shall, however, invariably insist that allegations not supported by shown facts must of necessity fall.

I have at hand, fortunately, an argument of an elaborate character, prepared by Messrs. Jonathan Lees and William N. Hall, missionaries at Tien-tsin, and intended to show that the massacre was the result of a conspiracy, in which the officials and gentry of the city were probably concerned. As it is, the only respectable argument of the sort which I have seen, as it is carefully and conscientiously drawn, and is temperate, if not moderate, in its expressions, I will quote it at length, and deal with it section by section. The document was addressed to the British consul at Tien-tsin, and may be found in the Blue Book and in the North China Herald of July 14, 1870.

The first section reads as follows:

I. We beg to remind you that it was well known for some days previous to the massacre that there was a plot of some kind against foreigners; that, although many of the injurious rumors relative to kidnapping, &c., were more immediately connected with French Romanists, the threats held out were by no means directed alone against them; that a fortnight previous to the outbreak, a lady member of one of the Protestant missions was so much alarmed by the gestures and language of the people that she did not dare to visit the city afterward as she had done before; that on the return of Mr. Lees from Peking, on the 13th ultimo, he found the anti-foreign feeling so strong as to have awakened general alarm among the converts of all the Protestant missions; that, on Friday the 12th, Mr. Lees, in the absence of his colleagues, had a long conversation with you upon the subject, and especially with reference to the obnoxious proclamation issued by the Fu, which well-informed natives, even then, confidently predicted would lead to riots; that you advised Mr. Lees to lodge with you an official complaint relative to this proclamation, and also to apply for a counter-proclamation as a measure of precaution in case the public sentiment should not abate; that the very same day it was found that threats had been uttered with reference to the new hospital premises just purchased by the London mission, and that it was not possible to find workmen courageous enough to undertake the needful repairs; that Mr. Lees accordingly applied for the protective proclamation as before agreed upon, Saturday morning, (the 18th;) that offensive demonstrations were made at the East Gate Chapel of the London mission on Sunday afternoon, (the 19th,) the shout being raised "they are killing a man in here," and a riot averted, probably, only by the cool self-possession and good temper of one or two native Christians; that on the same day stones were taken up, threateningly, as the Reverend Mr. Turnock, Mrs. Turnock, and a friend were returning from a chapel on the east of the river; that Mr. Lees saw you again on the Monday to represent the extreme urgency of the case; and, finally, that on the Tuesday morning we both waited on you for the same purpose, having just received from a number of our most trusted native assistant renewed warning of the imminence of the danger, and the necessity for immediate action."

After having completed a cursory examination of Messrs. Lees and Hall's argument, I shall come back to their statement, that rumors of the existence of a plot against foreigners had been some time in circulation. At the moment I shall proceed to consider the proclamation of the prefect, its bearing and significance. The other statements of Messrs. Lees and Hall offer only confirmation of the already sufficiently well-established fact that the excitement was growing for some time before the massacre, and was widely diffused.

The proclamation of the Fu may be found in the North China Herald of July 22, 1870. It reads:

Whereas, on the eight of the fifth moon, Chang Yang-an, of Yangfung garrison, deposed that he had caught two persons called Chang Shuan and Kuo Kuai, of Li-la-yang, kidnapping children of the district of Ching-Hai by means of drugs and magic; and whereas the two scoundrels, during their examinations, confessed to having employed drugs and incantations to kidnap children, they have already, by our orders, suffered the extreme penalty of the law. From reports which had previously reached us, it appeared that these vagabond wretches, together with others of the same class, were commissioned to kidnap children in all directions for the purpose extracting brains, eyes, and hearts to compound drugs—mutilation of the most barbarous sort. How but by their immediate decapitation could the neighborhood be pacified, or the majesty of law be upheld?

The Che-hsien has also issued a proclamation notifying that the police have received orders to make a general search for the kidnappers. But the city and suburbs of Tientsin have such a dense population, and cover such a large space, that it is feared the kidnappers may evade search and make their way here, and, concealing themselves in some secret spot, watch their opportunity to catch unsuspecting children. Only by vigilance, search, and prompt arrest can we hope to rid ourselves of these malevolent, cruel demons, and restore peace to this locality.

Besides selecting constables of known ability to use their utmost endeavors to apprehend the kidnappers, we issue this proclamation for the information of the public.

The proclamation of the Che-hsien was of similar tenor.

The execution of these men, which, it would seem, was effected by the magistrate, under the orders of the prefect, and the proclamations have a bad look, which does not disappear on closer examination. There is no statement in either proclamation, nor elsewhere in any documents which have fallen under my view, that the magistrate had any further proofs of the guilt of the alleged kidnappers than the allegation of the arresting officer and their own confessions. Chinese officials should know how worthless such proofs are in a time of excitement, and when the criminal is under torture or the threat of it. On the other hand, we find Chung How, according to Monsieur Fontanier, condemning the magistrates in terms which show that he referred to their conduct in causing the execution and the issue of the proclamations; we find Tseng Kwo Fan (Blue Book, page 95) declaring that, "upon inquiry, it has been found that there was no instance, either in or out of the city, of people who had lost children having lodged a complaint to that effect;" and lastly, we find from the evidence of an intelligent Chinese (Blue Book, page 35) that, after the execution, and before the massacre, "several literary men began to prepare a memorial for presentation to the Fu, asking who these men were, where they came from, whose children they had seized, to whom they had sold the children for the purposes stated, and also demanding why, without first punishing those who had been in the habit of buying them, the officials had killed the men; the gist of the whole being a complaint against the mandarins for having acted upon suspicion."

These facts are damnatory of the magistrates in this sense, they do not establish the existence of a conspiracy against foreigners, but they show that those officials, if not actually fomenting trouble, were countenancing beliefs which were likely to cause an outbreak; that if not actively guilty toward foreigners, they were such time-servers as to be willing to sacrifice two miserable wretches at the demand of an excited populace, without any sufficient warrant of law and fact.

I fear that this Pontius Pilate willingness to sacrifice the innocent, in obedience to a popular outcry, may characterize the Chinese. Unless, indeed, Ma Hsin-ye, the governor general at Nankin, had a better case for the execution of certain alleged kidnappers than is detailed in his dispatch reporting the facts, (Diplomatic Correspondence, 1870, page 366,) I fear that he must be set down as a time-server. That he had no animus against foreigners, or, if he had, that he thought it unwise to yield to it, is indicated by the fact that he succeeded in putting down an excitement which existed at the moment in Nankin, and in which foreigners were greatly endangered. A few weeks later the governor general died by the hand of an assassin, under circumstances which have never been cleared up. Is it impossible that some sufferer by the action of the governor general sought and obtained vengeance in this way? Upon Tseng Kewo Fan, a man whose character is in many respects admirable, rests the responsibility of having issued the general authority to deal with kidnappers by martial law, under which the regular course of procedure was suspended at Tien-tsin, and the execution of the two alleged kidnappers rendered possible.

Messrs. Lees and Hall go on to say:

II. We beg to say that the facts brought out in the evidence we have already had the honor to place in your hands prove that, whatever may now be said, the animosity of the mob, with rare exceptions, was far from being directed against the French alone. This is shown:

1. By the indiscriminate and consecutive destruction of all the Protestant chapels, eight in number, including the extensive premises of the American board, this destruction being as great as the bitterest rage could make it.
2. By the careful inquiry made for the missionaries, both at the chapels and at the London Mission Hospital.
3. By the ill treatment of many of our converts, all of whom seemed to have been marked men, and to have been persecuted, beaten, and plundered accordingly, while no less than eight or ten of the more well-to-do among them have had their houses pulled down and been robbed of all they possessed.
4. By the inability of the appeal made by unfortunate Russian victims on the ground of English nationality; and,
5. By the loudly expressed resolution of the mob, after they had completed their horrid work at the hospital of the Sisters of Charity, to come down to the settlement and burn the hongs, (mercantile establishments.)

There can be no doubt that the mob, after their blood was up, were ready to proceed against persons of any nationality, and especially against foreign religionists. But all the circumstances observed in our consideration of the subject lead to the supposition that its animus was originally directed against the Romanists. This supposition is strengthened by the fact that while red-handed they spared several who were Russians so fortunate as to establish the fact that they were Russians, and not French.

Messrs. Lees and Hall then proceed to say :

III. We dare not conceal our conviction that these deplorable events have had official recognition, even if they have not had official authority. This conviction rests upon the following among other grounds :

1. The popular excitement must of course have been well known to the authorities, yet no steps were taken to quell it.

2. On the contrary the proclamations issued by the Fu and Hien, of which complaint was made before the massacre, were of the most incendiary character.

3. The presentation to the Fu, upon the issue of these proclamations, of testimonials consisting of a complimentary umbrella and a tablet with the inscription : " The peoples' living Buddha," and his acceptance of these, (so reported the testimonials have been seen by trustworthy natives.)

4. No notice was taken of your application for the issue of a counter-proclamation. protective of life and property.

5. The rioters have notoriously claimed openly the sympathy and approval of all the local officials, except his excellency Chung How, who from his supposed complicity with foreigners has become the object of intense popular hatred, being nicknamed " foreigner " and " Romanist," and has had his proclamation insultingly defaced.

6. The language and conduct of the Chên-tai, as reported among the people.

7. The fact that, at least in some instances, as for examples in the demolition of the premises of the American Mission, and in several threatened attacks upon the London Mission Hospital, soldiers were the prominent actors.

8. The various fire-guilds and volunteer organizations all have as their heads literary men, whose names are enrolled in the yamêns, and it is impossible to believe that these men would venture to take an active part in a movement which they knew was opposed to the wishes of the officials.

9. Up to the present date, a fortnight after the riot, there is no reason to believe that one serious effort has been made to seize and punish any of the murderers, although a large number of foreign disciplined troops are in the pay of the Mandarins.

The first and second of these allegations are of course well taken, but they lose force when we remember the fact that, although Monsieur Fontanier, through the priests and their converts, and Mr. Lay, through the missionaries and their converts, should have been equally well informed as the native officials, they did not think it necessary to take action ; the first until urged by the magistrates, the second until so late a moment as the day before the massacre ; and that Monsieur Fontanier on the very morning of the massacre speaks slightly of the trouble, while Mr. Lay writes at the same moment, (Blue Book, page 21,) that he has " no fear of actual danger to life."

The third allegation is not significant, because it is indefinite, and the evidence upon the point equally so. In the absence of exact information it will be simply just to suppose that the people offered the testimonials believing that the Fu had well served the cause of law and order, while he declined them fearing to further countenance the excitement.

Touching the fourth allegation, it is to be said that the application for a counter-proclamation was not made until the day before the massacre, and that the magistrates had been several days preparing, in a practical way, to issue such.

The fifth allegation if quite correct ; does no more than raise a presumption against the magistrates and in favor of Chung How.

The person named in the sixth allegation, the Chên-tai, is a military officer having command of police. The evidence shows that this officer has been confused with one Chên Kwo-jai. This man was formerly a rebel, and was rewarded for his change of allegiance with the title of Ti-tu, or General. He is a turbulent fellow, who leads a disreputable life, and wherever he goes fomented hatred of foreigners. Some accounts indicate that he had been several weeks in Tien-tsin when the massacre occurred, but the better opinion is that he had only just reached there. To him is charged the closing of the bridge of boats, the opening of which, so as to prevent the passage of the mob toward the hospital and the foreign settlement, is credited indifferently to Chung How and to the district magistrate. He is also said to have used cries calculated to urge on the mob in their work of destruction. So far as I can judge, his guilt would not imply that of the local officers.

The seventh and eighth allegations are destitute of force, unless it can be shown that the soldiers, the members of the fire-guilds, and of the volunteer organizations, went into the massacre by companies and with their leaders. This is not the case, although it is true that in the first moments of the outbreak the fire-gongs and the gongs at the police-offices were beaten. But they appear to have been sounded, not as a signal for the outbreak, but in consequence of it.

The ninth allegation refers to the delay in the arrest of persons who took part in the massacre. I shall have occasion to deal with this point at a later moment.

Messrs. Lees and Hall proceed again, as follows:

IV. The share taken by the literati in these atrocities may be inferred:

1. From the positive admission made by one of their number to a native, whose evidence you already have, that some days before the riot a deputation of this class waited upon the mandarin in charge of the Wen Hsue, and presented a paper to him having reference to the rumors.

2. From the fact that the proclamations of the magistrates and the general closure of the schools, which added so much to the excitement, soon followed.

3. From the internal connection existing between the literati and the fire-guilds and volunteer companies, consequent upon those bodies having graduates at their head, it being inconceivable that these organizations could act with such evident unity of purpose unless their leaders had so willed, and equally inconceivable that their leaders would have ventured upon such action unless they had known that their literary brethren generally sympathized with them.

The evidence does not show whether the paper mentioned in the first of these allegations called for, or was calculated to effect, the issue of the proclamations and the closure of the schools. For all we know, it may have been the memorial touching the execution of the alleged kidnappers mentioned in an earlier part of this dispatch.

Touching the third allegation, I remark again, that, so far as I can learn, the members of the fire-guilds and the volunteer companies did not turn out until after the outbreak had occurred.

The class of the Literati of China embraces all persons who have succeeded in passing one or more of the government examinations. There are no lawyers in the empire; priests are seldom graduates, medical men almost never. Then it happens that students, as a rule, have no end in view but to obtain official employment. All civil officers are graduates and belong to the literary class, but when the literati are spoken of, those not in office are generally meant. Foreigners are, I find, universally suspicious of the literati. They believe that they are active in stirring up among the masses dislike of the foreigner and in planning outbreaks. If badly-disposed, their superior intelligence, their ability to write, their hold upon the officials and the government, and their general standing and influence in the empire, would render them an element of a dangerous character.

So far as the evidence shows, we might rest in the conclusion that the literati were free from blame. I am not prepared to believe that this was the case. There is too much reason to believe that the literati are not free from the superstitions which enthrall the masses, and that they are bitterly opposed to foreign intercourse. But I confess that I experienced a sense of satisfaction when I completed the perusal of the argument under review, having found no more direct and telling predictions against them than the three just quoted.

It is with the literary class, speaking generally, that we must expect to find the studious proclivities of the Chinese and their broadest intellectual development. As a consequence, we must expect that the members of that class will be first among the Chinese to appreciate the learning and morals of the West, our attainments in the sciences and the practical arts. There ought to be, therefore, no repelling of the literati with cold suspicion. The missionaries may set diplomatists a lesson in this respect. Profiting by the lessons of the past, they have at last dropped the universal battle which they formerly waged against the literati, and are now using the structure which Chinese sages have raised in order to build upon it the more exalted edifice of Christianity.

The ensuing section of the argument under review is forcible:

V. Not less important are the evidences continually accumulating that the entire affair was no sudden outbreak, but deliberately planned. Among these we may name:

1. The mob was summoned to its bloody work by the gongs of the fire-guilds, and when the principal acts of violence were accomplished, the guilds were in like manner ordered to disperse by the usual recall.

2. On the sounding of the fire-gongs, in place of the members of these guilds seizing their fire-buckets, &c., as would usually be the case on the giving of such a signal, there was a universal rush to arms, and spears, swords, and sticks were everywhere seen.

3. It is known that on the Tuesday and Monday previous to the massacre the guilds were assembled in various districts, and especially upon the east of the river, in eager debate, and threats loud and bitter were uttered that all foreigners should be slain.

4. Several foreigners were expressly warned, in one or two cases the statement having been made of the form in which the riot was to break out, viz: the burning of the French cathedral and hospital. As you may remember, you yourself informed us of this rumor early on Tuesday morning. A still more curious indication of the popular knowledge of the plot is afforded by the experience of an English gentleman living near the hospital, who was astonished to find, on Monday evening, that his landlord, who lived next door, had suddenly bricked up a communication formerly existing between the two houses, and which was intended for use in case of fire.

5. A catechist, belonging to the London Mission, who had been spending some time in the country, returned on the evening of Thursday, the 24d June. Mr. Lees saw him on Friday morning. He reported that at Hsing-chi, a market town on the Grand canal, about 200 li from Tien-tsin, he had been arrested by the people, who told him that there were proclamations out at Tsang-chên, which spoke of trouble with foreigners at Tien-tsin, and required the people to bring all suspected Romanists to the yaméns for examination, as being concerned in kidnapping. The man got away through the intervention of friendly shopkeepers in the neighborhood; but the incident is suggestive, as it is hard to see how news of events of Tuesday could have reached this district the succeeding day.

6. Yet more to the purpose, and especially when taken together with the above, is the evidence already in your possession, that in a district of Shantung, distant only 180 li from Chi-nan-fu, and at least five days' ordinary travel from Tien-tsin, there was a statement current among the people in the middle of the week, that there was to be an attack upon foreigners at Tien-tsin on the 23d and the 26th of the native month. It is remarkable not only that the attack was spoken of as to be made, but also that the story made no distinction of nationalities; and, moreover, that two dates were given, with the assertion that on the 23d (June 21st) those in the city were to be murdered, while the 26th was to be the fatal day upon the settlement. And here we may be permitted to suggest the question whether the knowledge of such an arrangement, supposing it to have existed, may not have had more to do with the escape of the settlement on the Tuesday than the reported official influence, and also to remind you that during the whole of Friday heavy rain fell.

The first of these allegations is a repetition of a statement already several times put forward. I repeat that it is not supported by the evidence, and that, in my opinion, the collision came first, the sounding of gongs, &c., at a later moment.

The pertinency of the second allegation, for aught that we have yet seen, rests upon our conclusion as to the first. If the gongs sounded before the collision, the fact that the members of the various organizations seized arms and not the appropriate instruments or insignia of their crafts would be evidence that they were moving to a preconcerted slaughter; but if the gongs were sounded after the collision, the fact of a collision with foreigners would have become known, and would, in view of the temper of the people, explain why they rushed to arms.

To the third allegation we may give ready credence. The evidence on which it is based (Blue Book, page 105) indicates that for a few days before the massacre the threats against foreigners were frequent and outspoken.

The fourth and fifth allegations are more positive in form. The supporting evidence has, however, not become available to me.

The sixth allegation is positive and perfectly supported by the evidence. It is contained in a memorandum from the pen of Mr. Hall, and may be found at page 106 of the Blue Book.

The Reverend N. B. Hodge has been residing for some weeks at Chu-Chiatsai, in the northeastern part of the province of Shantung. In a letter received from him a few days ago, and dated June 26, I find the following paragraph:

We had heard, not only from Tien-tsin friends, but likewise through widely circulated rumors in this district, that there was no small disturbance in Tien-tsin, owing to the damaging reports in circulation concerning Roman Catholics. On Friday last Hu returned from San Lin-chia, and heard that on the 23d of the Chinese month (last Tuesday) there was to be a grand struggle with the foreigners, to be succeeded by a second on the 26th, (Friday.)

With regard to the foregoing extract from Mr. Hodge's letter, I would remark that the man, Mr. Hodge's informant, is one of our native assistants, and is considered to be a cautious, reliable person. San Lin-chia, the place where he heard the rumor which he reported to Mr. Hodge, is a large village, situated in the northeastern portion of the province of Shan-tung, and distant from Chi-nan-fu about 160 li. We regard it five days' journey from Tien-tsin, by rapid traveling, and long stages; I suppose it might be reached in four days. He could leave this place early on Friday morning, in order to join Mr. Hodge at Chu-Chia on that day. This leaves only two days between the tragical occurrences at Tien-tsin, on the Tuesday, and Hu's departure from San Lin-chia on the Friday. It is thus all but impossible that the news of the actual events at Tien-tsin on Tuesday could have arrived at San Lin-chia before Hu's departure on Friday. Moreover, the tenor of Mr. Hodge's letter is, that the struggle with the foreigners was spoken of not as an accomplished fact, but as an event which was expected to transpire in virtue of some premeditated and publicly announced scheme. This fact, taken in connection with other similar intimations from widely-separated points, seems to possess considerable significance.

Two other witnesses, Chinese resident at Tien-tsin, speak of having heard that on the 21st of June there would be a massacre of foreigners. Their evidence may be found on pages 112 and 113 of the Blue Book.

I am satisfied that, prior to the 21st of June, an effort was made at Tien-tsin to bring about a massacre on that date. I believe this, because just such efforts are made in China, from time to time, now at one point, now at another, and because the evidence leads us to the conclusion.

The fact that the massacre occurred on the proposed day, raises a strong presumption that it was brought about by the conspirators.

Days for the extermination of this or that community of foreigners, as I have said, have been frequently fixed upon in China. The missionaries resident at Tung Chow, a city on the Gulf of Pechili, have been specially aimed at in this way; but in each case the day has passed by safely, as with demonstrations falling short of those threatened.

This fact should make us hesitate to believe that these rumors have their foundation in positive and practical undertakings to the end. They are often circulated to frighten foreigners, doubtless often with a malicious intent. They have so frequently failed to come true that, up to the moment of the massacre, those prevalent at Tien-tsin were generally laughed at by foreigners, as little credence has been given to those from time to time put in circulation at other points.

In the examination which I have made of the circumstances of the massacre, down to this point, I have found no evidence of a positive character to show that it resulted in consequence of a preconceived arrangement. Let me now question the probabilities in regard to the evidence of Mr. Hodge, and of the two Chinese witnesses resident at Tien-tsin, by whom the report which reached him is confirmed.

Mr. Hodge's residence was five days distant from Tien-tsin. Peking is two days from Tien-tsin. So far as is known, no rumors of a proposed massacre reached the capital. None reached Che-foo, New Chwang, or Shanghai. Everywhere it was known that there was more or less excitement existing among the Tien-tsinese, but nothing to show a conspiracy.

Evidence in regard to the massacre has flowed in from many diverse and distant sources. From Mr. Hodge and from the two Chinese witnesses only have we evidence of a conspiracy. Their statements are, that before the massacre they learned that foreigners at Tien-tsin were to be murdered on the Tuesday. Is it probable that a conspiracy, the aim of which had become known before the massacre, should not be clearly exposed when, after the massacre, eager attention is directed to all the facts?

While disposed to reject the conclusion that the massacre was deliberately planned and executed, that it was a second St. Bartholomew's, I am not disposed to say that the men who sought to bring it about did not precipitate the event. Given a populace in a fever-heat of excitement, given a congregation of their number such as that which occurred in front of the cathedral and consulate, given exasperating circumstances such as the failure of the mandarins to find the man against whom the anger of the mob was so thoroughly aroused, and the closed gates of the establishments, and a slight accident might bring about disaster. The cries of a fanatic, the throwing of a stone, the surging of the crowd, one error of temper or of judgment, might bring about the fray. To give this last coup de grace, and even to have somewhat prepared the events which led up to it, may very well have been the work of the would-be conspirators.

My conclusion, then, is, that the massacre may have been premeditated in certain quarters, and may have been precipitated in consequence of the efforts of badly-disposed persons, but was not preconceived in a general way. Such a conspiracy as may have existed is not a salient feature of the massacre. It can be elevated to no higher place than a leading incident. I speak always in view of the evidence. But of course further information might change my opinion.

I have dwelt at length on Messrs. Lees and Hall's memorandum, a document which was intended to be suggestive only, because, as I have said, I consider it the most forcible exposition which has fallen under my eyes, of the views of those who are disposed to see in the massacre proof that the official and literary classes in China, and perhaps the government, are bitterly hostile to foreigners, and constantly endeavoring to do them harm. It was due to the Department to deferentially consider these views, and I may say that it was due also to those in China who have not time to sift facts for themselves.

I can now review the case in order to state "the special circumstances of an exciting character, which were present and active at Tien-tsin."

If I am not mistaken these were—

1. An epidemic and numerous deaths among the children in the hospital of the Sisters of Charity.
2. The burial of several children—two in a coffin.

3. Rumors of kidnapping and the mutilation of bodies, strengthened by the facts that the Sisters received and recruited children, and that many of them had died, but more by the time-serving, perhaps malicious, action of the magistrates in executing two alleged kidnappers and in putting out proclamations likely to direct suspicion to foreigners.

4. The evidence of Wu-Lan-Chên, which directly charged upon the Roman Catholics the malpractices already credited to them.

5. The failure of the officials to see the drift of the excitement, or if they saw it to take action at an early moment.

6. The examination of the Romanists' cathedral and attached premises, on the morning of the day of the massacre. This brought together an excited crowd, and prepared matters for an outbreak.

7. The efforts of persons disposed to make trouble.

It has been my intention to consider further the measures taken by the foreign ministers and the government, in consequence of the massacre. But my dispatch has reached unusual length, and I am warned by the fact to desist from further writing. I shall, therefore, close it with the following remarks:

We have seen that there are various forcible reasons why the Chinese distrust and dislike foreigners.

We have seen that their intellectual condition is low, and that they believe, in a superstitious way, that foreigners are given to various horrible practices.

We conclude that the general conditions existing at Tien-tsin prior to the massacre may be repeated elsewhere in the empire, and that other massacres may be expected.

I so far rest in this conclusion that I advise caution and the use of precautionary measures. A strong effort should be made through the government at Peking to disprove the false stories about foreigners which are so prevalent among the people. The excitements among the people, which recur summer after summer, should be met and combated promptly and vigorously. A considerable naval force should be maintained in Chinese waters. It should be authorized to strike in defense of any foreign community when attacked, or if necessary to avert an attack.

All this is likely to be done. The communities, their representatives, and the several governments know the Chinese to-day better than they did two years ago. They will take great care that another outbreak shall not occur.

Moreover, the efforts of the government of China and of its officials will be put forward in the cause of peace. The dynasty is Tartar. It has only a forlorn following of its nationals. It holds the throne by a slight tenure. It wants no controversy with foreign states. It has discovered that it may draw strength from the presence of foreigners, and that if opposed unjustly they may cause its downfall.

We are less sure of the support of the officials. But the temper of the government is likely to be the index of theirs. Chinese officials are, as a rule, the veriest time-servers in the world. If the government requires them to keep the peace under penalty of disgrace, they will look well to the allotted task. The Tien-tsin officials have escaped easily, but their fate will still be a warning to others.

The people, low as they are in the intellectual grade, prone to superstitions, saturated with stories of the malevolence of foreigners, are yet what all the world in a general way believes them to be, industrious, peaceful, easily governed. While I write, information comes to me of the usual summer-time plots against foreigners. They come not unexpected, but the expectation remains that each returning summer will find the practical observing Chinaman more accustomed to foreigners, and more unwilling to accept unquestioned the stories against them. One difficulty is the vast extent and population of the empire.

I have said that it was my intention to consider the measures taken by the Chinese government in consequence of the massacre.

Under ordinary circumstances the examination of this part of the case would have been most instructive. But I am persuaded that the more useful part of my task has now been completed. There was no open trial of the offenders. We have no minutes of the evidence adduced. We could do no more under these circumstances than state what redress has been granted, and conjecture whether it was determined in a fair and candid way.

I have the honor, &c.,

GEORGE F. SEWARD.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Hong-Kong, April 7, 1871. (Received May 22.)

SIR: I have the honor to forward you the within inclosure, (No. 1,) containing an elaborate and remarkable decision just delivered by Chief Justice Smale of the Supreme Court of this colony, in a habeas corpus case involving the legality of the Macao coolie trade.

I have said the decision is remarkable, and it is, first, because in effect it declares that ships employed in the Macao trade are engaged in piracy; second, that such ships are slave-ships engaged in the slave trade.

The chief justice takes very high ground, very bold, and, of course, many contend very dangerous. The decision speaks for itself, is complete in itself, and therefore it is not proper that I should enlarge on it in this dispatch. I will say, however, that the whole coolie trade of China, at Macao, Hong-Kong, and elsewhere is so full of fraud and all sorts of iniquity as to make necessary some such startling decision to arouse Western civilization to a sense of its duty concerning this new and infamous slave trade.

If Great Britain sustains the decision of Chief Justice Smale, the Macao coolie trade, with all its enormities, will be at an end; but as this traffic is exceedingly profitable, and getting money is the dominant passion, at least in this part of the world, it will only shift its base, and re-open under color of a new authority and disguised with a front of more seeming decency. Already I am informed negotiations are pending for the establishment of extensive barracoons at Canton, and the opening of the coolie trade at that port under the auspices of the Chinese government.

In the latter event nothing can be hoped for better than at Macao, but on the contrary, the most painful anticipations arise of a system far worse than Portuguese ingenuity has been able to devise.

I have the honor, &c.,

D. H. BAILEY.

RENDITION OF CHINESE.

The following decision by Chief Justice Smale on the return of the habeas corpus, on which Kwok-a-sing was brought before him, involved several important questions as to the general law of rendition of Chinese criminals, upon the requisition of China, by Hong-Kong, and on the legal character of the Macao coolie trade and the right of coolies carried on coolie ships to regain their liberty, even by violence and bloodshed.

This decision is of so much general interest and importance that it is considered desirable to reprint it at length for home readers. The text has been submitted to the Chief Justice and may be taken as accurate.

SUPREME COURT, HONG-KONG, MARCH 25TH, 1871.—JUDGE CHAMBERS BEFORE THE HON. CHIEF JUSTICE SMALE, IN THE MATTER OF KWOK-A-SING ON HABEAS CORPUS—JUDGMENT.

Immediately after the argument upon the return to the habeas corpus of Kwok-a-sing, I had no doubt as to my decision on the main questions raised, but some of the points suggested were to me so new, and the broad questions which it was my duty to consider were of such great importance, and my views as to them were so much opposed to what I had reason to believe to be the opinion of persons entitled to very great respect from me, that I have thought over the matter till my health has, more than once, become unequal to the occasion, and delays unavoidably arose. Moreover, calls on my time and attention on other judicial matters have intervened, so that I have been often disturbed in giving continuous attention to the case as a whole. I do not, however, feel myself justified in longer delaying giving my decision; as to the correctness of which I can suggest to myself no ground for doubt. I now therefore proceed to express my views on the points which have arisen in and out of the argument, and to give my decision on the whole case. I regret that it must be at great length. In the first place I will shortly state the proceedings.

Grant of and return to writ of habeas corpus of Kwok-a-sing.—During the February close of vacation of the supreme court and its offices, Mr. Francis, as attorney of Kwok-a-sing, applied to me, at my chambers, on the 7th of that month, upon an affidavit by his client, for a writ of habeas corpus, which I granted in the common form, requiring Mr. Douglas, superintendent of the gaol, to bring before me the body of Kwok-a-sing. This writ was at once obeyed. Mr. Douglas set out the cause of the prisoner's detention in his return to the writ, which was, shortly, the production of the copy of a warrant of commitment in execution, dated the 13th of January, 1871, under the hand of Mr. May, first police magistrate, whereby reciting that a communication had been received requiring the prisoner's rendition on behalf of the Chinese government, as an offender against the laws of China by participating in the murder of a portion of the crew on board the Nouvelle Penelope; and after finding "that there is cause to believe" the prisoner's guilt on the ship, by killing the captain and some of the crew at sea, and other crimes afterward, viz, seizing a boat belonging to the said ship, and landing in Chinese territory, the warrant stated an adjudication by the magistrate that the prisoner should be committed to a gaol for detention, pending the receipt of orders from H. E. the lieutenant governor as to his further disposal.

Return by magistrate of depositions to writ of certiorari.—On Mr. Francis's application I, on the following day, issued a writ of certiorari, addressed to Mr. May, committing magistrate, and on the 11th of February, by his return to that writ, Mr. May brought before me the "minutes of proceedings in the cause in which Wong Ahee, barber, is complainant, and Kwok-a-sing, (24,) of Ponyu, coolie, is defendant." These proceedings extended from the 19th of January until the 7th of February last, on which day the above commitment was made out.

Absence of proper charge on the proceedings against the prisoner.—The first paragraph immediately following this heading bears internal evidence that it could have been written only after all the depositions had been taken; indeed, Mr. May, by an affidavit filed yesterday, deposed that it had been in fact copied from and written in after the committal, i. e., on the 7th of February. Not therefore attending to this paragraph, (it formed, as I think, no part of the proceedings,) it appears that Kwok-a-sing was first placed at the bar at the magistracy on the 19th of January, charged "as a suspicious character, and as a person dangerous to the peace and good order of the colony," under ordinance No. 9 of 1857; but no attempt was made to prove an act or word within the colony by the prisoner so as to bring him in the remotest way within either the words or within the spirit of that ordinance. That ordinance was passed in times of great political alarm here, as a means of getting rid of Chinamen of whom many were at that date presumed to be lurking about the colony, emissaries of the then hostile mandarins, on the merest suspicion of any evil design. The reason for the law has ceased, and the less frequently the police now invoke its enactments and the more stringent the proof to bring any person within that ordinance required by the magistrate, the more constitutional will the course of justice be in this colony.

No charge of murder against the prisoner.—The prisoner was thus irregularly charged at the magistracy for an offense as to which no evidence was tendered. I do not, on looking through the proceedings before the magistrate, find that this prisoner was charged with anything as the subject-matter of complaint to which he had to or could plead or answer, beyond the unsustained charge of being a "suspicious character and a dangerous person." The evidence goes to prove acts of violence and of killing the captain and eight of the crew in the ship, and the observations of Mr. Francis, addressed to the magistrate, were in reference to such evidence, but from beginning to end I see on the proceedings no "charge" of murder or of robbery, properly called a charge, against the prisoner, to which he could plead.

Absence of regular authority to initiate proceedings.—Again, attached to the depositions is a letter from the colonial secretary dated the 3d of February, 1871, addressed to Mr. May, but there is no note on the proceedings referring to it or showing that it was ever taken judicial notice of by Mr. May, or that the prisoner or Mr. Francis, his attorney, even knew that such a letter had ever been received by Mr. May, much less that it was to be treated as the foundation of Mr. May's authority to act.

The argument on claim of prisoner's discharge.—Mr. Francis's argument before me occupied some days of February last. He reduced to writing the heads of his arguments. The honorable and learned attorney general, who appeared for the Crown, and opposed the prisoner's discharge, answered the points raised by Mr. Francis, and furnished me with a printed copy of his arguments. Mr. Francis replied, and he furnished to me a written copy of that reply. I have seldom heard arguments more clear than those by which the contention on each side was sustained. Having been carefully epitomized, these arguments speak for themselves. The points were divided into seven by Mr. Francis. The attorney general has followed that division, and for the sake of convenience I will consider the case in the same order.

FIRST POINT.—Right of rendition to China is the only question.—Mr. Francis says that he made this point merely to clear the matter of all grounds of charge against the prisoner other than those arising out of ordinance No. 2 of 1850, which provides for the rendition of Chinese offenders. The attorney general did not suggest that the prisoner could be detained on any ground other than No. 2 of 1850. I am, as I have before said, of opinion that there is no other charge against him capable of being argued.

SECOND POINT.—Was No. 2 of 1850 ultra vires the legislative council.—The second point taken for the prisoner, viz: That ordinance No. 2 of 1850 is null and void, as being ultra vires of the colonial legislature, is very difficult to be disposed of. It is not denied by Mr. Francis that this ordinance has been acted on from 1850 to the present time, a period of more than 20 years. But he showed that no length of use will give validity to a local enactment if originally ultra vires; and if, in the opinion of the supreme judicial authority within the locality, the ordinance appears to have been originally ultra vires, it is bound so to decide. This proposition follows from Chalmers' Cases and Opinions, p. 402, and is ably sustained in Mr. Anstey's pamphlet on the competency of colonial legislatures, 1869, at pp. 2-25. It is my duty, therefore, to consider this objection. It at first seemed to me that on constitutional principle the Imperial Parliament alone has authority to give effect to treaties within the empire. This view seems confirmed by Mr. Forsyth, (Cases and Opinions, p. 269.) I thought it followed that it was not within the powers of a Hong-Kong legislature, which consists wholly of nominees of the Crown, to give such sanction, even within its own limits, without such previous imperial legislative sanction of the treaty, and also that such an ordinance was not, reading the charter strictly, required for either "the peace," or the "order," or the "good government of this colony;" which I read as meaning "within, and only within, this colony." If this had been the only colony in which such an ordinance had been passed, this view of the case would have weighed very strongly with me. The research of the attorney general, however, shows that the ordinance No. 2 of 1850 is but one of a number of colonial extradition enactments, and although the terms of the charter of each colony cannot be ascertained, I cannot refuse my assent to this, that some of them, at least, are similar to the Hong-Kong charter, and I cannot take upon myself to decide that so very general a practice is contrary to law, especially considering the contention of the attorney general, that the fact of there being valid colonial enactments as to extradition is recognized, if not in terms, by the strongest implication, in 28 and 29 Vic., c. 63, sec. 18.

THIRD POINT.—Treaty of 1843 abrogated, therefore No. 2 of 1850 void.—Mr. Francis's third contention is that the ordinance No. 2 of 1850 has become inoperative by reason that one of the two treaties, that of Nanking, made in August, 1842, and that of the Bogue, made in October, 1843, that is to say, the latter treaty, was "abrogated" by the second article of the treaty of Tien-tsin, of 25th June, 1858, while the first treaty, i. e. of Nanking, was "renewed." It is a fact of which I must take judicial notice, that there was after the treaty of the Bogue of 1843, war between Great Britain and China, extending over a considerable time, and that such war of itself suspended these two treaties in force at the date of ordinance No. 2 of 1850, so that for a long time, and up to the treaty of Tien-tsin of 1858, there was in effect no treaty between Great Britain and China to which the ordinance No. 2 of 1850 did, or could, apply. It cannot be contended that during that period the ordinance No. 2 of 1850 was or could be operative, or that when the treaty of the Bogue of 1843 was afterward, by mutual consent and by express compact, "abrogated" which confirmed its previous suspension by war, that it was ever "renewed," which means not a resuscitation, but a beginning de novo. I read somewhere in the parliamentary paper 393, (1868,) report on extradition, an opinion of one of the witnesses that each extradition enactment ceased with the treaties in reference to which it was enacted, but I cannot now find the reference to the passage. It is clear to me that such must have been the general opinion entertained as the proper view, for it is embodied in the extradition act of 1870, sec. 2., par. 2, that every order which is to be in place of an enactment to be made under that act shall not remain in force for any longer period than the arrangement with the foreign state. It is clearly now intended that on a treaty ceasing to be in force the provisions for rendition under it are to cease. It seems to me that there must always have been the like intendment in English law, and that this construction must be adopted as to the ordinance No. 2 of 1850, and that its operation ceased when the treaty of the Bogue was first suspended and then absolutely abrogated, and that it required a new ordinance to carry the entirely new arrangement of 1858 (which differed very much in detail from the Bogue treaty) into effect. I think I must here assume that the maxim cessante ratione cessat ipsa lex, Broomes L. M., 160, applies to this ordinance—this law. The argument of the attorney general assumes there was only one treaty in existence in 1850. I am of opinion that there were then in fact two treaties. The first of these treaties was signed in 1842, for China, by four commissioners, and the second treaty was signed a year afterward by one Chinese commissioner only. R. v. Wideman, on the French treaty, 3 Bar Rep., 719, (1866,) cited by the attorney general, differs in this, that there one party, France, gave a notice to England with a view to terminating an existing treaty at a defined time, and that by agreement that notice was actually withdrawn and was extended, and, beyond question, the identical treaty was in force, and therefore the act of Parliament continued to give effect to it. But Lord Chancellor Cranworth, in his judgment, appears to me by his line of argument to admit that if the ultimate time of notice for determining the treaty had expired, and if the treaty had terminated, the act to put that treaty in force in reference to any future treaty could not have been revived except by re-enactment. Lord Cranworth appears to have thought a new act of Parliament would have been required to work it out, but in the present case a reference to and comparison of Article 9 of the Bogue treaty of 1843, and with Article 21 of the Tien-tsin treaty of 1858, shows a difference of detail, not merely abrogation and re-enactment, even which alone Lord Cranworth appears to have thought enough to require a new act of Parliament. The attorney general suggested that No. 7 of 1864, par. 84, implicitly declares No. 2 of 1850 to be still in force, being contained in a new edition of the ordinances stamped with the seal of the colony. The words are, "the copies so stamped shall in all courts and upon all occasions whatsoever be taken, deemed, and held to be the only lawful ordinances of Hong-Kong, as they existed at the date of the passing of the last ordinance inserted therein." I read these words as merely excluding all necessity of reference to ordinances not inserted, and as in no way a re-enactment of all the inserted ordinances, and it certainly does not affect to give the included ordinances a force which they had not immediately before the date of the enactment in 1864. I do not say that even this limited construction should be adopted, because it might possibly lead to very alarming consequences, to which it is unnecessary for me here further to allude. I cannot adopt this suggestion as a ground for upholding No. 2 of 1850. It is clear to me that the principles and provisions of the extradition act of last sessions are such that if the treaty of 1858 were now for the first time to be carried into effect by order in council under that act, the provisions would be very different from those of No. 2 of 1850.

FOURTH POINT.—No rendition, because crime charged is piracy and justiciable here.—Mr. Francis contends that the offense for which the prisoner stands committed is piracy on the high seas, and that such piracy is not within the treaty or the ordinance No. 2 of 1850, because it is justiciable here. The arguments by which Mr. Francis justifies this point appear to me to be convincing so far as they go. But the attorney general with great ingenuity subdivides this point into three, and Mr. Francis has answered these distinctions. I leave the arguments as I find them; it would lead me into far too great length to criticise them. I shall merely state that my conclusion is that the opinions of Sirs J. Harding, F. Thesiger, and Fitzroy Kelly were manifestly come to in reference to a case in which the Chinese charged with murders were designated "emigrants"—free emigrants—not containing any suggested element of compulsion or original coercion of them, which distinguishes that case from the present, and further that it appears to me the decision in re Ternan, 9 Cox, C. C., 522, and 33 Law J. M., C. 201, and the observations of the judges in that case, are inconsistent with that opinion. I must follow the decision in re Terran, especially as the principle appears to have been approved of in America—see re J. C. Bennett, 11 L. Times, 485—and say in this case as was said in that, the crime, “if anything,” is piracy, and being justiciable here if there be any crime, there is no ground for giving up the man. It is beyond doubt that political criminals are not to be given up, though within the letter of the treaty, neither is a Chinese subject to be given up if justiciable here, e. g., for piracy. Again, a culprit, to adopt the line of argument used by Shee, J., 33 L. J. M., C. 216, cannot be said to come within the terms of the treaty or of the ordinance in which the preamble confines the enactment to such as have “taken refuge” here; he being justiciable here, he cannot be said “to take refuge” in a place which is no “refuge” to him, and he is not, therefore, within the treaty of Tien-tsin, the only existing treaty, even if that treaty is provided for by No. 2 of 1850. I shall subsequently consider fully whether this man’s act was a crime at all. In Naylor v. Palmer, 10 Ex. Rep., 338, S. C. 22, L. J. Ex., 329, the case of seizure by 360 coolies of the Victoria, on her voyage from Macao to Callao in Peru, and another case, Kleinworth v. Sheppard, 28 L. J. Q. B., 147, the case of seizure by 350 coolies of the Henriette Marie on a voyage from Macao to Havana, each case turning on the construction of marine insurance policies, the courts held between insurer and insured, that the acts of revolt and taking the ships by Chinese emigrants constituted piracy.

FIFTH POINT.—Nothing authorizing the magistrate to act.—This point is that there was nothing to give the magistrate jurisdiction. The attorney general contends that a requisition of rendition might be verbal merely. But section 1 of No. 2 of 1850 requires the information of the Chinese officers to be made or forwarded to the magistrate or court. This may possibly, but not probably, mean that the Chinese officer is at liberty without writing in person to prefer the information to the court acting magisterially in the matter, but I am of opinion that if he does not do that, it means that the information must be “forwarded,” which is consistent only with the sending on of some material thing which here is a written information. I conclude that the information must be, if the officer does not attend in person, by a writing by himself, and that the identical writing must be forwarded in such way as that it should reach the court exercising jurisdiction in the case, which is the magistrate only. Now this condition was not complied with; it does not appear that any Chinese officer ever made any requisition at all, much less that any one such officer did so in writing, so that it could be forwarded. The colonial secretary, in his letter of February 3, states that the British consul at Canton did what he had no authority to do, what the Chinese officer alone had authority to do. Therefore the whole proceeding before Mr. May was unauthorized and of no force in law. The attorney general refers to a dispatch from the colonial office in 1865, which states that a British consul should either be the medium of or sanction all applications by the Chinese officials making it, but that dispatch does not substitute the British consul, still less the colonial secretary, for that Chinese official. The dispatch did not, and could not, alter any enactment. As a lawyer, I thought the letter of the colonial secretary of the 3d of February last, even if that were the proper document to initiate Mr. May’s proceeding, too meager, as the only statement of the charge giving jurisdiction to the magistrate to proceed against this man, and as the foundation of a proceeding in which in the words of the treaty, “upon proof of guilt,” (proof only in this colony,) this man was to be given up. I desired to obtain out of the colonial office for several purposes the proceedings on former renditions, but for reasons thought sufficient in that office the production was declined. I had thought that the form employed by the colonial secretary might have been justified by precedent. The colonial secretary might, not being a lawyer, have reasonably thought the terms of his letter sufficient, especially if it were according to precedent; and if I could have found in the precedents that such form had been usually adopted, it might possibly have justified its adoption in this case. I stated in court my inability to obtain these important precedents from the government office, whereupon Mr. Francis produced to me the parliamentary paper, House of Commons papers, (1835,) No. 120, relating to the rendition and execution of Mo-Wang. On perusing these papers I see at p. 7 that the precedent there was an information against Mo-Wang by the acting Chinese governor of the Two Kwang provinces, in form equal to, if not exceeding in length and particularity of times, place, crime, and circumstances, an indictment in an English court of justice, addressed to the acting governor of Hong-Kong, accompanied by a long letter of requisition addressed to the British consul at Canton, both being duly forwarded by the same British consul to the then acting governor here, whereon the police magistrate acted. This precedent confirms, so far as the only precedent I can obtain can do so, my conviction that the absence of such particularity by a Chinese official is fatal to Mr. May’s jurisdiction in this case. This conclusion is confirmed by authority. In the case of Geëk, a German woman, whose rendition was claimed for murder, the honorable C. Cushing, the Attorney General for the United States, took a like objection to the requisition in that case, as insufficient for vagueness. Forsyth, C. & O., 351. Having in February last after argument reserved my decision, which was delayed for the reasons I have stated, I, on the 22d and 28th of March instant, heard a summons issued at the instance of the prosecution, whereby the prisoner was required to show cause why the warrant of committal and return to the writ of habeas corpus should not be amended upon an affidavit filed by Mr. May, by inserting therein the words "forwarded to me" in the place of "received." On the hearing of this summons, I said I thought it right that a statement made to me on a previous hearing by Mr. May should appear upon the proceedings, and on behalf of the prisoner Mr. Francis filed an affidavit, made in consequence of that suggestion, by Mr. May, to the effect that the paragraph containing the charge of murder, &c., at the commencement of the proceedings next after the statement of the names of the parties, to which I have before referred, was not written on the depositions until after the committal had been signed by him. I am of opinion that I ought not to entertain this application, because it comes too late, and moreover, because if it had been made earlier, it appears from Mr. May's affidavit of the 28th of March that there was nothing in the proceedings on which the commitment could be corrected. Moreover, I am of opinion that the letter of Mr. Robertson is not a due requisition by the Chinese authorities under the treaty, nor a complaint by a Chinese official duly "made or forwarded" within the ordinance No. 2 of 1850. However, the application to amend is before me, and the prosecution may have from another tribunal a decision differing from that to which I have come on this point. Mr. Francis objects that section 4 of No. 2 of 1850 rendered a warrant from the governor to the magistrate necessary, to give jurisdiction to the latter. I am of opinion that if due requisition had been forwarded to Mr. May, no such warrant would have been necessary. This fifth point being directed to the jurisdiction of the magistrate, I think I may more conveniently than under any other head here allude to a point of practice in the exercise of his jurisdiction which occurs to me.

I. Evidence must be sufficient to justify a "true bill."—A point arises out of an extract from a dispatch, No. 40, of 11th April, 1863, from his grace the then colonial secretary, which was handed to me by the attorney general, in which, on the assumption that there was some competent jurisdiction here to carry out the treaty of 1858, his grace says, in an extract from a dispatch, (I asked for, but I did not get the whole dispatch, as explanatory by the context of the extract.) "It is at the same time quite clear, on the letter of the Tien-tsin treaty, that it is only on proof of their guilt that Chinese criminals can be demanded;" and adding, "on this head I have to instruct you that as a general rule reasonable evidence ought to be accepted as sufficient," (none other is required on trial for murder in any British court,) "such for example as would lead a grand jury in this country to find a true bill, where the evidence is ex parte only." Now, I stop here because in this case the evidence was ex parte only. Adopting as our guide these instructions from the colonial office, Mr. May's finding is, that "there is cause to believe that the said defendant is a subject of China, and that he has committed the said crime against the laws of China." This finding does not even express what Mr. May actually believed, it is not equivalent to a "true bill" by a grand jury, which, according to the high authority of his grace, the then colonial secretary, it ought to be to bring this man within the rendition treaty. Now, here the man was charged with murder, and with murder only, in the only document before Mr. May, the letter of the colonial secretary of 3d of February, 1871, (if it can be said to have been before him,) it was not competent for Mr. May, the magistrate, assuming this letter to be a sufficient charge as to murder to inquire or to commit for larceny, as not being within the alleged claim of rendition confined to the charge of murder, the magistrate does not find that the man is guilty of murder, as the conviction in his mind as a grand juror, or that the charge of murder is true, which is the meaning of a "true bill." According to Chitty, (1 Criminal Law, 317.) "the grand jury ought not to find a true bill, unless they are convinced of the guilt of the defendant?" For this he cites abundant authority and references to considerations of humanity, far more cogent, as applied to Chinese subjects resident in this colony, than to English-accused persons in England. Now, here Mr. May does not, and he could not upon the evidence before him, express a finding equivalent to a "true bill," he ought therefore to have discharged this prisoner. Moreover, a grand jury could find a "true bill" only for the crime charged, that is murder, and not for any less or other crime, (Id., p. 325.)

II. Special reason for term in treaty of "upon proof of guilt."—I cannot but think that his grace, the then colonial secretary, if his consideration had been directed to the special reasons for the terms of the treaty, "upon proof of guilt," (an expression which, as it was admitted by the attorney general, is not to be found in any other treaty,) would have seen a conclusive reason why this country assumed, as to alleged Chinese fugitives from justice here, the right to ascertain the absolute guilt of such fugitives as fully as this country, in fact, assumed that China could not be trusted as a nation to do justice within her own territories. It was assumed by Great Britain that it was necessary for her to deny the common international right of exclusive sovereignty to the Emperor of China to judge foreigners, being English subjects within his own territory, and we so far superseded, for our protection, his imperial rights, even in China. I hold that, not trusting China to administer justice, even in China, but creating a (British) imperium in (a Chinese) imperio in China, the intent and meaning of the clause "upon proof of guilt," a clause which the attorney general could not find in any other treaty, in the treaty of 1858, had emphatically this special meaning, that we were not to render up a Chinese subject, to whom on his sojourn here Great Britain owed protection, per Turner L. J., in Low vs. Routledge, L. R., (1 Chan. App., p. 42,) without our having ourselves judiciously ascertained the guilt of the man accused, and demanded as fully as upon a trial by a jury, which tribunal convicts on evidence, which amounts to "on proof of guilt," and on no higher evidence than these words import the guilt so ascertained can only be of the identical crime charged, and of no other.

III. Was No. 2 of 1850 defective?—I must as shortly as possible allude to another difficulty, which occurs to me as to the jurisdiction of the magistrate in this case. The ninth article of the "abrogated" treaty of the Bogue of 1843, contained in two branches, two conditions on which a Chinese subject was to be given up. The second branch provided for rendition in case of a Chinese demanding "on proof of guilt." It would seem that the draughtsman of No. 2 of 1850 overlooked and made no provision for this clause, but that he gave his whole attention to and provided only for the most prominent, the first branch in the clause in the treaty, and he then adopted provisions for a form of procedure applicable only to treaties between European nations, such, for instance, as in 6 and 7 Vic., cap. 75 and 76, where provision is made for rendition on merely a prima facie case, and not "upon proof of guilt." Now the first branch of article nine of the abrogated treaty of 1843 not having been included in the substituted article in the treaty of Tien-tsin, the clause in the ordinance appears to be inapplicable to that new treaty, because it does not, after providing for the mere preliminary inquiry before the magistrate, provide a tribunal for the actual trial, either in the supreme court or by constituting the executive council a court for the purpose, where there may be "a proof of guilt" against the accused. I hope that the intended revision of our treaty with China as to rendition, and a consequent legislation will, not destroying due protection to Chinese in Hong-Kong, provide better for the objects contemplated, as we are led to hope from Mr. Holland's evidence in Par. Papers, H. of C., No. 393, (1868.)

SIXTH POINT. Is the offense as it is charged, if proved, an offense against the laws of China?—This point suggests that the offense charged is not an offense against the laws of China. The offense, if any charge, is murder. I am clearly of opinion that the crime, if any, charge being murder, the prisoner, if an Englishman, would by English statute law in force in this colony have been triable here, according to the case of R. vs. Azzopardi, 2 Moore C. C., 283, (see 1 Russell on Crimes, p. 730,) cited by the attorney general, and as I must for all purposes on this hearing (that the contrary not being proved) hold that the laws of China are the same as the laws here, I must hold that this objection would fail if the charge had been properly preferred, which I think it has not been, therefore Mr. Francis fails on this point.

Right to rendition is confined to crimes committed within the country demanding it.—Involved, however, in this point, is the fact proved beyond question that the crime "charged" was an act committed on the high seas, and also on board what is said to be a French ship. This opens another objection to this demand of rendition by China. I readily follow the very high English, the highest individual authority in England, which lays down broadly that "the country demanding the criminal must be the country in which the crime is committed." 1 Phil. Inter. Law, p. 403. If this be good law, as I must hold it to be, and if the opinion given in Alsop's case, Forsyth C. & O., 363, and if the opinion of Cushing, attorney general, was properly adopted and acted on in the United States in David's case, ib. 331, then China cannot have in this case the right to demand rendition, because the crime, murder, for which rendition is said to be claimed, was committed at sea and not in China. Assume what is not, (but which ought to be proved, R. vs. Bjarnsen, 10 Cox, c. c. 74,) that this was a French ship, should a claim for the rendition of this man, by France, be acceded to? The same very high authority would say "No, the usual course is to refuse the request of both applicants." 1 Phil. I. L., p. 414.

SEVENTH POINT.—The depositions disclose no offense whatever.—Mr. Francis contends that the depositions disclose no offense whatever, assuming for this purpose that on all his other points he has failed. He wisely left it for the attorney general to prove the affirmative, to show what offense if any this man had committed, that onus being on the accuser. The attorney general selected portions of the depositions, which if true clearly showed that the prisoner was active in the China coolie rising, and that he took part in the fight in which the captain and eight of the crew were killed. This fact is, as I assume, not denied by Mr. Francis, but he adopts very pertinently the well-known rule of evidence in criminal cases that the hypothesis of delinquency must be consistent with all the facts proved. He suggests that the inference from the evidence, all tainted more or less by coercion on the Chinese witnesses (one manifestly with the sword suspended over his neck) by animosity in the French seamen, is that all these coolies were in fact under coercion, amounting to unjustifiable and entirely illegal imprisonment, that they all had, according to English law, the right to regain their inalienable personal liberty as much as if it were to save their lives, and that they did no more. In the absence of proof that any other law prevailed, I must, as before said, assume for the purposes of this decision that the law of this colony must be applied; it is to try the questions before me as if the ship were an English ship of this colony, carrying these coolies on the high seas; and for the purpose of this point I also assume that these depositions returned by Mr. May comprise all the evidence, however much I may suspect that further evidence might have been, and whatever further evidence I may think, on so serious a charge as murder, ought to have been produced for the prosecution in reference to this man. I hold that the prisoner was beyond question under unlawful coercion, assuming, as I must and do assume, the law on board the Nouvelle Penelope to be the same as the English law here is, and on the authority of the Felicidade, Den. C. C., reserved, vol. 1, pp. 104-154, referred to and commented on in 1 Phil. Int. Law, 333-334, it is to me clear that according to English law a man under unlawful restraint of his personal liberty at sea, as well as on shore, has a right to take life to free himself from such constraint on his personal liberty; and further, on the authority before cited, to use his masters' or captors' property necessary to effect his object, that object being in itself not only a lawful but a laudable object. This would seem to be the first law of nature, the right of self-preservation, of liberty equally with life, which is fully sustained by text-books and cases. Anderson's case is this, that even if in a slave State where slavery is lawful, a slave kills any man in that State who endeavors to prevent his gaining liberty by flying into Canada, in Canada, and in every court of judicature under the imperial Crown, such slaying is not murder, and such a man is not to be given up, on demand by the State in which the killing occurred. See Anderson's case, Forsyth C. & O., 373; see also Mr. Hammond's squestion, 243, evidence, H. of C. Papers 1853, No. 393. Neither is it a crime to take a horse to aid this escape of a slave; see Forsyth, C. & O., p. 370. The case of the Creole is almost identical with the present; though demanded, the slaves were not given up; see 1 Phil. Int. Law, 333-34. The 1st volume Russell on Crime abounds with cases tending to prove these propositions. It is clear from the evidence that this prisoner and the coolies were being taken forcibly against their wills (there is certainly no evidence of consent by the prisoner) to a destination they desired not to go to; this is manifest in the depositions; from the wailings of some of the coolies; from the declaration by others, to the number of 100, that they had been kidnapped; from the marching the coolies on board under an escort of soldiers at Macao as if they had been convicts, and by the acts of desperation by two of the coolies, who jumped overboard to put an end to their miserable lives, successful (may I not say happily successful) in one case. I hold that this coercion, enforced as it was by cannon planted, and raking the coolies' dens, and by grape-shot in reserve against these coolies, was a crime irrespective of the acts to abolish slavery. Again, the law quoted from Mr. Justice Forster in 1 Russell, p. 295, is thus stated: A man may repel force in defence of his person, habitation, or property, against one who manifestly intends and endeavors by violence or surprise to commit a known felony upon either, and the very exception mentioned by Forster, "this rule does not apply to any crime unaccompanied with force, as picking pockets," points the rule as including such force and coercion as were here applied.

An English grand jury would find "No bill."—Upon these facts I naturally ask myself what would be the finding of an English grand jury against this prisoner Kwok-Asing. A passage in the life of Sir T. Powell Buxton, an English grand juror, illustrates this matter. The firmness of purpose of that broad-minded philanthropist and eminent man to move in the House of Commons in support of the emancipation of the slaves, was severely tried by a suggestion that it would occasion a slave insurrection in the West Indies. And now comes his estimate of the value of personal liberty, and his notion of the right of the enslaved man to assert his liberty. "If," said he, (p. 107,) "a servile war should break out, and 50,000 perish, how should I like that?" He met this extreme supposition thus: "If I had two sons I would rather choose to have one free and one dead, than both living enslaved." These words show that he would as a grand juror have found no bill against this prisoner. That was said in the reign of George the IV. There were grand jurors in that reign who differed from him, but A. D. 1871, I believe that every grand jury in England would find "No bill" against this man on the depositions, and upon like reasoning. For myself, I must say, that however horrible was the scene of contest and the carnage on board the Nouvelle Penelope, the depositions disclose such acts of enslavement and of illegal coercion on the part of the captain and his agents, all the testimony being ex parte out of the mouths of the coerced or hostile witnesses for the prosecution, as show that there was no violence or robbery beyond what was absolutely necessary to regain liberty, and that this prisoner, Kwok-Asing, was guilty of no offense cognizable by English law. If I had to charge a grand jury as judge, I should so lay down the law, and if I were a grand juror myself I should upon an indictment for either murder, manslaughter, or robbery, find "No bill" against this man.

Conclusion in law that prisoner ought to go free.—I have now disposed of the seven points raised by Mr. Francis, against which the attorney general has most strenuously and ably argued; but both facts and law appear to be in the main against his contention. Without again specially referring to all the points, I must now, apart from all moral and political considerations, and after discussing and confining myself to dry legal questions merely as such, conclude that as to the seventh point, as I must hold Mr. Francis' contention sustained; and that as to some or one of his other six points, and of the other points suggested by me, the decision must be in favor of the prisoner, and it is enough in law if he succeeds on any one point. Mr. Francis has established to my mind clearly the right of his client, Kwok-Asing, to an order by this court for his discharge from the custody in which he now is. Upon the depositions I hold him free from all charge of crime on board the Nouvelle Penelope.

Was the Nouvelle Penelope a slave-ship?—I have long and most anxiously hesitated whether this case calls on me to do more than decide the dry legal questions on which I have given my opinion, considering that merely for my judicial decision in the present case, such further inquiry is not absolutely necessary; but I feel that any judicial consideration of the subject on a review of my decision would be incomplete if attention were not directed to the consideration of the six questions which I hastily sketched out, and at the end of the argument desired to be discussed before me. The attorney general, as he had a perfect right to do, declined to offer any observations on them. The ground taken by him (in which I do not concur) was that the questions were raised on supposititious facts, of which he said there was no evidence upon the depositions. I propose to examine the depositions and to see whether the foundation of facts is so merely ideal as it seemed to him to be. I am also clearly of opinion that it is my duty to open up every question as to the Macao cooly trade which may tend to exculpate or inculpate either the prisoner and the coolies on the one hand, or the captain and crew of the ship on the other. The following are the six questions which I put:

THE FIRST QUESTION.—In case the Nouvelle Penelope had been a British ship carrying these coolies on the high seas under the circumstances proved by depositions, would she or would she not have come within the 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, and would or would not the captain under that act have been subject to suffer death, "as pirates, felons, and robbers upon the seas ought to suffer," up to 1 Vict., c. 91, when the penalty was lessened to transportation for a period of not less than fifteen years?

This question is expressly confined by its terms to the facts disclosed in evidence ("under the circumstances proved by the depositions.") In the argument it was in effect insisted by the attorney general that I must assume that the law on board the ship was the same as the English law. I therefore asked, as I think pertinently, as the attorney general thought unnecessarily, what would the ship as an English ship be according to that law under the provisions of the consolidated slave-trade act, 5 Geo. 4, cap. 113? In the absence of argument on this point I may err, but I must come to such conclusions as I best can. I turn to the light of the interpretation of 6 and 7 Vic. c. 98, sec. 2, as to what persons are slaves, and find that all persons holden, i. e., for the time being, without reference to the length of holding for life or for years, that all persons holden in servitude as pledges for debt, and commonly called "pawns," (in China, "pigs.") or by any other name, are to be considered as slaves within the scope of the slave-trade acts. Again, the legal test of slavery is this: Is the man held at the time within the control, as to his actions, of another or of himself, jus alieni, as distinguished from jus sui? and I never saw any distinction authoritatively drawn between this status being for life, or for a term of years. How easily would the slave-trade acts have been evaded if "engaging" Africans for years, say twenty or eight years, instead of holding them for life, had been resorted to as a subterfuge. It appears to me that ever since the jus gentium there never was a jus omium gentium, or, as it is better expressed, jus inter gentes, or international law, which originally existed only among nations professing the Christian religion. The taking and keeping of white men as slaves has been held to be "contrary to the rule of immutable justice and eternal right," as forcibly expressed by Sir R. Phillimore in 1 International Law, p. 316 to 318. It seems to me that the slave-trade as confined to negroes was tolerated in Christendom as an exception, and only as an exception to this general rule of prohibition which had imperceptibly grown up, and that it was excused solely on the ground of the alleged low status in the scale of humanity of the black man. That the Chinese come within our definition of the white man is clear, not only from their color, but from their culture as a nation, with a literature studied with respect and profit by the wisest men of Europe, and from the diffusion of education among them, which is probably more general as to reading and writing than in France. Probably a greater percentage of the coolies on board the Nouvelle Penelope could read and write than among the like number of conscripts in France in the late war. At the sessions for this month, a legal contract was produced in a criminal case before me, drawn by a cooly, one of the class of men from which these kidnapped coolies are taken, which for propriety and clearness would have been creditable to any man in any station of life in England. Were the prisoner and his fellows not the equals in learning of the crew holding them as slaves? Without further preface to this circumstance, the consolidated slave-trade act, 5 Geo. 4, (as explained by subsequent enactments,) by 9th section provides that any subject of England who shall thenceforth upon the high seas knowingly carry or remove, or assist in carrying or removing any person as a slave, or for the purpose of his being brought as a slave into any territory whatsoever, or for the purpose of his being sold as a slave, or who shall detain on board any ship any such person, shall be adjudged guilty of piracy, felony, and robbery, and being convicted thereof shall suffer death "as pirates, felons, and robbers upon the seas ought to suffer," and by section 10, merely to fit out or use a ship for any such purpose is declared felony, with transportation not exceeding fourteen years. There are other sections casting a very large net to catch offenders. I will assume from its general terms that this act prohibits dealing in white Chinamen as slaves as well as Englishmen and the abased African. Now, upon the depositions alone:

1st. Was this a slave-ship?

2d. Were the Chinamen on board slaves according to the true intent and meaning of the statutes?

1st. Was this ship a slaver?—As to the fitting up of this ship, Paul Parrot, one of the crew, states:

"The barrier across the deck, abaft the mainmast, was constructed of strong wood, about four inches square, seven or eight feet high. There were two open-barred doors opening aft in the barrier, and there was a cannon at each door with the muzzle pointed forward. The cannon were not loaded. The coolies were not allowed to go aft of the barrier. There was a sentry at one door during the day, and the doors were closed during the night. The coolies were all below during the night, and one of the crew stationed at the gangway. The coolies were not allowed to come up during the night excepting for necessary purposes. The crew were all berthed aft of the barrier. The ship's arms were in the saloon and captain's cabin. About twelve muskets and bayonets, some swords, and about twenty revolvers. These latter were in the captain's cabin. I know that there was gunpowder on board and some grape-shot. There was no grape shot kept on deck." According to the cases this appears to me to be prima facie evidence not rebutted of the fitting up of a slaver.

2d. Were the Chinamen on board slaves?—I assume, as I have before said, that white men, i. e., in this case Chinamen, are within the acts. I collect the evidence of the treatment to which this prisoner and the other coolies were subjected from the depositions. The chief witness, Wong Ahee, for the prosecution, deposed thus, under threats from a kidnapper, whom I consider as an agent for the captain. I expressed to the authorities my willingness to become an emigrant to Peru, but in my heart I was not willing, and I was afraid to say so, because Chea Ahfook (the kidnapper) told me if I did not say I was ready to go, I should be sent to Canton and have my head cut off! We find from the same witness also (p. 2) that three days after they sailed one of the "emigrants"!! jumped overboard and was drowned, and that the chief mate beat some of the coolies for playing at Muntan. This witness further said:

"I was angry with Chea Ahfook for deceiving me. I did not want to go to Peru, but I was forced to go on board ship. When I went on board I was followed by two or three foreigners, and some of those belonging to the 'barracoon.' I mean, I and the party of about thirty coolies that went on board with me. Some of these were willing to go, some were unwilling, some told me that they came willingly, others that they had been kidnapped, and we talked over the matter. Some said that they would have to work eight years, and perhaps would not live to return to their country. I never talked about getting means to free ourselves." Paul Perrot, one of the crew, deposes that while at Macao, and before sailing from Macao for Callao, a cooly jumped overboard and tried to swim to shore, and was picked up and put in irons for an hour; and that on the 3d October, when out of sight of land, one other cooly jumped overboard and was drowned, though a boat was lowered, thus preferring death to the coercion to which he was subjected, and who will blame a choice for which many an European has been enlorged as a hero, in preferring death to slavery. The same witness, one of the crew, describes how the coolies were taken on board, guarded as convicts would be:

"180 coolies were brought on board the first day. They came off in three boats; there were three, four, or five Portuguese soldiers in each boat with muskets and fixed bayonets. All the remainder of the coolies came on board in three or four boats the day before sailing, each boat had some armed soldiers on board. One of those that first came on board was crying, and the same night he jumped overboard, he was picked up out of the water, all the others were quiet, they had freedom to go where they pleased about the ship."

One of the witnesses, Chun Apew, a petty trader of Canton, who, having lost all his capital in gambling, had voluntarily gone to Macao to "emigrate," an example of the easy descent from the gambling table to the barracoon and slave ship, deposed as follows:

"On the 30th September, during the night, the vessel sailed, having 310 coolies on board. Many of the coolies appeared willing to go, but many others said that they had been kidnapped and were obliged to go. I believe that about one hundred said they had been kidnapped."

Coming as all this evidence does from the witnesses for the prosecution, uncontradicted, I believe, (though the attorney general calls it mere hearsay evidence,) that what they said among themselves when there was nothing to be gained by stating other than the truth, and according to fact. Out of 310 coolies this one man heard, and I believe what he says to be true, that 100 coolies said that they had been kidnapped. How many more of these coolies had been kidnapped does not appear. The attorney general contended that the captain was not answerable for the fact that these coolies were kidnapped. I abstain from attempting to measure his mere moral responsibility: but for the purpose of measuring the alleged guilt of the prisoner, I must consider that the captain, being in a "trade" notorious for its crimes, of kidnapping especially, was prima facie in law responsible for the kidnapping and fitting up of the ship, and the detention of the coolies on board, and if the circumstances raise a presumption against the captain that he knew that one only of the coolies on board had been kidnapped, then I think that in an English ship, fitted up as this ship was, he would be guilty of piracy within section 9 of 5 Geo. 4. Again, can I shut my eyes to the passages throughout the depositions, showing that these coolies or many of them had been inmates of and had been taken on board from out of barracoons, not said to be even under government supervision in Macao, that they had been thence marched under military escort to the boats, and accompanied to this ship by soldiers with "muskets and fixed bayonets." The attorney general described this captain as being a French gentleman; he was, then, a man of intelligence. He was for a long time at Macao; he must be taken to know something of the "trade" in which he was engaged, and he must be taken to have known how as prisoners these coolies were escorted on board. He must have known where and as applied to what infamous purpose the word "barracoon" was first used. He must have known that the word has been imported into Macao from Africa, that it indicates a place dedicated to the same infamous purposes as in Africa. He must have known that the word at first meant and still means a building to hold slaves with a view to their deportation, if he did not know the definition in Webster's dictionary, that it is "a slave warehouse, or an inclosure where slaves are quartered."

I now follow these poor wretches to their miserable prison on board the ship, and the witnesses produced for the prosecution, there were no others, describe scenes which one would think must excite universal commiseration and sympathy for the coolies and execration of the "trade," if not of the traders.

"On the 3d of October between twenty and thirty of the coolies who were on the lower deck were crying, and exclaiming they had been kidnapped. A man named Kao-koong-mahn was talking to them. I heard him say, 'Do not cry, my brothers; in two days more we shall go back to China.' From hearing that I suspected that something was intended, but with that exception all was quiet and orderly. There was no disturbance. The same day one of the coolies jumped overboard and was drowned. The coolies had plenty to eat, and the crew of the vessel did not ill use them in any way."

What a scene, twenty or thirty coolies crying and exclaiming they had been kidnapped! Is it to be presumed that the captain so separated himself from what was passing on board that he was in happy ignorance of these lamentations? I think the contrary is the presumption, and seeing where these men were, I assume that the words "kidnapped" men and slaves are synonymous terms, as a matter of intendment and common sense. I believe that no captain of an African slave-ship ever took his miserable victims from the gold coast with more full knowledge of the wrong he was doing to humanity than this captain had from the time he left Macao to the moment of his death—of the slavery, the misery he was inflicting on his live cargo. It is notorious that the cost of the saleable article "man" laid down in Callao is about $60 and under $80; the price of this same saleable article "man" in Callao varies from $350 to $450; one successful voyage on this average exceeding some $50,000 profit. These considerations aggravate the crime towards these coolies, and towards this man as one of them, and show that the chief offender in this matter was the captain, and not this man, who costing the captain not $80 was expected to realize to the captain at least $350. The conclusion follows that, if this ship had been an English ship, and if the captain had been an Englishman, he would by law be a pirate, and punishable as such. I am yet to find the lawyer who questions the right of any man to effect his own liberty even by killing a pirate, if that be necessary. Was the suicide by a cooly a murder by the captain? I merely glance at one other point. One of the coolies, with the only attributable object of ending his distress by death, threw himself from the vessel into the sea. Why? Could he have any other assignable motive than to terminate his illegal imprisonment, and to set himself free by death? Did the illegal coercion of the captain occasion this act? Was it or not the murder of this man? There are cases in the first volume of Russell on the subject, but as the answer is not necessary to my decision of the case before me, I leave it to others to solve this question. I now proceed to consider my

SECOND QUESTION.—In case this prisoner and the other coolies had valuable property, as was in the case of the Annamites, which the captain had taken from them, and was keeping in his cabin, and was taken, and keeping their persons and their property on the high seas, would or would not the taking the property by the captain have been piracy, or at least such a state of circumstances as would have justified their rising, and, if necessary, killing the captain to regain their property and liberty?

In it I assumed it to be possible that the attorney general would have answered, and with cogent arguments, the first question in the negative. Without such arguments I have answered it according to my light in the affirmative. The object of this second question was to raise what is the obvious right of a man robbed to recover his property feloniously taken, and kept from him, and assuming the right which appears to me indisputable, to take from the robber by force, and at the risk of life, property res estimabilis when it is feloniously withheld. I raised the question, (if that be the right of an owner of property against a robber,) whether a man whose person is stolen, whose liberty libertas res inestimabilis is gone, has not the same right to take the life of the robber of his person and liberty in order to recover its absolute possession. To me, in the absence of argument to the contrary, the mere statement of the question answers itself in favor of the prisoner.

THIRD QUESTION.—Would or would not the coolies on board the Nouvelle Penelope in either case come within the designation of slaves, according to the definition in section 11 of 6 Vic. c. 98?

Confined as this question is to the evidence in the depositions, there is nothing, as it appears to me, to take the status of the prisoner, Kwok Asing, out of that of slavery.

FOURTH, FIFTH, AND SIXTH QUESTIONS.—No argument having thrown doubt on the preceding questions, it seems to me that I may group the remaining, the 4th, 5th, and 6th questions; they are as follows:

4. Is there any, and if any, what difference in the status of slavery as dealt with by the statutes collected in 1 Russ., chap. 18, p. 243, ed. 1865, whether that status was originally brought about legally or illegally, by kidnapping or by voluntary consent to go?

5. According to English law, can a man by consent become or be a slave, and does his consent affect or not affect his status or the criminality or innocence of the person holding him in slavery?

6. Can he contract away his liberty any more than he can contract away his life, and if taking the prisoner's life with his consent (e. g., shooting him) would be murder, would or would not taking his liberty with like consent subject the taker of the liberty to the same penalties as if it had been originally taken by force?

I will consider them together, and say that it seems to me that a now present status of slavery is as much within the words, as it is within the spirit, of the statutes against the slave-trade, whether such slavery was originally brought about legally or illegally, by kidnapping or by a forced or even by voluntary consent.

The views put forth in this colony compel me to refer to what elsewhere is assumed as axioms. Christianity teaches us that God made man in his own image, and breathed into him the breath of life—eternal life. It does so happen that this Christianity is the law of England, of this colony; and modern European philosophy in its own refined language teaches much the same doctrine of man's equality with man, only (as it assumes) on a rather more subtle hypothesis. Well content as I am, and, as judge, must be with the law of the land, I must answer the question: Is it possible that such a being as man can according to law, a science of development, according to the law of A. D. 1871, become a slave, even by his own consent, I say it is impossible in law, as Sir R. Phillimore, v. 1, p. 316, has said in a passage I read with the most respectful concurrence, but too long for full quotation: "Of this great truth its sound has at last gone out into all lands, and its voice into the ends of the world." A man can no more, as I infer from the same high authority, by contract, be authorized to take the liberty than to take the life of another. The proposition long enunciated by Locke, (who was in almost a minority of one in his time,) a proposition now universally accepted in morals, appears to me to flow from the first principles of English law, as they have been developed at the present time. French law is the same as English law as to the right to personal liberty: "En France quiconque a mis le pied dans ce royaume est gratifié, de la liberté!" 1 Phill. International Law, 341. France and Portugal by treaty with England, bought from Portugal by money, and by their internal laws, have each abolished the slave-trade, and by treaties between all European, and I believe all American nations and England, the slave-trade has been abolished, and I read in Sir R. Phillimore's great work that France has over and over again declared it to be piratical. As yet English and foreign decisions have in most cases, but not universally, refrained from declaring the slave-trade piracy jure gentium, jure inter gentes; but these decisions were before the universality of these treaties, and when a case shall next raise the question after all recent treaties in the highest court of judicature for solemn decision, may we not expect that by international law, being a law of development, it will be held, that as between all nations who have by treaty declared the slave-trade to be piracy, it has become jure inter has gentes piracy? And has not Portugal, has not France, so declared over and over again, and is it not therefore in reference to these flags internationally piracy?

The Macao coolie slave-trade.—This brings me to the Macao coolie slave-trade. It was so designated by the Right Hon. E. W. Forster, speaking from the opposition benches, and deplored as such by the present Lord Derby, as the then foreign minister, speaking from the ministerial benches in the House of Commons, on the 26th of June, 1868, as I read in the Times' report of the following day now before me. These authorities, the utterances by eminently representative men, justify the same designation everywhere by every man under the British crown. I was in hopes from assurances I received at Macao in 1864 that these "atrocities" were at an end, and laboring under the gravest mistake, I in our colonial legislature congratulated this colony on the 30th day of March, 1870, on the event. But this "atrocious" trade has increased of late, and coolies are now taken off just as the coolies on board the Nouvelle Penelope, to an estimated average number of 1,000 a month, and are in like manner banished from China, to miserable lingering deaths, chiefly in Peru, where by recent news 2,000 coolies have gone off into the mountains armed, in open revolt. It has been argued before me that because some forms of examination are said to have been gone into in Macao, said to be according to the law of Macao, that such forms said to be created by law in Macao so satisfied some exception to the general prior Portuguese law (the abrogation of which, being contrary to express treaty obligations, would be a casus belli against her) as to justify the treating these poor fellows and the holding them piratically as slaves; but at least the general law of Portugal remains applicable unless the terms of the legal, if there be any, exception, is proved, to be and if any such be compatible with treaty and general law. It must also be proved that all the conditions of Macao exemption have been complied with in each particular case. Failure in proof of compliance with any requisite to the exception vitiates the exception, (see Jean Bareant's case, 1 Phill. Inter. Law, 341,) and as regards the slaves on board this ship, no Macao law has been proved. Further, suppose it be proved that all these conditions have been properly complied with, that omnia rite agi so as that the contract of slavery was effectual throughout Portuguese territory, would such exception be of any avail outside that territory, or be of any avail in a vessel on the high seas under a French or any flag other than that of Portugal? Can any Macao law prevail and exempt a French or other foreign ship from her own laws, or from national or treaty obligations? My answer is in the negative. The French law prevails—a slave puts his foot on French territory on the deck of a French ship, and he is free, notwithstanding any possible Macao law to the contrary.

The declaration between states that the slave-trade is piracy, is a matter very different from a grant of a right of search to discover and punish extra-territorially the acts so declared piracy. The latter is conceded even by the United States with the greatest difficulty, and only within limited latitudes, even where the former is explicitly made. I draw this distinction because the attorney general cited cases as to right of search in reference to slaves which do not touch, as it appears to me, the question of piracy or no piracy.

I am assured that the coolie slave-trade at Macao is carried on to the great distress of the much-respected governor there, whose efforts have been borne down in this matter possibly by the force of laws existing there, the repeal of which he cannot carry in the Macao council. This is not the only case in which a gigantic evil has been too strong for a governor, but I trust that he will persevere, and gaining strength from the increased greatness of the evil he has to contend with, assisted as I am sure he will be from Portugal, and as I know he will be by the Catholic priesthood, and especially by the Jesuit Fathers in Macao, he will ultimately put down this grievous evil.

Fearful retribution in coolie slave-ships.—But it seems to me that if cause and effect have their full operation, this abominable traffic will find for itself a terrible and appalling end. I have endeavored to make up a list of ships in which there have been coolie risings and destruction of the ship, and the voyages have failed. That list is not complete, but I believe that within a short period some six or seven ships, carrying about 3,000 coolies, have been burnt or otherwise destroyed, with an immense loss of life, including captains and a relatively large proportion of the crews of these slavers. Will men who believe that there is a Providence—will men who hold that storm or tempest, a Nero or a Cataline, mars not Heaven's design, not see a Nemesis in these events?

Origin of claim of rendition of this prisoner.—There can be no doubt that the demand of the rendition of this prisoner originated, not with the Chinese mandarins at Canton, but with the French consul. I should have liked to have seen his original letter. It was referred to in the argument for the Crown as sustaining the Chinese demand, but was not produced. Judicially I must decide as if there were no such letter. Doubtless, the French consul was induced to interfere by listening too readily to the ex parte statements of the coolie slave-traders, who hoped by terrorism to establish firmly their abominable trade. Kidnapping is a crime especially detestable among the Chinese, occasionally atoned for among them by lynch law; mandarin justice usually decapitates or most severely punishes a kidnapper. No mandarin would ask for the rendition of a Chinaman for killing a foreign kidnapper beyond the limits of China.

in order to punish him. National sympathy would rather reward him, but after the Tien-tsin massacre peaceful relations with a French consul would be thought to be cheaply bought by a peace-offering of a few poor and friendless coolies upon his demand.

The execution of sixteen coolies in sight of Macao.—In a paper now before me, I see in the testimony of an eye-witness the narrative of an unparalleled scene. A China gun-boat bringing from Canton sixteen poor Chinese coolies, who had escaped from out of the Nouvelle Penelope, (the crime was at least so assumed against them,) and landing them on a Chinese island within sight of the windows of houses in Macao; there these sixteen poor wretches were on the 7th of February last, with the pomp and circumstance of a grand ceremony as on a gala day, in the presence of hundreds of spectators, beheaded by Chinese headsmen, all being under the order of the French consul at Canton, who accompanied these men from Canton, and directed the proceedings as superintendent or sheriff. Men sickened at the scene.

Rendition of the prisoner sought for like object.—The rendition of the prisoner now before me, Kwok-a-sing, has been asked doubtless in order that he may be added as one more, and so that one by one, and at length a great hecatomb of vengeance may be completed on China land—a lasting monument of the humanity, of the Christianity, of western civilization.

Why did not France ask for this rendition?—The alleged crime was committed on board a French ship; why did not the French consul ask for this man's rendition to French law? He knew that in the eye of French as of English law, this man was guilty of no crime, and he would not venture on such a demand.

Hope for investigation in Europe.—I hope that this matter will be, as I believe it will certainly be, duly investigated in Europe, that we may all receive such light and instruction as we each require, and so that what is right may hereafter prevail. If I am wrong in the view I have taken of the matter, I shall bow respectfully to correction from competent authority, but until my decision is reversed, that decision is, and must be, law in this colony.

No. 43.

Mr. Bailey to Mr. Davis.

No. 35.]

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Hong Kong, April 25, 1871. (Received June 20.)

SIR: The subject of Chinese emigration from this port to the United States has claimed my careful thought and patient investigation for the last four months, with a view to get at the facts, and to understand it in its surroundings and bearings. The whole subject is an anomaly. Rules that will do elsewhere in the world, when applied in considering questions of immigration, have no application to Chinese immigration to the United States. Immigrants to America from other parts of the world go of their own volition, free and voluntary. Emigration from China to all parts of the world is an organized business or trade, in which men of large capital, and hongs of great wealth, engage as a regular traffic, by which men are bought and sold for so much per head, precisely as a piece of merchandise is handled, at its market value. The poor laborer of Europe applies his own scanty means to get to the land of promise, or is assisted by his friends, charitable societies, or benevolent institutions, to reach a place where he hopes to have his toil properly requited, where his labor will inure to his own benefit. The cooly of China is bought by the rich trader to serve his purchaser at low wages for a series of years in a foreign country, under contract for the faithful performance of which in many instances he gives a mortgage on his wife and children, with a stipulation that at the end of his term of service he is to be brought back to China by his purchaser. This contract is sold by the dealer through his agents in the United States and elsewhere at a large advance, and is a source of great profit to capitalists who have the means to buy and sell large numbers of men. This contract, in the United States, is no doubt null and void, but nevertheless the cooly will comply strictly with all its terms, a copy of which in Chinese characters is always in his possession, and this he will do because his purchaser holds his household lares in the land to which he always hopes and expects to return, in pledge for the faithful performance of his bonds. The central idea of a Chinaman's religion, if he has any religion at all, is that of the worship of the tombs of his ancestors. The superstitions of Fung-Shusy dominate him wherever he may be in the world. The subtle mysticisms of China so strangely govern all its people in their social, political, and quasi religious life, are as a hook in his nose, by which his purchaser controls him at all times and in all places; and thus this relation of master and quasi slave, no matter how many miles apart, is welded by the mystical links of religious superstitions, family ties, and rights of ancestral tombs, which control and regulate the reciprocal duties of trader and coolie in the home land.

The means of obtaining coolies are as various as the ingenuity of man can devise, and are as corrupt as the incentive to large gains can stimulate and invent. Men and boys are decoyed by all sorts of tricks, opiates, and illusory promises, into the haunts of the traders. Once in the clutches of these men-dealers, by a system of treachery and terrorism, connived at by the local Chinese authorities, whose chief business in life is to "squeeze" the people, the stupefied cooly is overawed into making a contract under such Chinese influences and surroundings as give it a sacredness of character nowhere else known in the world. From that moment he is the mere tool of the rich dealer wherever he may go. It is difficult for persons accustomed to western civilization to understand the depth and extent of this relationship, but Chinese civilization is unique, perhaps opaque, and cannot be measured by that of any other.

The above is a mere outline of the system, and is the general rule that controls Chinese emigration. Contact with American ideas and the spirit of American law has, in some measure, modified the rule as applied to Chinese emigrants going to the United States, so that there is in reality free and voluntary emigration; but it is so surrounded, mixed up, and tainted with the virus of the coolie trade, as to require the utmost vigilance and scrutiny to separate the legitimate from the illegitimate emigration.

I am charged under the law with the duty of giving to every American vessel leaving this port with Chinese emigrants, a permit or certificate, setting forth the fact that each person is a free and voluntary emigrant, but that the same shall not be given until I am first personally satisfied, by evidence produced, of the truth of the facts therein contained. I find among my consular duties, prescribed by the consular regulations of 1868, that I am—

"To repress and discourage, by all proper means, the traffic in laborers, usually called the cooly trade." It is fully expected that they (consular officers) will carefully see that its provisions (act of February 19, 1862) are strictly observed. The Secretary of State, in his circular of January 17, 1867, says: "You are consequently directed to make use of all the authority, power, and influence at your command, towards preventing and discouraging the carrying on of the traffic referred to in any way."

In the consular regulations of 1870, concerning the act of February 19, 1862, I find the following instructions:

Consuls will be rigid in exacting a compliance with these provisions.

I have made the above recapitulation to show the Secretary of State the stand-point from which I am viewing the subject, and the lights that are guiding me in the course I am pursuing; and to ask, if I am taking too serious a view of the matter, for such further instructions as the better judgment of the Secretary may think proper and advisable.

In consideration of the foregoing the first question that arises is, how shall I perform the duties devolving upon me in this matter? The number of emigrants is so large as to make it impossible for me to examine each person, and in addition attend to the various and arduous duties of this consulate. I must, therefore, either abandon the execution of the law as an idle form, or I must appoint a corps of assistants, sufficient in number, in integrity and sagacity, to make the examination a rigid and faithful compliance with the letter and spirit of the law. Heretofore, I am free to say, from all I have been able to learn, the whole proceeding in this regard has been a complete farce.

I have not the means to pay for these assistants, for my salary is hardly sufficient to support me in the plainest and most economical manner possible for me to adopt. Therefore I must allow these assistants to charge a fee such as will make reasonable compensation for their services, labor, and expenses in and about the matter. I can procure men of small capacity and less integrity to undertake the task for a mere trifle; but this would make an expense without any good in return, for such an examination would be neither thorough nor reliable. The only safe rule is to put the matter in charge of first-class men, and allow them to collect such fees as shall be reasonable compensation for their services. Even this plan, which seems to me at present to be the best, is not satisfactory to my mind, for the reason that it will necessarily involve an expense that may be the subject of irritation; but I do not know what better to do than to try it, and by carefully watching reduce it, as experience may suggest, to the lowest possible cost.

While the law, my instructions, and the condition of affairs here are as at present, I deem this examination by assistants as indispensable, and the necessary expense must follow it, unless the law and the facts are to be ignored and investigation abandoned.

Perhaps it will occur to the mind of the Secretary that a thorough investigation here as to the character of the emigrants going to the United States, and a check to prevent the now world-famed atrocities at Macao being practiced or winked at here, will largely negative the clamor of a growing public opinion in the United States hostile to the introduction of Chinese or servile labor, to compete with the great free-labor interests of our own country. Chinese emigration to the United States brings the opposite civilizations of the East and the West face to face, and it occurs to me that Congress is wise in throwing all the safeguards possible around the introduction of heathen labor, to prevent its bringing harm to our institutions. I am convinced that China is on the verge of a great cataclysm of some kind, and I believe it will result in sending immense numbers of Chinese, with the good and bad that is in them, to the United States. The facilities of ships and steamers will do it easily and cheaply, and they will go to escape unbearable evils here; whether to introduce unbearable evils there remains to be seen.

I have said that this traffic in laborers is exceedingly profitable; therefore I cannot expect that anything that will hamper it, by investigation or otherwise, will be popular with the men-dealers or with the great interests interlocked with it. It prostitutes everybody here, and thus far has prostrated every one who has stood up against it.

It will be asserted that I am putting obstacles in the way of commerce. I will endeavor to do my duty, let the consequences care for themselves. Well, so far as concerns that commerce which has for its object the buying and selling of men, I propose to put obstacles in its way. Legitimate emigration and legitimate commerce shall have my active co-operation and encouragement in every possible lawful way; but if commerce demands at my hands assistance in a new mode of enslaving men, differing from the African slave-trade "in little else than the employment of fraud instead of force to make its victims captive," I will not lend my aid to build up its nefarious traffic, nor bow to the behests of the great houses that are interested in forcing this great wrong.

I have the honor, &c.,

D. H. BAILEY.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Hong Kong, May 12, 1871. (Received June 20.)

SIR: I transmit herewith a copy of correspondence between myself and the colonial governor of Macao, concerning the cooly-ship Dolores Ugarte.

I also inclose a circular containing an account of her passage last year from Macao to Callao with coolies, reciting the horrors of that voyage.

It is now my painful duty to state that, notwithstanding my earnest protest against her being permitted to reload with coolies at Macao, the governor of that colony, contrary to the spirit of his letter to me of April 24, allowed the ship to resort to the subterfuge of changing her name to that of the Don Juan, and her flag to that of Peru, and thereupon to load 665 coolies for Callao. She sailed from the Roads of Macao with her cargo of human beings on the 4th instant. But a dreadful catastrophe awaited her. Providence seems to have set her apart to shock the nations with a new horror that shall startle them to their duty in suppressing this infamous slave trade. On Saturday, the 6th, the ship was discovered to be on fire in the hold, where the coolies were kept. The captain states "that, with a view to save his own and his crews' lives, he battened down the hatches on the passengers, and took to the boats." The ship was burned to the water's edge, and with it over 600 victims of this atrocious traffic in men.

I inclose the reports of the daily press here up to closing of the mail. There is a conflict of evidence as to whether the ship was set on fire, or whether it was accidental. I express no positive opinion now on that point, but incline to the belief that the coolies in desperation fired the ship. I will forward at the earliest moment such other correspondence as I may have with the Governor de Souza on the subject.

I have the honor, &c.,

D. H. BAILEY.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Hong-Kong, April 21, 1871.

SIR: I have not the honor of an acquaintance with your excellency, but knowing the high character you bear as a lover of fair dealing and a defender of the right, I make free to address you upon a subject that must obtain considerable notoriety, and concerning which your excellency has very great authority.

I allude to the fact that the Dolores Ugarte, now notorious throughout the civilized world for her atrocities in the coolie-trade, is reputed to be at this moment on the roads of Macao, preparing to load with coolies for Callao.

May I be so bold as to ask that your excellency will permit me to officially inform my government that you will interpose your authority to prevent that infamous ship having an opportunity to repeat the horrors of her last passage to Callao, and again flout her crimes in the face of the world, to the scandal of Christian civilization.

I am charged by my government with surveillance of the coolie-trade, and there being no United States consul at Macao, I have taken the liberty to address you in this grave matter, which will not be hid from public gaze nor shut out from the high tribunal of the nations.

But I have no doubt that your excellency has already taken the necessary steps to prevent a recurrence of the terrible scenes on that ship.

My apology for this hasty note is that I write it in the interest of humanity, a cause I know your excellency will protect.

With sentiments of high regard and consideration, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

DAVID H. BAILEY,
United States Consul.

His Excellency ANTONIO SERGIO DE SOUZA,
Governor of Macao.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE GOVERNOR OF MACAO,
April 24, 1871.

MOST ILLUSTRIOUS SIR: I am directed by his excellency the governor to acknowledge the receipt of your official letter No. 18 of 21st instant, and to state that notwithstanding you have not an exequatur to represent you to the government of this colony, yet, taking into most serious consideration the object mentioned in your correspondence, his excellency has forwarded to the competent authority a copy of your official letter and the certificates of the Portuguese consul in Peru in reference to the last voyages of the ship Dolores Ugarte, for the purpose of an inquiry to ascertain the veracity of the fact you allude to, so as to proceed as it should be.

Although it is not now permitted, according to orders of this government, from this port to ship emigrants in vessels under the republican flag of San Salvador, or of other nations that have no treaty with China, or not being countries to which coolies emigrate, it would be very desirable if you will be so good as to furnish me with any document or declaration that may serve as a legal basis to warrant an inquiry which his excellency has ordered to be instituted, the result of which may enable preventive measures to be taken with respect to the late captain of the aforesaid ship.

It is the rigorous duty of his excellency, according to orders from the government of Portugal, to avoid as much as possible the abuses which are committed upon the Chinese emigrants at this port. His excellency thinks he has done all that has been possible, as far as the authority of this government extends, to put down the abuses in such a trade, complying in this way not only with the orders of his faithful Majesty's government, but also with the obligations imposed by civilization and humanity.

The manner in which this Chinese emigration is conducted in this city is not generally appreciated, and his excellency would have much pleasure if you in your private character, or any other gentleman of respectability in Hong-Kong, would come and verify with your own eyes how the acts of emigration take place. You would certainly be convinced that in no part of China is this proceeded with more exemplary and so much regularity in objects of such high human interest.

God guard you, sir.

HENRIQUE DE CASTRO,
Colonial Secretary.

No. 23.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Hong-Kong, May 1, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th ultimo, in reference to the Dolores Ugarte. I should have responded to it immediately, but serious indisposition entirely prevented my doing so.

You will please convey my thanks to his excellency the governor for accepting my letter No. 18 as official, notwithstanding I have not an exequatur to the colonial government of Macao and Timor. I had anticipated this courtesy, considering the cordial relations happily subsisting between Portugal and the United States.

You inform me that his excellency has been pleased to call a syndicanca to make inquiry as to the facts charged against the Dolores Ugarte, and you ask me to furnish you with "documents or declarations" to serve as a "legal basis" to warrant inquiry. His excellency is aware that acts of state, on international questions, are not conducted as proceedings in courts of judicature, but acting on the broader and simpler principle of common repute, one nation, through its agents, may notify another of a breach of international law without thereby assuming to produce evidence in detail to sustain its allegations. His excellency must well know that the crimes on board the Dolores Ugarte having come to light at Honolulu, I could not have "documents or declarations" in my possession at present, but if the man who was then captain of the ship will give competent bail to answer for his acts, I will forward his excellency's request to the State Department of my Government, and I doubt not that in the interest of humanity our consul at Honolulu will be directed to obtain and forward such evidence as may, at this distance of time, be procurable.

If I am not misinformed, his excellency has received from Portugal a remonstrance on the coolie trade addressed to her by a power entitled to the highest consideration. I have reason to know that it was the atrocities on board the Dolores Ugarte, as discovered at Honolulu and detailed in the Advertiser, reprinted in the Overland China Mail, November 15, 1870, a copy of which I inclose, that occasioned that remonstrance.

The purpose of my official No. 18 was not to ask for the legal trial, conviction, and judicial punishment of the criminals. My object was internationally to ask his excellency the governor and council, as the executive at Macao, as an act of state, to adhere to the spirit of treaties, and (not now insisting that the coolie traffic as conducted from every port in China is always in breach of treaties abolishing the slave trade) to submit that when coolies are taken from Macao, as elsewhere, under such circumstances as are judicially proved on behalf of the French consul in the Hong-Kong courts to have existed in the case of the Nouvelle Penelope, and also where such cruelties as were perpetrated on board the Dolores Ugarte are shown to exist by the only evidence immediately available, i. e., the newspaper reports, that then treaty obligations arise internationally, and that in such cases his excellency, in his own jurisdiction, unless on his own responsibility he denies the facts, is, under treaty stipulations, bound to prevent the possibility of the recurrence of the breach of treaty obligations on board such ships, unless he is restrained by positive law in force in Macao, obliging him to allow any and all ships to take in a cargo of coolies.

The atrocities on board the Frederic gave rise to a law in Hong-Kong, giving the entire uncontrolled discretion to the governor, to allow or disallow coolie emigration on board every ship.

This has been, as I understand, always the law at Macao, under which, as I learn, his excellency at one time prohibited all coolie emigration from that colony.

In your letter you state that, under the orders of your government, ships under the San Salvador flag are prohibited from carrying coolies. If I rightly understand that letter, the Dolores Ugarte being under that flag, will not be permitted to carry coolies. You notice two other grounds for such prohibition, viz, that San Salvador has no treaty with China, and that she is not a country to which coolies emigrate. I shall feel obliged, therefore, by your informing me that his excellency has the power, by local law, to prohibit the Dolores Ugarte from loading coolies at Macao, and that, in fact, on the two other grounds she comes within the prohibition.

Assuming that I shall receive such assurance, I will make no further remarks on this subject.

Concerning the system of Chinese emigration as conducted at Macao, I am free to say the evidence given in the Nouvelle Penelope case compels me to regard it with very great distrust; but inasmuch as I am to make a report on Chinese coolie emigration to my Government, and having a desire only for the truth, I cordially accept the invitation of his excellency, and, in my private character, I will visit Macao and carefully inspect the proceedings.

I purpose forwarding my official No. 18, together with your answer and this letter, to my Government by the American mail that will leave this port on the 12th instant. I shall be glad to forward at the same time such an assurance as I have herein asked for concerning the Dolores Ugarte.

With sentiments of high regard and consideration, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

DAVID H. BAILEY,
United States Consul.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Hong-Kong, June 10, 1871. (Received July 24.)

SIR: Referring to my dispatch No. 36, I have the honor to transmit herewith the closing correspondence between his excellency the governor of Macao and myself touching the coolie-ship Dolores Ugarte.

I also inclose the statements taken in this colony, of some of the survivors, coolies, and crew, concerning the catastrophe.

Notwithstanding the fact that the crew of the ship landed at Macao a few hours after the disaster, and remained there for several days, nothing whatever appears to have been done toward investigating the cause of the burning of the vessel. This strange inertness concerning so terrible an affair can be explained on the hypothesis that silence is a mantle best fitted to hide a "barbarism" that publicity might expose. Although a number of the surviving coolies, and some of the crew, have come to this colony, the officials here seem averse to take public action in the matter, though singularly enough a secret investigation has been had before one of the magistrates; for what purpose, and with what results, I am unable to accurately state; I presume, however, with a view to ascertain whether the facts would authorize the colonial government to order a public inquiry.

On learning that some of the crew had arrived here, and fearing that the matter would be allowed to sink into oblivion, I at once secured their attendance at my consulate to give evidence concerning the deplorable event. You will find their evidence among the inclosures herewith, marked, Nos. 3½, 4, 5, 6 and 7.

You will observe by the statements, both of the coolies and crew, that although they do not agree as to how the ship was fired, yet they do remarkably concur in stating facts and conditions that leave no reasonable doubt that this is verily the slave trade, and that the Dolores Ugarte was a slave-ship engaged in carrying slaves in contravention and defiance of the slave-trade treaties. One of the witnesses, Albert Herker, one of the crew, sums the whole matter in a nut-shell, when he says, in substance, that the captain had seven coolies on board that he had bought on private speculation. This pregnant statement is confirmed by other witnesses.

Having now stated the facts in this grave case, I submit the whole matter to the Department, hoping that what I have done will meet the approval of the President.

I have, &c.,

DAVID H. BAILEY.

SECRETARIAT OF THE GOVERNMENT OF MACAO AND TIMOR.

SIR: Your official letter No. 23 of the 1st instant has been laid before the governor, and I am directed to reply to it as follows:

Whenever questions affecting the lofty interests of humanity, as does the coolie emigration, are raised, you, or any other person, will find his excellency the governor most sincerely desirous of giving ear to every representation that may be made him, especially when such questions are in themselves of a serious nature, as happens in the present case, and therefore your letter demands the greatest attention.

His excellency is not ignorant of the fact that questions of an international character are not generally dealt with as are the ordinary proceedings in our tribunals, but it is no doubt that when such questions turn upon questions of fact, upon which it is sought to raise a distinct claim, it is not possible to get on without proofs clear and conclusive.

But that your excellency may be fully convinced of the scrupulous care of his excellency in this matter of the emigration, it is sufficient to say that he has by formal act prohibited emigration in ships of nations which have no treaty with China, including in this prohibition the republic of San Salvador, not only because that nation has no vessels of war to watch over the doings of its mercantile marine, and has no treaty with China, but also because of the facts which his excellency finds narrated in the public prints relative to the Dolores Ugarte, although in the certificates granted by the Portuguese consul in Peru nothing appears with regard to the barbarous proceedings said to have taken place on board the said ship on her last voyage, and his excellency, in his official acts, ought not, in strictness, to act on allegations contained in the public journals, however great his esteem for the noble institution of the press.

His excellency's request, therefore, to be furnished by your excellency with some documents or proofs which might serve as a foundation for a commission of inquiry, and throw light on the affair, was made with a view to his being able to exercise his authority as governor in the only way in which he can legally do so, by demanding the punishment of every individual who should become guilty or accessory to like acts of barbarity, when duly proved.

From the inquiries which his excellency has ordered to be made, he finds himself fully informed that neither the captain, pilot, nor any individual of the crew are now on board the Dolores Ugarte, and, further, that the Captain Saul remained in Callao, and the crew was entirely engaged at Hong-Kong, as your excellency can easily verify, even if unwilling to give the proper degree of credit to the certificate of the Peruvian consul in this city, and to the official reports of our captain of the port; and this being so, and the vessel having changed her flag, his excellency cannot, except by an act of the most unqualified despotism, prohibit her sailing, without seeking to attribute to the material vessel herself the acts which your excellency asserts to have been practiced on board, which would be absurd.

Therefore his excellency has confined himself within the limits of his authority, in expressly prohibiting any vessel to load coolies on board which shall be found, as captain or pilot, those who held the same posts on the former voyage of the Dolores Ugarte, these persons being the principals responsible for the acts said to have been done on board that ship.

As to the right of this government to permit Chinese emigration from this port, it appears to his excellency to be indisputable, as in the face of treaties the contrary cannot be maintained, nor is there any special law which so determines; and his excellency regrets deeply that your excellency should have incidentally referred to the slave treaties, as if seeking to connect with such the Chinese emigration from this port.

From the Boletuns officials, which I have had the honor of sending you, your excellency will perceive that the embarkation of coolies under the San Salvadorean flag has been prohibited, and you will see equally the proceedings of his excellency relative to the captain and pilot of the ship Dolores Ugarte, if perchance the said individuals should return to this port, but as against the (keel of the) said ship, now under another flag, and having no person on board of the former crew, there is no law, in virtue of which his excellency can, nor does he consider himself authorized in any way to take proceedings. As to that part of the correspondence which relates to the ship Nouvelle Penelope, in which your excellency appears to give credit to what was put forward in the courts at Hong-Kong, to the effect that the coolies had been kidnapped by the captain, embarked by force, escorted by armed soldiers of the military force of this colony, without having been examined in the superintendence of emigration in conformity with the laws in force, &c., &c., his excellency has no hesitation in formally, in his official character, contradicting existence of such facts.

On conclusion, I am further directed to signify to your excellency how much pleasure it will give his excellency, if at any time your excellency will come and verify the official proceedings had in this colony to secure the liberty of the emigrants, and be present at the embarkation, and his excellency is sure that your excellency, with the impartiality which characterizes you, will judge of this business differently from what now you appear to think, and that your mistrust will be entirely removed.

God guard your excellency.

HENRIQUE DECASTRO.
Secretary General.

Illustrious Sir, CONSUL OF THE UNITED STATES at Hong-Kong.

No. 26.]

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Hong-Kong, May 30, 1871.

SIR: On my return from Canton, after an absence of several days, I find your letter of the 26th instant awaiting my arrival.

I may confess in the beginning of this letter that I can scarcely write with equanimity concerning the subject of this correspondence, the Dolores Ugarte, and the terrible termination to which she has come—an end I so earnestly besought his excellency to guard against. I certainly cannot consent to gloze her career by the subterfuges of changing her name and flag; and I exceedingly regret that his excellency feels called upon to extenuate her acts by the citation of these facts in her defense. She has sullied the flags of three nations to her base purposes; with each exigency changing her colors to hide her crimes. I assume that his excellency has acted from the best of motives, but I must regard it as very unfortunate that such shallow acts were allowed to cover her guilt and give her new license to go forth and commit unparalleled horrors in the face of the world.

In full view of what has happened, I doubt not his excellency deplores the events connected with this great catastrophe. His excellency expresses a regret that I should have referred to the slave trade treaties as applicable to the coolie trade of Macao. I did so advisedly. The treaties for the suppression of the slave trade are not merely for the protection of the negro, but are for all mankind. Although I have not examined the subject as fully as I would like, I cannot but agree with the chief justice of this colony, that the dealing in coolies, as was proved on the cross-examination of the witnesses on behalf of the prosecution in the Kwok-a-sing case, and the published statements of the survivors of the Dolores Ugarte, is as thorough a slave trade as was ever known in the world.

You will observe that the evidence on which this opinion is founded, which his excellency discredits, is the evidence of the seamen, as well as of coolies giving testimony under coercion, in the case of the Nouvelle Penelope, and that such evidence was intended to exhibit the treatment of the coolies in the most favorable light; that the statements in the case of the Dolores Ugarte have a singular agreement as to kidnapping, fraud and force, used by the men-dealers in the initiatory steps in the interior of the provinces, in the barracoons at Macao, the embarkation on the vessel, the iron gratings closed over the victims of the traffic on board the ship, and the cannon and arms to keep them in subjection during the passage to Callao.

But further discussion is futile. The object of my communications with the colonial government of Macao being to prevent the Dolores Ugarte from loading coolies, and my remonstrance having failed, there is no further necessity, on my part, for a correspondence on a subject that has passed, by the logic of inexorable events, to a higher and more potent forum. I have nothing left me to do but to submit the whole matter to my Government for such action as it may think proper in the premises.

It has now become a high international question; and that liberal diplomacy which so signally distinguishes this age above all others will doubtless settle it in the best interests of humanity.

With renewed sentiments of high consideration and regard, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

DAVID A. BAILEY,
United States Consul.

Hon. HENRIQUE DE CASTRO,
Colonial Secretary, Macao.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Hong-Kong, June 10, 1871. (Received July 24.)

SIR: Referring to my dispatch, No. 24, I have the honor to transmit the inclosed decision of the chief justice of the supreme court of this colony in the recent habeas corpus case of Kwok-a-sing.

In as much as this decision relates to the Macao coolie trade, and also refers to the Dolores Ugarte, I respectfully call the attention of the Secretary thereto.

I have, &c.,

DAVID H. BAILEY.

[From the Daily Press, May 23, 1871.]

SUPREME COURT OF HONG-KONG, MAY 22, 1871. BEFORE THE HON. CHIEF JUSTICE SMALE. COOLIES NOT CRIMINAL FOR RISING ON THE CAPTAIN OF A COOLIE SHIP FROM MACAO TO PERU.

The following judgment by Chief Justice Smale, on the return to a second habeas corpus of Kwok-a-sing, who had been committed by Mr. May, police magistrate, for piracy jure gentium and murder, and against whom an information for piracy, and robbery, and a deadly assault on the captain and crew of the Nouvelle Penelope, at sea, had been filed, and had been served on the prisoner. This decision follows up and carries out to its logical consequences the decision of the same judge on the 29th March last. The judge unhesitatingly declares the right of coolies in the coolie ships for Peru to regain their freedom by any means in their power. It will be noticed that the prisoner was set at large.

Judgment.

Kwok-a-sing was committed to gaol by warrant of Mr. May, police magistrate, dated the 7th of February, 1871, in which it was set forth as follows: "That a communication having been received requiring the rendition of the defendant on behalf of the Chinese government as a subject of China, who has committed certain crimes and offenses against the laws of China, by participating in the murder of the crew of the French ship Nouvelle Penelope, and it appearing to me, upon investigation of the case, that there is cause to believe that the said defendant is a subject of China, and has committed the said crimes against the laws of China by feloniously seizing the said ship at sea, and by murdering the captain and certain of the crew of the said ship on the 4th October last past, at sea; and further, that after committing the said crimes, did feloniously seize a boat belonging to the said ship, and land at a place called Pakka, in Chinese territory, on the 4th October aforesaid, and it was thereupon adjudged that the said defendant, for the said offence, should be committed to gaol for detention, pending the receipt of orders from his excellency the lieutenant governor, as to his further disposal." I believe the practice has been, without exception, for the governor, on such a finding, to deliver up the person claimed to China. A writ of habeas corpus was obtained, and the prisoner was brought before me, when the superintendent of the gaol adduced the warrant, the purport of which I have just read, as the cause of detention. On the same occasion, Mr. May, in obedience to a writ of certiorari, returned to me the depositions on which his warrant was founded. After protracted arguments, and after very much consideration, the prisoner was, on the 18th of April, 1871, by this court, to use the words of section 6 of the habeas corpus act, "delivered and set at large upon" that "habeas corpus." The prisoner was, as I understand, immediately after his having been so "set at large," seized within a gun-shot of the court, as he was proceeding toward Taipingshan, in a house in which he had been arrested, and towards which I presume he was proceeding as to his home. Referring to what was said by the court in re Douglas, in Queen's Bench Report, I make no observation, because in the view I take of this case to do so is unnecessary; but, if necessary, it is open to the prisoner to contend that such arrest vitiated the whole of the subsequent proceedings against him, or such of them as it is his interest to allege were unsustainable in law. Such an arrest was on a demand by the French consul for the prisoner's arrest, made pending the hearing on the writ of habeas corpus before me, and upon a warrant granted for his arrest dated the 16th day of February last, at which time also that hearing before me was actually pending. An investigation upon this new demand by the French consul proceeded in the council chamber before the executive council, but the attorney general, on the 26th day of April, 1871, announced that the French consul withdrew his demand, and that investigation terminated suddenly, the prisoner being present. Immediately thereupon the attorney general directed the superintendent of the police to arrest, and he did arrest, the prisoner, in the council chamber, on a charge of piracy jure gentium. Under this arrest the prisoner was brought before Mr. May, who committed him for trial before this court in its criminal sessions. On an appointment made by me at chambers on the 10th of May, the court sat on the 12th, specially to hear a motion for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the superintendent of the gaol, and ordering him to bring up the body of the prisoner. I granted the writ and also a writ of certiorari for the depositions. Both writs were returned into court on the 15th, when I heard the motion on the second, the now pending, writ for the discharge of the prisoner. The following are the words of the substantial part of the second warrant of commitment by Mr. May, of the 10th of May, 1871: "Whereas the above-named defendant was charged, before me, on the testimony of credible witnesses, for that the said defendant, on 4th October last past, with a number of other evil disposed persons, unknown, with arms, upon the high seas, within the jurisdiction of the admiralty of England, and on board a certain ship or vessel called the Nouvelle Penelope, upon the high seas, then being in and upon one Vigoureux, the master of the said, the officers and seamen of the said ship, in the peace of God and our Lady the Queen, then and there being, piratically and feloniously did make an assault, and the said ship, and the apparel and tackle of the said ship, feloniously and violently did steal, take and carry away; and immediately before the commission of the said felony, the said defendant and the evil-disposed persons aforesaid did feloniously, wilfully, and of their malice aforethought, kill and murder the said Vigoreux, the master, Manfillent, the chief officer of the said ship, and Le Jusan, Paul Gigot, Francis Labert, Edmund Mongaret, and Ishmael Alphonse, seamen, and a certain Manila seaman, whose name is not known, of the crew of the said ship; and it was thereupon ordered that the said defendant should be committed to prison to take his trial for the said offense at the next criminal sessions of the supreme court." Mr. Francis deposes that the piratical and felonious acts deposed to against Kwok-a-sing on this second occasion are the same felonious acts, and no other, as those in respect of which he was, on the 7th of February, committed. He also deposed that Kwok-a-sing was, on the 10th of May, committed by Mr. May, and the offense charged in that warrant is the same, and no other, as that for which he was committed on the 7th of February last. No affidavit in contradiction or explanation having been filed, I must take these statements so far as they are statements of facts, and not conclusions of law, as established for the purposes of the present decision. I may here note that for the prosecution reliance is also placed on the fact that an information equivalent to a true bill on an indictment by a grand jury has been filed. I have drawn out in a tabular form the several charges on the first commitment, which I held to be bad, and on the second commitment on the writ of habeas corpus, now under consideration, and as contained in the information filed by the attorney general now also relied on. The following table shows the sameness of the charge in one of the charges to those in the other two documents:

No. 1.—Offense as set out on commitment, from which, on first habeas corpus , prisoner was set at large.	No. 2.—Offense as set out against prisoner on commitment, in respect of which this second habeas corpus is pending.	No. 3.—Offense for which the information is filed against the prisoner.
1 Feloniously seizing ship Nouvelle Penelope , and stealing her at sea.	Piratically and feloniously assaulting, and stealing ship Nouvelle Penelope , and her apparel and tackle at sea.	Piratically and feloniously seizing ship Nouvelle Penelope and apparel and tackle at sea.
2 Murdering captain and certain of the crew, without naming them.	Murdering captain and certain of the crew, naming them.	Assaulting captain and certain of the crew, naming them, and throwing them into the sea.
3 On 4th of October, 1870.	On 4th of October.	On 4th of October, 1870.
4 Afterwards stealing a boat.	No subsequent charge.	Piratically stealing $10,000 and 10 watches, in custody of, and against will of captain and crew, i. e., within the few minutes after outbreak, and before their death, on 4th October.
5 At sea.	In jurisdiction of admiralty at sea, and in peace of the Queen.	At sea, and in peace of the Queen.

Excluding entirely from consideration, at present, No. 3, and considering only No. 1 and No. 2, Mr. Francis contends that they describe the "same offense," and no other, and he contends that, under section 6 of the habeas corpus act, the prisoner is entitled to be discharged from custody. Neither for or against the prisoner has any case, as a precedent in point, been found in the books in this colony. I am, therefore, driven to work out for myself the precise meaning of section 9. Now, considering that the act was passed inter alia to prevent oppression by repeated arrests for the same offense, I read the operative words of section 6, as applicable to this prisoner, thus: That no person set at large upon any habeas corpus shall be again imprisoned or committed "for the same offense" by any person, other than by the legal process of the "court having jurisdiction of the cause." I am of opinion that the subsequent part of this section, which gives a right of action, need not be referred to for the purpose now before me. Now, as I have said, I am bound to believe the uncontradicted affidavit that the offense mentioned in each of Mr. May's commitments is one and the same, and no other. Moreover, the bad act which is the meaning of "offense," as set out in each column, appears to me to be the same in substance. Now, who or what has authority given to him or it to again imprison or arrest the man set at large? The "court having jurisdiction of the cause," and no other. Can Mr. May, or can his court, be so designated? Cox v.

Coleridge, 1 B and C, 37, but which I always read in 3 Burns Jus., by Chetwyn, 1835, a most instructive case, with which I was more familiar some thirty or forty years ago than now, shows that, although when sitting to punish under a statute, Mr. May sits as a court, yet that when he sits as a magistrate, with a view to committal for trial before this court, his magistracy is not a court. His is a "preliminary inquiry," and not a "trial." But concede it to be a court, has it, or can it have, jurisdiction of the cause? Now, jurisdiction is an authority judicare, which has been well translated to pronounce judgment—to give a judicial decision that is to end and determine the cause, which Mr. May certainly has no authority to do. This simple etymological analysis conclusively, to my mind, excludes Mr. May's power to commit as an exception to the general prohibition of a second commitment in the sixth section. I heard a cross-motion by the attorney general to quash the writ of habeas corpus, by reason that Kwok-a-Sing stands committed for trial at the next sessions before this court for felony, plainly expressed on the warrant of commitment. Now, this notice amounts to an admission by the prosecution that the charge of piracy in column No. 2 is a charge of felony equivalent to that set out in column No. 1. That is, that the charge on the second commitment is the same as the charge on the first commitment. But if that be so, then charge No. 2 is absolutely prohibited by section 6. The second ground for this cross-motion is this, that subsequently to the committal by Mr. May, and previous to the issuing of the second writ of habeas corpus, Kwok-a-Sing was duly served with an information (being here equivalent to a true bill by a grand jury in England) whereby he is charged with piracy and violence. Now, referring to No. 3 of the tabular statement before referred to, this information is identical in substance, though not in precise words, in charging the same offense (piratical and felonious being but different modes of designating the same bad act—offense) as the charges in No. 1 and No. 2. The taking of the $10,000 and the apparel and the ten watches, in the attorney general's information, No. 3 of tabular statement, is laid as having occurred while these articles were in the custody, and to have been taken against the will of the captain and crew—that is, during their lives; that is, between the first outbreak and their deaths, on the 4th of October, (a very short period.) These takings were therefore part of the main felonious or piratical res gesta. In respect of No. 1, I have already said that there was no legal ground of charge against this prisoner. On the present depositions, No. 2, still less can this prisoner be convicted, and I do not see how, on such evidence, the information No. 3 can be sustained in law, or how it is other than a charge to the same purport as Nos. 1 and No. 2, and on this information he is not a prisoner. The attorney general contended that this information, the purport of which appears in No. 3 of the tabular statement, takes Kwok-a-sing from out of the protection of section 6, and brings him within the provisions of section 7 of the habeas corpus act. My opinion is that there are no words in section 7 that take away the protection of section 6. That section 7 takes up a subject essentially different from the subject-matter of the enactments up to section 7. That seventh section confines itself to cases which proceeded without any writ of habeas corpus, and it provides for the then frequently occurring oppression of the subject, by repeatedly postponing the trial of the person charged. I am, on the whole, of opinion that Kwok-a-sing is entitled to be discharged, and I deliver him and set him at large. The attorney general having stated that officials from Macao purpose to come over, and to give evidence on the trial of this prisoner, I am, on that account, very much disappointed. The more thoroughly the whole history of the Nouvelle Penelope is ventilated the better for humanity. It will be lamentable if these officials cannot be examined and cross-examined in an open court. Macao would be as much upon its trial before the world as this poor, miserable man, Kwok-a-sing, who has been now, ever since the 6th of February, stretched on a rack of mental torture, compared with which the Chinese much-abused ordinary physical tortures would be bearable. In the course of the argument the attorney general asked from the court an order of detainer against the prisoner on account of the existence of the information filed by him. He offered no precedent for such an act by the court, and I know of no authority on which I could justify compliance with his request upon this hearing of the application on this writ of habeas corpus. The prisoner is free, and effect must, at the risk of a contempt of this court, be given to the decision of this court which sets him free. The questions arising out of the case of the Nouvelle Penelope have attained an unprecedented interest since that catastrophe has been followed by the horrible incidents connected with the deaths by burning of the coolies on board the Dolores Ugarte. Many seamen and coolies who have escaped from the appalling scene, a ship on fire, are now in this colony. It is due to the authorities at Macao, maligned as they are said to be, that this friendly government should publicly, by a commission of inquiry, elicit the truth, the whole truth authoritatively, and that this office should not be left to the conductors of the newspaper press here, whose active investigation, in the absence of a better organized and authorized inquiry, must be much less satisfactory, though honest. Such an inquiry will, I doubt not, be expected by the authorities at home. It will be looked for by the whole civilized world, which now sits in judgment as in international conclave on such horrors as these. Such an investigation is the more called for here since the Dolores Ugarte was fitted up, having all her slave-carrying appliances, in the waters of this colony. It has been asked why was she not stopped and prosecuted here? Could nothing have been done, either under ordinance No. 1 of 1862, section 7, or under that most comprehensive act of the imperial legislature, 5 Geo. 4, chap. 113, especially section 10? I can account for the past. No blame attaches to any one, especially with the notion prevalent as to what the law was. As to the past, while I claim credit for having acted according to my convictions, I am bound to, and do assume, that they who acted differently intended right, at least equally with myself. It would be useful to know what ship, and flying what flag, it was that towed the Dolores Ugarte out of the Macao roads, and whether any, and what insurers, and being of what nationality, secured as a debt of honor to the slavers the value of the living cargo of the Dolores Ugarte in the event that has happened. Not further referring to the past, if I am not mistaken even now, two, if not several, vessels are within these waters, under the control of the harbor-master, whose fittings and appliances plainly indicate their destination for that slave trade, against which, as by common consent, Chinamen make the only terrible protest in their power. Like Sampson, whom, from infancy, we have been taught to admire, (to admire is, in the young, to yearn to imitate,) they have immolated, and will continue to immolate their masters, heedless of the results to themselves. Macao and the coolie ships divide the large profits of this traffic, but has not this colony acted the part of the lion's provider, and has not here a small part of the profits attending these adventures been distributed? If the answer be in the affirmative, must not this colony share, and does she not in fact, rightly or wrongly, share with Macao the discredit of this atrocious trade among the Chinese? To recur to the information filed by the attorney general against the prisoner, it charges that the Nouvelle Penelope was "in the peace of our lady the Queen." That is a necessary fact to be proved, to give this court jurisdiction to try this prisoner upon this information. On the depositions first before me I held that the Nouvelle Penelope was a pirate ship, as a conclusion of law. The evidence in the depositions on which exclusively this information is and must be founded and filed, (the attorney general can legally import no other into his mind,) is certainly in this respect, as to the prisoner's guilt, ad idem, not more if so much. Now if she was a pirate ship can she, being an enemy of all mankind, be other than an enemy of the Queen? And an enemy's ship is not in the peace of the Queen. (See Arch., Plea and Evidence, p. 366, 15th edition.) Whether the acts charged against this prisoner be piratical or not in themselves, has this court jurisdiction over acts done in a ship which, whether according to French or English law, is at the time in the commission of an act declared piratical by both nations, and therefore not in the peace of the Queen? But let it be assumed that these coolies were merely illegally coerced, an English lawyer must apply this principle to such a case. If a number of men are not in lawful custody they are not guilty of the murder of those de facto in authority over them. Being prisoners, they have a right to regain their freedom by any means in their power. This is the law to be found in R. v. Serva and others, 1 Den. C. C. R., 104, which see also in Roscoe, C. Evidence, 777, 778, and in 1 Rus., by Greaves, 247, 249. Moreover, R. v. Lesley, Bell, C. C., 220, goes to this extent, that the fact that men legally imprisoned, and so legally put on board a ship in Chili, (Macao,) does not render the continuance of that coercion in a British ship at sea legal, and the captain of a British ship was convicted and imprisoned in England for such false imprisonment at sea. These are mere suggestions in reference to any future consideration of this case, if any such there may be. I know that the atrocities of the coolie slave-trade, (unparalleled save possibly in the worst phases of the African slave-trade,) which have recently been brought to public cognizance, will arrest attention and excite horror wherever the English language is spoken, in the United States as much as throughout the British empire, and I trust that as good springs out of evil generally, so here, that the concurrent opinion and excited action of all Christendom, induced by these atrocities, will establish such a police on the sea as to render all coerced emigration (inevitably tending to the slave trade) impossible. In conclusion, I would adapt what was said of negroes by Montesquieu—no democrat, no fanatic, but a nobleman, a judge, and a French philosopher: "We cannot admit Chinese sea-borne coolie slaves to be men; to do so would soon lead to our believing that we are not Christians."

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Hong-Kong, September 12, 1871. Received October 23.

SIR: Referring to my dispatches Nos. 33 and 35, I have the honor to inclose an official communication from the colonial secretary of this colony, with accompanying documents, concerning the shipment of coolies hence to the United States by Mr. George E. Payne. A large proportion of the coolies referred to in the registrar general's letter had undoubtedly been inveigled, and some kidnapped, by the coolie broker Lai-On, who is, as I learn, a notorious Macao dealer in human flesh. Fortunately, the coolies all escaped from the vessel, (the Pacific mail-steamer "China,") and are now at liberty.

As I have frequently stated before, I repeat now, that the entire traffic is top-full of fraud, corruption, and the most brutal inhumanity.

REGISTRAR GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Hong-Kong, August 14, 1871.

SIR: On Friday last, the 11th instant, some members of the board of direction brought me the inclosed Chinese letter, (translation annexed,) which purported to come from some one who was, against his will, on board the outgoing American mail-steamer bound for San Francisco. Having sent for the Chinese broker, I gathered from him the information given in his statement, annexed, and finding that the intending emigrants had all come on shore, it did not seem necessary to take any immediate action in the matter. However, as I learned that the coolies, as alleged, were to have signed the contracts when on board, after the steamer had left the harbor, I think it right to bring the subject to the notice of his excellency the lieutenant governor, as, if true, there was an attempt at infringing the emigration laws.

A copy of the contract, which I obtained from the Chinese broker, is inclosed.

SIR: I am directed by his excellency the lieutenant governor to forward for your consideration a letter which has been sent to this department by the registrar general, in reference to the action alleged to have been taken by Mr. George Payne, an American citizen, regarding emigration to San Francisco. I beg to draw your attention to that part of Mr. Smith's letter in which he refers to the evasion of the emigration laws of the colony, which must necessarily have resulted from the signature of contracts after the departure of the steamer.

From the California steamer to the board of direction of the Chinese hospital. (An anonymous letter.)

The committee of the hospital should come forward to save human lives.

There was a Hakka, named Lai-on, who, several times last year, took people over to Macao and sold them; thus, he and his brothers ate human flesh.

On the 24th of this month a certain foreigner, who does not belong to any firm, unlawfully induced people to go to foreign countries, which are twice the distance to California, at five dollars a head. More than ten brokers dared not undertake the business, but Lai-on undertook it, and brought some printed forms to our villages, and induced the people to go to the interior of California. You had better go to the On-Ki emigration house on Wing-on street, where you can obtain a printed form, and request the harbor-master not to allow people to go. Also have a notice posted up at the California mail-steamer's wharf. This will be the means of saving men's lives, as on the 24th or 25th days they will go on board the California ship, where they will receive their pay and proceed on their voyage.

I am Lai-on, master of the On-Kee shop, No. 31 Wing-on lane. I am acting as emigration agent for Mr. G. E. Payne. Mr. Payne promised to give to myself $5 as commission, and $2, $3, or $5 as expenses and commission to the sub-agent for every emigrant from the interior, and shipped on board the California steamer that leaves here to-morrow. I had got on board the steamer yesterday for Mr. Payne, altogether, 270 men. Before they went on board each of them was promised to be paid an advance of $5 at 10 a. m. this morning. At 8 a. m. this morning there were about 40 or 50 of those men from the steamer who came to my shop asking me to give them $5 each as promised. I told them that Mr. Payne said that they could not be paid until the bank is opened, which will be 10 o'clock. They commenced to abuse me and accusing me of selling them as pigs, for which two of their fellow-men lost their lives by jumping overboard and drowning themselves. They then smashed everything in the shop; even the sign-board outside was broken. The whole of the 270 men have left the steamer. When the men came from the interior, and before they were shipped on board, all their expenses for board and lodging were paid by me. From the day I undertook the agency up to this day I have already spent a sum of $600 or $700. There was to be an agreement between Mr. Payne and myself, and another between Mr. Payne and the emigrants, but all of them have not been signed. Before the emigrants were taken to the harbor-master's office, where each of them got a paper from that office to go on board, they got passage-tickets from the California Mail-Steamer Company's office. These tickets were given to them by me, and were handed over to me by Mr. Payne. They went on board of their own will and accord. I never used any improper means or force of any kind to secure them on board. When they were at the harbor-master's office, I asked them whether they knew where they were going to, and whether they were going of their own accord? They answered in the affirmative. They were further asked whether or not they had been induced to go by unlawful means? They answered no. Then they were passed on to the harbor-master's office, where they received their papers or certificates going on board the ship.

The above statement was made by Lai-on on Saturday, the 12th instant.

U. S. CONSULATE GENERAL,
Havana, October 27, 1871. (Received November 3.)

SIR: Referring to my Nos. 551, 539, and series relating to the subject of Chinese colonization, I have the honor to transmit herewith an extract and translation of an article upon the subject of Asiatic immigration, as the coolie system is sometimes called, that appeared in the "Diario" of the 20th instant. I doubt not it will be found of interest, especially the statistical part, from which it appears that, since 3d June, 1847, when the first expedition arrived, there have been introduced into the island 109,092 Asiatic colonists, at an average cost to the purchaser of $340 each, representing a disbursement of $37,000,000 and upwards, or $1,500,000 annually.

It would be interesting to know how many of these Asiatics have returned to their country, how many are now living, how many have been subjected to capital punishment in Cuba, how many have died in prisons and chain-gangs, and how many, in their despair, have committed suicide.

The report refers to the great progress the island has made since the introduction of the Asiatics or Chinese, as they are indiscriminately called, and counts upon the same element for its development during the period of its political reconstruction, after peace has been restored.

It further states that the great want of the island is an abundance of hands, of cheap and easy reposition, and no other country except the Celestial Empire can furnish them.

I have, &c.,

HENRY C. HALL,
Vice-Consul General.

ASIATICS.

Extract from an official document, in which are set forth the origin, results, and prospects as regards the Island of Cuba, by the immigration of this class of laborers.

The committee appointed at the meeting of planters, convened on the 16th of last September under the presidency of his excellency the political governor, with the object of discussing various details relating to Asiatic colonization, in connection with the royal order of the 27th last April, it is understood has laid before the council of administration of this province the report drawn up in accordance with the resolutions adopted at the said meeting.

The committee considering that the matter merits the greatest possible promptitude, and deeming it its duty to propagate those ideas which, by reason of their elevated origin, have a greater influence upon public opinion, have deemed it advisable to extract from the official communication with which His Excellency the political governor forwarded to the supreme government, the copy of the proceedings of the committee of planters before referred to, because in it is to be found a compendium of the economical history of labor in this island, a clear statement of the advancement due to Asiatic immigration, analyses the legislation bearing on the subject, and further, because it proposes and examines improvements and reforms which apply to the perfecting of this branch of the administration, and lays down sound principles of government applicable to the reconstruction and reconstitution of the country, which the insurrection has made necessary. In fine, in every portion of the document are found doctrines of order, morality, and justice, which place Asiatic colonization on its proper ground, which is the development of the wealth of the island, without occasioning confusion of any nature, by first accomplishing, collectively, grand agricultural and industrial enterprises, and afterward by individual efforts in their dedication to smaller cultures and industries.

The governor begins by tracing, in broad and truthful lines, what may be called a primitive economical history of the Island of Cuba, and after stating the causes which influenced the wonderful development of its wealth, comes naturally to the period when, in consequence of international treaties, the slave trade was obliged to cease, and at which the decadence of the island would seem to have begun. From this subject the governor passes to treat of the conflict which arose between industry and agriculture, prefacing, as it were, their total ruin from the scarcity of labor, and recalls the various attempts at free labor, and all of which failed because it was impossible to pass at once from slave to free labor, either because the new systems were not sufficiently perfected, or because the country was not yet sufficiently prepared for a radical change in the mode of developing agrarian property. Needing, then, an abundance of labor, cheapness, and an easy replacement of losses which would naturally occur, no country afforded these conditions so well as the Celestial Empire; and twenty-four years ago the first expedition of Chinese arrived at the island, the number soon reaching such proportions as to render it necessary to establish rules for its regulation, as was done by royal order of 22d March, 1854. By this decree colonists were permitted to become domiciled in the country after the expiration of their contracts, and obtain citizenship papers; provided, always, that the requirements of the laws in force were complied with. The greater number have availed themselves of this privilege, adding to the increase in population and wealth of the island by their industry and the families they formed. But on the 7th July, 1860, a new ordinance was published, and although in the preamble admitted that the introduction of Chinese laborers was, of all other experiments of the same nature, the one least objectionable, by the 7th article made it an essential condition and a special clause to be inserted in every contract, that upon the expiration of his term of service, the laborer should not remain in the island unless he made a new contract of the same character, either as apprentice or journeyman, under the responsibility of a master, or as engaged in agriculture, or as a domestic servant guaranteed by a guardian; otherwise, to leave the island at his own expense, and obliged to do so within two months after the expiration of his contract.

His excellency, duly acknowledging this order, nevertheless inquires whether the object of Asiatic colonization was simply to provide labor for agriculture and industry, or should be considered as a creative element, which, in time, would furnish other labors, and eventually cause slavery to disappear. In the first case, the country itself would advance but little, notwithstanding the increase in its production, because its wealth would rest upon an unstable basis, converting colonization into a simulated servitude, which would impress upon it a most unfavorable character, and without doubt has been the cause of the alarming increase of maroonage, because the Chinese, obliged to remain forever in a state of forced labor or leave the country, losing the happy future which he may have anticipated, it is therefore not strange that there is a great tendency to flee from the power of their masters, and endeavor, by surreptitious means, to remain in the island, as an infinite number have already done, in defiance of the provisions of the ordinances and of the subsequent decrees made for their better execution.

The governor therefore finds, First. That the Chinese, whether fugitive or those who have completed their contracts, obtain surreptitiously the necessary police documents, or make new contracts with fictitious masters, who permit them to do as they please. This is essentially immoral and would not occur, nor, perhaps, any other fraud on the government, if those worthy of the favor were liberally allowed to remain in the island, as decreed by the first ordinance of March 22, 1854. If, notwithstanding, they remain, evading all the existing laws, the reform indicated would remove the evils referred to, and would free the government from difficult positions such as the present, in which compliance with the order is, perhaps, more important than the faults committed. Second. From what has been stated, it can be deduced that there results no benefit to agriculture by the seventh article of the ordinance; and noticing a certain inclination on the part of the Chinese to pass to the United States, it would not be surprising if those who have already completed their contracts, and others, as their terms expire, should prefer to emigrate before recontracting; so that if the object of the seventh article was to obtain, by renewals of engagements, an already acclimated force of laborers without expending a second capital in the acquisition, that measure will prove not to yield very satisfactory results. Between the good and the evil which Asiatic immigration may produce, the choice is not doubtful. There will always be time to correct the latter by perfecting the system, and, regarding the former, the benefit is patent when the United States, Peru, the French Antilles, the island of Mauritius, or Reunion, and other nations and colonies, seek in China laborers for their agricultural and industrial undertakings. The island of Cuba has probably imported the greatest number, and being assuredly the country which has best succeeded in the measure, it is in the condition to perfect the system, and under the imperative necessity of so doing, as slavery cannot be reproduced. For this perfection, but few regulations will suffice, and, in effect, his excellency cites the "Instructions for the application of the ordinance regarding the introduction of Asiatic colonists, their well-behavior and discipline," approved on the 31st December, 1868, which, from the peculiar condition of the country, have not produced the desired results. His excellency recommends these instructions, and especially articles 62, 63, and 64, referring to the renewal of contracts, which contain all the guarantees to be exacted in such cases. The governor also proceeds to notice the royal order of the 27th April last, which was based upon the reports forwarded on the 27th July and 29th August, 1870, to the supreme government by the superior political government of this island, reports which were warranted by the supreme necessity of the preservation of this province, which is the first duty of the government, under which circumstances the laws in force in normal periods cease to rule, and are replaced by what is called in official language discretionary power and reasons of state. The reports were forwarded when no hopes for a speedy pacification were entertained; but the measure could not have been considered of such great urgency, as not until the 27th of last April did the King issue his decree in the sense proposed, that is, suspending immigration and authorizing the superior civil government to cause all those whose terms had expired and had not renewed their contracts, vagabonds, and disturbers of public order, to leave the island. A short time after the publication of the royal order in this city, His Majesty was pleased to authorize the embarkation of colonists in China during the next monsoon; and as the royal order does not exact or require that the superior government shall cause the immediate departure from the island of the Chinese who have filled their contracts and not made new ones, nor even of vagabonds and disturbers of public order, regarding all of whom the measure could be adopted without the necessity of consulting the supreme government, as this government has always been authorized to take any steps necessary to preserve order and repress vagrancy, whoever may be those who deserve punishment; and as the ordinance of 1860, and the instructions of December 31, 1868, amply provide for cases of expiration of contracts and non-renewal, the royal order is reduced to a simple alteration of a part of the 18th article of the ordinance, in that it provides that vagabond Chinese, and others lacking the necessary means, shall be sent away at the expense of the state. Therefore, if deemed expedient, the superior government may disregard the authority given. His excellency then proceeds to consider the reconstruction and reconstitution of the country. He says it is not sufficient alone to triumph over the armed insurrection, but also necessary to conquer the evil ideas of the enemies of our nationality, dictating with this view all measures which may be necessary to return the country to the prosperity in which it was at the outbreak of the insurrection. Though in July or August of last year, the expulsion of the Chinese freedmen and unrecontracted may have been opportune, convenient, and necessary, now that the situation has so completely changed, the execution of the royal decree might bring the country to an economical crisis.

The insurrection is expiring. No one better knows its exact situation than his excellency the superior political governor; that with a few more efforts it will terminate completely, but the destruction and the losses it has occasioned are not easy of immediate repair. The duty, therefore, of reconstructing and reconstituting the country, and setting it in the way of material and moral progress, which leads to the happiness of a people, counsels the adoption of extraordinary measures, which could not have been foreseen by the laws. The government should, therefore, prepare itself, by profound and thoughtful study and meditation on the past and present, to determine the reforms which must be applied; the laws which shall rule and favor the country in its new career, by providing for its future material and moral needs. Restricting himself to material reforms, the governor shows that upon the conclusion of the insurrection, the scarcity of labor will be greater than ever, because of the great number of men who have perished or been rendered incapable, and from the natural distrust to employ those who have been concerned in the insurrection; and, finally, from the greater advantages which will lead many to dedicate themselves to small city or rural occupations, and which will cause the departure of many laborers from this to other departments of the island. All of these causes, as well as the development of lands which had been abandoned, will produce an excessive demand for labor, and will enhance the rates of wages. The crisis which may arise, being one that intimately affects production, the real wealth of Cuba, will be the more deplorable, as it will occur at the very moment when resources will be most necessary to the state and country. It is necessary to provide at once against this evil, and it can be avoided by recurrence to measures already well known and accepted, and to which the country has become accustomed by an experience of twenty-four years.

If the development of lands does not vary in its mode of procedure, Asiatic immigration alone can save the country and restore it to its former splendor.

Whilst free labor can find in manufacturing and mercantile pursuits a comfortable recompense, it is not likely that it would engage in the rude and toilsome tasks of agriculture, for the benefit of a third party; because, so long as the individual has the other resource, he will not consent, by the sweat of his brow, to make land productive which does not belong to him. This has been the great obstacle encountered in all the attempts made, and although there may have been more than one instance where profitable results were obtained, the question should not be regarded as decided from exceptional cases, nor should means which experience has proved useful be imperiled and lost.

In order to fully establish this proposition, in addition to the reasons already given, his excellency says that, from the 3d of June, 1847, the date of the arrival of the first expedition of Chinese which was introduced by the royal "Junta de Fomento," to the present date, there have landed at Havana 109,092 Asiatic colonists, who, at the average price of $340 per contract, represent a total disbursement of $37,081,280, or $1,545,053 yearly. In view of these figures, his excellency exclaims, "And is it possible that within so long a time the country could not discover that it was committing an error in introducing Asiatics? Is it possible that such an immense sum could have been employed inconsiderately by so many proprietors and merchants, intelligent in their respective lines of business? And is not Asiatic colonization sufficiently vouched for, when during the last and present year there have arrived at Havana 2,715 Chinese, whose contracts were immediately transferred, at the price of $400 each, notwithstanding the unhappy state of the island? And, finally, has there not been formed, within a few months, an association of rich planters, with a million of dollars capital, for the sole object of importing Chinese laborers exclusively for their own estates? And does not the "Alianza & Co.," a respectable company, whose members are among the richest planters and capitalists in the island, continue importing Chinese exclusively?"

Against these undeniable proofs of the utility, in portance, convenience, and necessity of Asiatic immigration, it can only be objected that the Chinese commit crimes; that they disturb public order; have taken part in the insurrection; that many are vagabonda. All these faults can be corrected according to law by expelling disturbers and vagabonds, severely punishing those who took part in the insurrection ; in short, redoubling vigilance over all, but not closing the door to the principal element of production.

The reconstruction and reconstitution of the country, then, must commence with the introduction of the greatest possible number of laborers, endeavoring to have them, upon the conclusion of their contracts, domiciled in the country.

To them, as to other free men, should be extended the same facilities for the acquisition of property, although it be by annual rent in a certain space of land which will bring with it the necessity of forming a family ; and when the country is covered with these small proprietors, happy and tranquil as are those in the Vuelta Abajo district, then the domination of Spain in Cuba will be established upon indestructible bases.

He who has a family and property to look out for, will not readily throw himself into the hazards of an insurrection against the constituted government. But it was necessary to begin the execution of the royal order of the 27th of April last, in order to ascertain, so to speak, the condition of the Chinese population of Havana, and from this to deduce approximately the general situation of the island. His excellency, therefore, ordered the arrest of the Asiatics, comprised in article 3 of the royal order, whose police documents were suspicious. About fifteen hundred of the seven thousand Chinese residents in Havana have been arrested, and His Excellency was obliged to suspend the execution of the order, because, judging from the reports of the police that the greater part of those in Havana would be included in the number arrested, there were not sufficient accommodations to hold them. Nor did he think it prudent, such a numerous agglomeration as would have resulted, and also because in view of the service in which the greater part of the Asiatics were engaged, it was deemed proper to take into consideration the inconvenience which might ensue to the public, and, besides, the arrest of so large a number restored the full prestige of the government, which exacts obedience and compliance of its mandates, and the Asiatics would therefore be convinced of the firm determination of the government to make them conform to the laws or leave the island. The Asiatics were carried to the depots assigned them, and the patronos or masters, who had fugitive colonists, convoked to examine and identify any that might belong to them within the space of eight days. At the request of a committee of planters, a meeting under the presidency of his excellency took place on the 16th of September, to discuss various points relating to the important question of Asiatics.

His excellency accompanies a copy of the proceedings, which may be noted as containing the previously formed opinion of his excellency regarding the cardinal point of determining, not on the shipment of all the Chinese, but solely of the vagabonds and turbulent characters—requiring the others to conform to the legal conditions as prescribed in the decree of 7th of July, 1860, and the instructions of December 31, 1863, this last requirement, however, only to be carried into effect after the patronos or masters had identified and recovered their fugitive colonists.

The planters were of opinion that it would be advisable to call into Havana all the Chinese arrested in other portions of the island, in order that the patronos might make the inspection at more length, and that renewals of contracts might be made with more ease. This last measure was so serious, however, that the planters instinctively recognized the difficulties in the way and recommended that precautions be taken, as these Chinese are occupied in agricultural labor, and the damage that might be occasioned to those by whom they are employed would prove considerable.

The governor supports this opinion, and resuming the substance of his conscientious communication is of opinion, respecting the continuation of Asiatic immigration, 1st. That it is useful and of absolute necessity, and the measure which offers least disadvantages. 2d. That the introduction of Chinese should be permitted. 3d. That this introduction be carried on within the precepts of the royal order of the 7th of July, 1860, and of the instructions of December 31, 1863, so long as the reconstruction of the country continues, but as soon as the state of affairs shall permit it, immigration shall continue in the open manner dictated by good principles for creating a positive population, for which end it is indispensable that the Asiatic or any other race that comes to replace or aid them, shall have, after the expiration of his contract, (which comprises a sufficient period to determine whether he be useful or prejudicial to society,) the right to become a citizen, if he be within the conditions necessary to obtain this title.

Regarding the execution of the royal order of 27th April last, the political governor understands, 1st, that vagrants and disturbers of public order, and all whose evil antecedents justify their being qualified as dangerous, be made to leave the island ; 2d, that those who voluntarily desire it shall be permitted to renew their contracts, compelling those who refuse to leave the island ; 3d, that the renewal of contracts be made with persons of recognized integrity, both for agricultural and industrial tasks, and for domestic duties, as the existing ordinance permits ; 4th, that said renewals be made in strict obedience to the dispositions contained in the instructions of December 31, 1866, with special reference to the spirit of articles 46, 47, 48, and 49, as a just guarantee of the rights of the patrones against fugitives, and of articles 62, 63, and 64, as a remedy for the greater part of the abuses which are now the subject of correction; and 5th, that these instructions be newly published, reiterating the necessity for their execution, and presenting the orders necessary to carry into effect the distribution of Asiatics among the patrones or masters with all the requisites prescribed in said instructions.

The political governor upon recommending to his excellency the necessity and convenience of resolving the points submitted to him, and those referred to in the proceedings of the meeting of planters, he cannot refrain from urging on him the importance of hearing the authoritative opinion of those gentlemen, both in reference to the practical application of the said instructions of 31st December, 1866, and the reforms which this requires, and to the report which is prescribed in article 5 of the royal order of 27th April last, in the security that their intelligence and experience will not fail to be useful in determining the resolutions which shall be adopted.

Such is, in extract, the communication of his excellency the political governor. The question of Asiatic colonization is treated in a masterly manner, under all its aspects, and with an abundance of data, reasons and doctrines, which bring to the mind a conviction of the excellence of measures he proposes. This committee hopes that the most excellent administrative council will report favorably upon the petition presented by the political governor, especially now that the entire island, being enlightened by this publication, will recognize the justice with which the government has proceeded, and its interest in the welfare of the country.

THE COMMITTEE.

No. 85.] SHANGHAI, September 7, 1871. (Received October 23.)

SIR: The proposition to return the surplus indemnity fund to the Chinese government having failed to receive the sanction of Congress, I now have the honor to submit some observations touching its proper disposition.

That the Chinese have no legal right to demand the return of this surplus, is beyond question, but whether they are not equitably entitled to it is not so clear; and although Congress does not see fit to give back the money absolutely, it may not be unwilling to appropriate the proceeds in a manner which might, and probably would, prove of greater advantage to the Chinese than the original proposition would, had it been agreed to. The plan I have to propose will, I think, accomplish such a result, and will, at the same time, secure corresponding advantages to the United States.

I would suggest that a sufficient sum thereof be appropriated for the purchase or erection of suitable buildings for a school, in which the natives should be taught our language, and our own people instructed in Chinese, and that the sum remaining should continue as it now is, invested in the United States, the interest of which to be devoted to the maintenance of such a school.

Such an institution could not, in the beginning, be denominated a university or college, nor would it be convenient or wise to confer upon the teachers of it high-sounding titles. Nor would it be necessary to pay the instructors extravagant salaries. Competent teachers could be obtained at moderate cost, and the total annual expense need not be large. If a successful beginning be made, and the school should become popular, it is not unlikely that the Chinese would themselves add to its income in order to extend its advantages. It should be located in Peking, under the immediate supervision of the legation, where it could be seen and known by the high Chinese officials, and where the pure language is spoken and taught.

If I am correctly informed, the income arising from the remainder, after deducting the amount necessary to provide suitable buildings, would be between $15,000 and $20,000 annually. With this income a school, such as is proposed, could be conducted successfully.

The necessity for providing suitable quarters for the legation in Peking was fully stated in a dispatch written in August or September, 1870, to which I again most respectfully beg to call your attention. Were the legation at present occupied purchased, the grounds belonging to it would be ample for all purposes, and the buildings could be extended at small cost to accommodate the school, in addition to the proper accommodation of the minister. Combining the two in this way would make the whole an economical expenditure; and the school, if attached to the legation, would command more attention and respect from the Chinese than if located elsewhere.

If the foregoing suggestions be thought favorably of by the Department, and Congress be disposed to act upon them, I would venture to suggest that sufficient of the original sum, and the interest of the remainder, be appropriated and placed in the hands of the Secretary of State for the purpose of carrying the plan into effect. The arrangement of the plan, and its details, should be left with the President or the Secretary of State, who would be able to gather the information necessary to an intelligent and wise decision regarding its organization and management, and the whole thing could be put in successful operation without any great delay. If required, I would furnish full and minute particulars, of which the foregoing is merely an outline.

I am profoundly impressed as to the advantages likely to result from such a scheme if properly inaugurated and judiciously managed, and I may be pardoned if I venture to call the special attention of the Department to the matter with a view to bringing it before Congress for its consideration.

No. 87.] SHANGHAI, September 9, 1871. (Received Oct. 23.)

SIR: When the consul general was last in Washington he made to the Department several suggestions with a view to increasing the efficiency of the consular system in China. It is understood that one of his recommendations was, that a salaried consul be provided for Tien-tsin in lieu of Chinkiang. The latter port, he thought, might be attached to Shanghai, with a consular agent to do the local business. His recommendations failed, I believe, to receive the sanction of Congress.

The consul now at Tien-tsin is a British subject. He was appointed some years since because he was the only competent person to be found who would accept the office for the emoluments; and although the duties are performed in a satisfactory manner, the fact of such an important post being filled by a foreigner is a subject of unfavorable criticism and complaint by our own citizens.

Tien-tsin is situated at the head of steam and ship navigation on the Petho River. It is the port nearest the capital, and the official residence of the viceroy of the province of Chihli, the superintendents of trade for the three northern ports, and other high Chinese officials. It is regarded by the Chinese as the "gate of the empire." An American line of steamers do a large part of the carrying trade to and from Tien-tsin. Aside from this our commercial interests are not large. The consul resident there is, however, called upon to transact a large amount of judicial business arising out of collisions, loss and damage of cargo, &c., &c. The judicial business of that consulate is, I think, larger than any other, Shanghai only excepted. In addition to the legitimate business the consul at Tien-tsin is the medium for the transmission of all the dispatches and mail-matter to and from Peking; and it is through him that all communications between the legation and the high officials residing at Tien-sin have to pass. These have been, and are likely to be, numerous and of the highest importance. The duties of the consul at that port are important, requiring the service of a man of undoubted ability, integrity, tact, and discretion.

Some months since Eli T. Sheppard, esq., was appointed and confirmed as consul to Tien-tsin.

Mr. Sheppard is now consul at Chinkiang, and is one of the most acceptable officers we have in China. It is hardly to be expected that he will be willing to exchange Chinkiang, where he has a fixed salary, for Tien-tsin, where there is no salary, and where the fees are inconsiderable. Nor is it reasonable to suppose that Mr. Sheppard would, in any event, accept that office, because the fees will not afford him a support.

In view of these considerations I would most respectfully, but urgently, recommend that Tien-tsin be made a salaried consulate, and also that suitable provision be made for a competent interpreter. The salary should not be less than $3,500 per annum.

If Congress should hesitate to increase, in this way, the consular expenses, it might be advisable to omit the usual appropriation for Chinkiang, thus placing that port under the supervision of the consul general at Shanghai. This might, I think, be done without any serious detriment to the public interests.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 14, 1870.

SIR: I inclose with this a transcript of a dispatch of the 28th ultimo, from Mr. O. M. Long, United States consul at Panama, stating that his official proceedings relative to the estate of J. J. Landerer, a deceased naturalized American citizen, had been interfered with by the judge of the civil department of Panama in contravention of the stipulations of the consular convention between the United States and New Granada. You are instructed to lay the facts as given in the dispatch of Mr. Long before the Colombian government, and remonstrate against the course pursued by the local authority in interfering with the administration of the estates of decedents, as in the case adverted to.

SIR: I transmit a copy of a letter of the 6th instant, addressed to this Department by the Acting Comptroller of the Treasury, and of the accompanying statement of the account between this Government and that of the United States of Colombia, with reference to the awards of the joint commission under the conventions of the 10th of September, 1857, and 10th of February, 1864, a copy of which is also herewith transmitted. Pursuant to the account adverted to there was due to this Government by that of Colombia, on the 31st of December last, the sum of $157,372 48. It appears that the last payment was made by that government on the 22d of June, 1868. It is presumed that the account is stated in strict conformity to the terms of payment stipulated in Article III of the convention of 1857. Hence the charge for interest on deferred payments, to which it cannot be anticipated that that government will object. You will mention the subject to the Colombian minister for foreign affairs, and may leave with him a copy of the account. You will say to him that it is desirable that the balance due by Colombia should be paid as soon as may be convenient, especially as we long ago advanced to the claimants the sums awarded to them respectively.

SIR: I transmit a copy of dispatch No. 102, of the 30th ultimo, addressed to this Department by Owen M. Long, esq., consul of the United States at Panama. It relates to recent revolutionary events in that state, and particularly to the seizure and detention of the steamer Montijo, belonging to citizens of the United States, by Thomas Herrera, the leader of the faction in opposition to the Colombian authorities. As the seizure is shown to have taken place before there was any organization of that faction, the members cannot, it is presumed, even under the constitution of Colombia, have been entitled to the rights of belligerents. The seizure was, therefore, a piratical act, for which it is expected that the authors will be held to be judicially accountable. The treaty stipulates that no such seizure shall be made, even by the Colombian authorities, without just compensation to the aggrieved parties. When, therefore, such an act is committed in the waters of that republic by unauthorized persons, the obligation of that government to make amends therefor may be regarded as unquestionable. You will accordingly apply for reparation in this case.

No. 102.]

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,

Panama, May 30, 1871.

SIR: Since my last, No. 101, the revolutionary troubles in this state have all quieted down, and peace once more prevails in all her borders. President Comoro, with a magnanimity unusual in Spanish America, and with a force three times as great as his opponents, has consented to an arrangement with Herrera, by which each party bears off some of the spoils of victory, and the citizens, including foreign merchants, have to foot the bill. After my return from my visit to Captain Selfridge, Colonel Ferrero, the commander of the Colombian or national troops in this state, determined he would send down to David a peace commission to obtain the release of two officers of the Pichincha battalion, stationed in Panama, and who had been captured by Herrera when he made the attempt and captured the suite of the President. I took the opportunity of forwarding the inclosed No. 1 to Captain Stevens, and under its cover the inclosed No. 2 to Herrera; in inclosures Nos. 3 and 4 you will find his reply. Inclosure No. 5 is the sworn statement of Mr. John Schuber, which completely refutes Herrera's charge of Mr. Schuber being in sympathy with the rebellion.

Herrera's statements also of the Montijo having no papers to designate her nationality on board at the time of her capture are false, as the captain had with him a receipt for his register, and other papers belonging to the boat, said papers being in my office in Panama. The Montijo always, except when going out of the jurisdiction of this consulate, deposited her papers in this office and took my receipt for them. As the Montijo carried the mails and dispatches gratuitously between this port and David, she had permission from the state of Panama to run into all her ports and navigate the waters without the payment of any fees whatever. His charge as to her having lost her nationality in her previous complicity with rebellions in this state cannot be sustained, as Mr. Schuber had a perfect right to charter his vessel to any party. When engaged in such contracts he, however, lost his protection as an American or neutral vessel. This Mr. Schuber well knew, and he chose to run the risk. The recent case bears no analogy to the first. In the recent case Mr. John Schuber most positively refused, while in David, to charter his vessel to Herrera; he delayed his departure several days, and supposed that their intentions had been abandoned, when he aluded to leave for Panama. My entire action in this case has been based upon the following statements of facts, which are substantiated by the affidavits inclosed. I contend that, even allowing these adventurers the privileges of belligerents, they did not possess these rights till after some organization was made by which they became a power recognized by international law.

The constitution of Colombia, very unwisely, I think, recognizes the right of the citizens of the several states to rebel at any time and throw off the authority of the old state and organize a new one by force of arms. But does that right give any authority to a few daring and adventurous spirits to collect a band or marauders and appropriate private property to their own uses? If that transaction had taken place in Panama, they could, with equal right, have walked into the office of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, or into that of the Royal Mail Company, or the Pacific Steam Navigation Company's office, and have demanded the treasure that is often found there, it being a very necessary sinew of war.

Mr. Schuber's boat was captured on the 6th of April, 1871, as proved in all the affidavits. Herrera, in his letter to me, says that the provisional government was not organized in David till the 8th of April, two days afterwards, thus showing conclusively that, if he had rights after the 8th of April, in consequence of the organization of his government, he could have had no rights before that except what brute force gave him. I so represented the facts of the case to Commander Selfridge, and he, I thought, entirely concurred with me in my view of the case; but in consequence of the near completion of his explorations, did not deem it advisable to withdraw the Resaca from the Luján River, being apprehensive that if he did so he would not be able to resume his duties on account of the advent of the rainy season.

Revolutions in this entire country are gotten up in the same way; they are nothing but speculations upon the part of some daring and needy adventurers; and as they have nothing to lose and everything to gain, they commence by collecting a few followers, and then seize upon neutral property and levy heavy contributions upon money and subsistence of the inhabitants who have any means. If these men were once taught that such occurrences and spoliations upon American property would not be tolerated, but that all engaged in such piratical acts would be punished with the pains and penalties attached to such crimes, it would have a most excellent effect in checking that morbid tendency to get up these periodical disturbances.

I have on all occasions cautioned our American citizens to abstain from every act which might be considered as in violation of our neutrality.

When I visited Commander Selfridge I bore to him authority from President Comoro, and also from Colonel Ferrero, commanding the national forces in this state, and both acting as agents of the Colombian government, to visit any of the bays, harbors, and rivers in this state, in search of the Montijo, and to land forces, if necessary, to recapture her and restore her to her owners.

The Montijo has not yet been delivered up to the Messrs. Schubers, but was dispatched by President Comoro to convey the rebel troops back to David, in spite of representations made by me to him, based upon the affidavits of Captain Saunders and Chief Engineer Howard, which are herewith inclosed, (inclosures Nos. 6, 7, and 8.)

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

OWEN M. LONG,

To CAPTAIN STEVENS,

Of the Panama Railroad Company's steamer Winchester:

SIR: Understanding that the vessel which you command, belonging to the Panama Railroad Company, is about to embark for the ports in the upper part of this State, with peace commissioners and officers of the Colombian government, I would take this occasion to advise you of the delicate position you occupy, and warn you against any infraction of neutrality in the important domestic revolution which has recently occurred in this State. Bearing the flag of the United States, you will do all in your power to secure a cessation of hostilities, and, if it be possible, to secure a restoration to the Messrs. Schuber & Bro. of their steamer Montijo, which has been piratically seized, and is now in the possession of the revolutionary powers in the department of Chiriquí.

You are also empowered to inform those persons who now so unjustly detain and keep the Montijo from her proper owners, that if they do not immediately release the said vessel, that all the available forces of the United States in these waters will be employed in the recapture of the said steamer Montijo, and to all those found in resistance the pains and penalties of piracy will be inflicted.

In testimony whereof I have hereto set my hand and affixed the seal of this consulate at Panama, this day and date above written.

To Thomas Herrera and all others whom it may concern :

Mr. Henry Schuber, of the firm of H. Schuber & Bro., of this city, both American citizens and owners of the steamer Montijo, an American vessel, duly registered in the proper office in New York, and whose papers are on file in this office, has entered his protest in the office of the United States consulate at Panama, that his vessel, the Montijo, in the lawful prosecution of her return trip from David to Panama, was captured and taken possession of by you and others, on the 6th day of April last, and that the said vessel is still detained and kept by you from his lawful possession and use: I therefore, as consul of the United States, do, in the name of the United States, demand and require the immediate restoration of the American steamer Montijo to her lawful owners, the Messrs. Schuber and Bro., under the pains and penalties usually inflicted upon those guilty of piratical acts.

In testimony whereof I have hereto subscribed my name and affixed the seal of the consulate at Panama, day and date above written.

HEADQUARTERS AT RIVER HATO, May 5, 1871.

Mr. Consul of the United States of America :

SIR: In addressing you for the first time I am pleased at being able to inform you that the revolution which took place in the City of David on the 8th day of April last, and at the head of which the will of my fellow-citizens has placed me, now possesses the departments of Chiriqui, Beraguas, Los Santos, and Coele, where the populace acknowledge the new authorities and give them every class of assistance.

I am equally pleased to be able to inform you that you have nothing to fear for the security of your subjects, because in all places where the new government is recognized they enjoy, as foreigners, all the guarantees to which they have the right as such.

I expect soon to be in possession of the whole state, for I possess sufficient force to subdue the two departments which yet remain under the yoke of the few soldiers of the government which to-day succumbs before the uniform opinion of all the inhabitants of the Isthmus; and meanwhile I promise myself that the friendly relations will not suffer the least alteration which have existed up to now between the Government which you represent and that of our country.

With sentiments of the most distinguished consideration, Mr. Consul, I subscribe myself your attentive servant,

HERRERA.

No. 4.

United States of Colombia, executive power of the sovereign state of Panama, provisional government, presidency of the state, department of Coele No. 3.

Mr. Consul of the United States of America at Panama:

SIR: I have the honor to address you for the purpose of stating that I have seen with surprise in La Estrella de Panama of the 27th of April, of this year, that Commander Selfridge, commander of North American naval forces, is disposed to personally interfere with them, and to rescue (ransom) the steamer Montijo, and treat as pirates those who hold her, on the supposition that they have outraged the flag of the United States of America. You will allow me to declare the provisional government has never intended to outrage the North American flag, nor that of any other friendly nation, and if it has taken into its service the steamer Montijo, it has been for the following reasons:

1st. That this steamer, although she carries the North American flag, has no register or other document which proves her nationality.

2d. That, although this steamer were North American, she has lost her neutral character, because she has previously mixed in our political disputes.

3d. That the government is disposed, as it has offered to Mr. John Schüber, to pay for all the services the Montijo may render it.

To this may be added the fact that Mr. John Schuber recognizes and is in harmony with the provisional government, and that this has given him every guarantee he has solicited. I expect that the consul to whom I have the honor to address this will take into consideration the foregoing reasons, and that he will explain to Commander Selfridge that he has no right to interfere with the forces at his command to rescue the steamer Montijo, for all intervention he may exercise in favor of one of the belligerents must be considered as a violation of international law.

Moreover, Mr. Consul, I must observe that the intervention of North American forces in the internal questions of our country will prolong the war, to the prejudice of foreigners.

The assistance which is wished to be given by Captain Selfridge to a government which cannot count upon public opinion and which seeks to sustain itself by foreign forces, although that to-day will not influence the result, will still be a shame for him who begs that assistance, which ought not to be given by the representative of the nation which is the most liberal and just on the face of the globe.

I am, &c.,

HERRERA.

I, Owen M. Long, United States Consul for Panama and its dependencies, certify that the above is a true and correct copy of the translation of the letter received by me in Spanish from Herrera, word for word and figure for figure, as recorded in my book of letters received in my office.

In testimony whereof I have hereto set my hand and attached the seal of the consulate at Panama this 29th day of May, A. D. 1871.

No. 5.

I, John Schuber, of the firm of H. Schuber & Bro., of Panama, being duly sworn by the United States consul, at his office in Panama, on this 23d day of May, A. D. 1871, depose and say as follows, to wit:

My name is John Schuber; am 38 years of age; am an American citizen and a partner in the house of H. Schuber & Bro.; we are the owners of the steamship Montijo, running between the ports of Panama and David. Said steamer is an American vessel, duly registered in the proper office in the city of New York. I was on board of her when she was captured by Thomas Herrera and his party. Before she sailed from David for Panama, Thomas Herrera and Domingo Dias met me in the streets of David, and proposed to hire or charter the steamer Montijo; I told them that I would not, under any circumstances, charter her to any party contemplating a political revolution, and that that was their object, I protested against chartering her to them or any other person for that purpose. I told them that I could not and would not do so for any money that they could pay me. This conversation was at night, on the 2d, 3d, or 4th of April.

The day after this conversation, Thomas Herrera came to me again and repeated the proposition. He told me that he would not take the steamer from me without my consent. On the morning of the 5th, we took on board our cattle and passengers, the general cargo having been brought on board before the 5th of April. We sailed from David that evening, bound for the city of Panama. We had a full passenger list, among whom were Thomas Herrera and Domingo Dias. I supposed that they were bound for Panama, and did not anticipate any attempt on their part to capture the boat. The Montijo sailed from David under the command of Captain James H. Saunders. We went down the river till near Boca Chico, where we were compelled to anchor and wait for the tide. As soon as the tide served we got up anchor, and were just getting under way, when the chief engineer reported to the captain that the tubes or flues in his boiler had given out, and we accordingly again cast our anchor and repaired our flues. As soon as the tide served the next day we got under way, and proceeded as far as the mouth of the river, when the engineer reported that another of the tubes was leaking, and that it would be dangerous to go to sea without repairing it. We again cast anchor, and at 4 o'clock p. m., on the 6th of April, I being on deck forward, heard some of the passengers say a vessel was approaching us. As soon as Thomas Herrera saw the vessel, he came to me and asked me to hoist a signal, so that the vessel could come in. I refused to do so, and told him that I was not captain of the ship, and that he must go to the captain for any such orders. He went to the captain, and the captain came to me and said that they wanted him to hoist a signal, which was one of a very unusual character, namely, the ensign at the fore. He said he wanted it done so that the schooner might understand it and come in. I then told Captain Saunders that he was captain of the ship, and to do his duty. Thomas Herrera and party then demanded of the captain the flag, which he positively refused to give up. They then told him that if he did not give it up they would take it by force, which they proceeded to do with drawn revolvers, threatening the captain's life. By force they took the flag from him and hoisted it at the fore. The schooner then immediately came in and anchored close to us. Manuel Dias and Colonel Paris then came on board from the schooner and joined the party that had taken possession of the Montijo.

They then ordered the captain to have steam ready next morning at four o'clock. At four o'clock next morning we proceeded outside to hail a schooner that was in sight. We then returned to the mouth of the river and took the schooner that lay by us the night before in tow, and proceeded up the river some twelve or fifteen miles and came to anchor. The same day we took the arms and ammunition which were on board the schooner on board of the steamer. The boats of the steamer and the schooner were then sent up the stream some distance, and returned with some one hundred and twenty men, who were all embarked on board of the steamer. Some of those men that came on board had arms, others not; the unarmed men were all supplied. About three o'clock that evening we proceeded up to the port of Pedrigal, the port of David. All the men and officers on board of the steamer, with the exception of a guard of two officers and some ten or fifteen men, were disembarked and proceeded to the city of David, which they captured without much opposition. As soon as the men were disembarked to take David, the captain was ordered to take the ship down the river near the mouth of the Chiriqui, where we came to anchor; he was ordered to remain there till further orders. Early in the morning of the 8th of April the captain was ordered to bring the boat up to Mangota, her usual port. We arrived there about five o'clock that evening, when I left the ship and went to David.

The cattle were now all landed, and the passengers who had been on board all this time, were now permitted to go ashore. After the town of David was captured, and not till then, was there any provisional government established or proclaimed by Thomas Herrera or any other persons. When we left David for Panama the state officers belonging to the government of President Comoro were in office, and forwarded their usual dispatches to the capital.

The Montijo was captured on the evening of the 6th of April; the city of David was captured on the night of the 7th of April, 1871. Next morning, the 8th, the provisional government was proclaimed in David, with Thomas Herrera as provisional president, and Domingo Obaldia was installed as prefect of the department of Chiriqui. We were all considered as prisoners, and none of us, including the captain and crew, were permitted to leave the boat till after the capture of David, when I, with the passengers, were permitted to go ashore. I had permission to leave David for Sona; here I was detained and prevented from leaving till about the 8th day of May, when I chartered a schooner and had to leave the place secretly. I reached Panama on the 17th day of May, 1871.

Personally appeared before me at my office in Panama, on the 22d day of May, A. D. 1871, Robert Howard, chief engineer of the steamship Montijo, who, being duly sworn, makes the following statement of facts, to which he has subscribed his name in my presence:

My name is Robert Howard, 45 years of age; I have been chief engineer for the Montijo for the last 14 months; was acting as such at the time of her capture by the revolutionists at David. Have been on her ever since. She was captured on the 6th of April last, and has been under steam ever since; the engines have been very much injured in consequence of the want of proper oil; the boilers are in a very unfit condition to go to sea, and I consider the attempt to do so extremely hazardous to the safety of the boat and all on board, and, as chief engineer, I protest against being required to raise steam or set the engines in motion until her boilers and engines have been repaired.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Panama, May 16, 1871.

Personally appeared before me Owen M. Long, United States consul for Panama, at my office, in Panama, day and date above written, Mrs. Hannah Elizabeth Saunders, wife of Captain James H. Saunders, of the American steamer Montijo, the property of Messrs. Henry Schuber & Bro., American citizens now doing business in Panama, who, after being duly sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, depose and saith as follows: I am the wife of Captain James H. Saunders, of the Montijo; I went on board of the Montijo at David, on the 5th of April, with the intention of coming to Panama. We left David on the evening of the 5th, and anchored, on account of the tide, at Boca St. Pedro, in the David River. Next morning, the 6th, we got up steam, raised our anchors, and proceeded on our voyage. We had hardly gone a ship's length before two of the flues gave out and we were forced to cast our anchors again. In about four hours we succeeded in repairing the flues, so as to start for Boca Chica, the mouth of David River, where we arrived between 12 and 1 o'clock. At this point several more tubes in our boilers gave out, which required some three or four hours to repair. We were making preparations to go to sea when a schooner hove in sight. As soon as the schooner made its appearance, Thomas Herrera and Domingo Dias, with fifteen or twenty other persons who had embarked as passengers from David to Panama, suddenly and without any warning approached the captain and ordered him to hoist his United States flag at the fore. They were all well armed and presented their revolvers at him, and threatened to shoot him if he did not so hoist it. They forcibly took the flag, and he made an effort to retake it, but was met by drawn revolvers and machetes.

The flag was hoisted by them at the fore, when the schooner approached and was towed up the river some little distance, when the arms and ammunition on board of the schooner were transferred to the Montijo, after which the Montijo left and returned to David. She then disembarked the troops which she had received on board while lying in the river, and after she had got the arms and ammunition from the schooner. After sending the troops ashore, she proceeded down the river a short distance and remained there till next afternoon's tide, which was the 8th day of April. As soon as the tide served they came up the river to their old landing, and put all the cattle, arms, and ammunition ashore. The said cattle were embarked at David for Panama. We supposed that we would make a good trip, as she was full of passengers and freight. Mr. John Schuber, one of the owners of the Montijo, was on board, and refused to acquiesce in the seizure of the flag and boat, and, with Captain Saunders, protested against their acts. From the hoisting of the flag at the fore, they took possession of the ship, and she still remains in their possession till the present time.

Neither Herrera, or Dias, or any other person or persons ever proclaimed themselves as revolutionists, or as being in arms against the government of Panama, till after the capture of the Montijo. Captain Saunders and the entire crew of the Montijo were taken prisoners and have been forcibly detained on board till this present writing. They refused me the privilege of coming ashore here, but I insisted upon it, and, after much remonstrance, I was sent off from Toboga in a small-boat and reached Flaneca in time to take the tow-boat Panama to Panama. From the time of the capture of the Montijo till the present, Herrera and Diaz have been apprehensive of a rescue by the United States ship Resaca, and have always kept her in shallow water or up in small rivers to keep her out of the reach of the Resaca.

No. 8.

Personally appeared before me at my office in Panama, this 22d day of May, A. D. 1871, James H. Saunders, master of the American steamer Montijo of New York, who, being duly sworn, has made and subscribed to the following statement of facts, viz:

My name is James H. Saunders, master of the steamer Montijo, an American vessel registered in the port of New York. I was in command on the 6th day of April, 1871, when she was captured by Thomas Herrera and others. We left David on the 5th of April last, bound for Panama, and had proceeded as far as Boca Chica, at the mouth of the river David, when, in consequence of the bursting of the tubes in the boiler, we could not proceed to sea, and were compelled to cast anchor till our boilers were repaired. Before we were able to make the necessary repairs, at about 4½ o'clock, p. m., Thomas Herrera, with some nine others, who all of them had taken passage for Panama, having recognized a signal made by a schooner approaching us from the south-west, suddenly presented themselves to me, and with arms in their hands required me to hoist the American flag at the fore. This I refused to do, supposing it was a signal for the schooner to attack and capture the Montijo, never for a moment supposing that the party on board had any idea of capturing us.

I refused to do such an unusual thing, and told them so, at which they said they would hoist it themselves, and proceeded, forcibly and violently, to remove the flag from my possession. My life was threatened by them, and I was unwillingly forced to submit to have the flag hoisted at the fore. I was then told by Thomas Herrera that I must consider the Montijo as captured and in possession of themselves, and that I must also consider myself and crew as prisoners, and that they would not suffer us to leave or abandon the boat.

At the time of capture we had on board a full cargo, consisting of cattle, freight, and passengers, and were expecting to make a profitable trip.

The schooner had come close alongside of us and cast her anchor. On the evening of the 6th, Mr. Herrera ordered me to have steam up and be ready to sail by 4 o'clock next morning, the 7th of April. At 4 o'clock next morning we left our anchorage and proceeded out of the mouth of the river to sea, and hailed a small schooner, when we returned to our former anchorage and took in tow the schooner which had been lying alongside us.

We then took from the schooner all the arms and ammunition on board of said schooner. While we were engaged in taking on board the arms and ammunition from the schooner, Thomas Herrera ordered all the boats up the river, and in a short time the boats returned to the Montijo, filled with soldiers. They made some three trips up the river, returning each time with their boats filled with men, who were all put on board of the Montijo.

At 3 o'clock p. m. on the 7th of April, 1871, I was ordered to leave for Petrigall, the port of David, where we arrived at 5 o'clock p. m. The troops, with the exception of two officers and fifteen men, were then disembarked. These two officers and fifteen men were left on board as a guard. I was then ordered, by them, down the river about fifteen miles, where we came to anchor and lay till about 4 o'clock p. m. of the 8th. That morning, at 9 o'clock a. m., I received orders to take the boat to Mangota, the regular landing port of the boat. We arrived there at 5 o'clock p. m. the same day. About thirty men came on board and relieved the guard; we then hauled into the dock and landed all the cattle which had been kept on board till this time. The next morning all the arms and ammunition were landed. We lay here till the morning of the 12th of April. The guard on board were now relieved by some seventy-five or eighty men, in command of one Colonel Franchori and other officers. At 9.30 a. m. on the 12th, I was ordered to go to sea; after getting out to sea, I was ordered to proceed to Munché, the port of Los Tablas, where we arrived at 10 o'clock a. m. of the 13th. I now learned that the party which captured the steamer was in revolution against the regular and constitutional government, and that their object in going to Los Tablas was to capture the president, General Comoro.

When the steamer was first captured and taken possession of I protested against all such acts, and told them that I would do nothing except upon compulsion; to this they replied that was easy enough to do, and warned me against any refusal to do their orders. We reached Los Tablas on the 13th at 10 o'clock a. m. They then sent spies up to Los Tablas and found that the president, Comoro, was expected there that night. At 6 o'clock p. m. on the 13th, the troops on board were landed, leaving a guard of fifteen men on board, with one officer, who had charge of the boat. From this till the 22d day of May, 1871, I was forcibly detained on board and allowed no communication whatever with shore. At 10.30 o'clock a. m., the 22d day of May, I left and came ashore to make this my statement of the facts in this case.

The ship at this time was lying about five miles out from Panama. When I left the officer in charge protested against my leaving the ship; I would also give it as my decided opinion that in the present condition of the Montijo she is entirely unseaworthy, her boilers requiring repairs, and her machinery needing also many repairs. Sending her to sea in her present condition is a great risk.

SIR: I have just received a communication from Señor Zapata, in which he informs me that he has made application through the Colombian minister in Washington for an extension of time on the balance of the Panama claim. His proposal is to pay in equal annual installments, to be complete in four years. This government is at present bankrupt. Their whole available revenue is about $800,000; of this they have lost $250,000 by the failure of the Panama Railroad. They have been compelled to suspend all works of internal improvement; they have cut the army down to 1,000 men; have reduced all salaries 10 per cent. and it is simply impossible for them to pay as things now are.

The extension sought will be gratefully received, and is, I think, as safe an arrangement as can be made.

I have presented your views, as indicated in the same, to Señor Zapata, secretary for foreign affairs, together with copies of the affidavits accompanying your dispatch.

I believe, however, that it will be found that the national government is powerless to punish the piratical acts of Herrera and his crew through any judicial tribunals known in this country, and that the outrage committed and unredressed will require other action than can be obtained through the courts of Colombia.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, August 17, 1871. (Received October 2.)

SIR: I forward, as an inclosure, translation of dispatch from Señor Zapata on the subject of the steamer Montijo. The president is no doubt sincere in his wishes, and pledges to pursue judicially Herrera and his companions; but I feel sure that no probability exists of any satisfactory punishment being awarded. Unfortunately, the proceedings in the first instance must be brought in the state courts of Panama; tribunals of wretched character and notorious venality. The legitimate government of Panama concluded a formal treaty of peace with these insurgents, granted an amnesty for all offenses, and elected one of their leaders (Franceschi) to congress.

Although this offense was beyond their power to condone, the effect of the amnesty upon the court below will be very great. The questions really involved will probably not be decided until the cause shall reach (by appeal) to the federal supreme court held in this city.

I hope that the Colombian courts may be able to convict and punish in this case, as such conviction, acting directly upon the guilty parties, will be far more valuable than reclamation for damages, to be paid from the general treasury of the nation; but the inherent weakness and venality of their judicial system is so great that my hope is against my judgment. I have not forwarded to the Department my own communication to Señor Zapata, to which the inclosed is a reply; it is rather long, as it contains a statement of the testimony arranged from the affidavits forwarded to me, and inasmuch as Señor Zapata readily conforms to the demand for reparation by judicial proceedings, it is not worth while to copy the demand itself, unless the Department desires to be in possession of the whole correspondence.

MR. MINISTER: The executive power has very attentively considered the reclamation which your excellency has presented in the name of the Government of the United States of America, to the end that the captors of the steamer Montijo may be tried and punished in accordance with the laws of the country, in satisfaction for the wrongs which your excellency claims to have been committed against the personal security and the property of American citizens, and the insult offered to the flag of the United States.

The reclamation of your excellency and the accompanying documents have been transmitted to the attorney general of the nation in order that he may pursue the proper legal course before the proper judges.

On his part the president will see to it that the judicial proceedings shall pursue their course without any delay, and your excellency may be satisfied that the justice of the country will be faithfully administered.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, August 27, 1871. (Received October 14.)

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of my dispatch to Señor Zapata on the affair of the Montijo. His reply was forwarded by last mail.

I believe that, in the hurry of doing up the last mail, I neglected to number my last dispatches. They are numbered on my records 56 and 57.

Your obedient servant,

S. A. HURLBUT.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, August 3, 1871.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States of America, has the honor to present his respects to the honorable Felipe Zapata, secretary for foreign relations, and to inform him that he is instructed by the honorable the Secretary of State of the United States to present the demand of the United States of America upon the government of Colombia for reparation for the recent outrageous acts of Thomas Herrera and others, in the State of Panama, in this case of the American steamer Montijo.

The facts indisputably proven in this case are these: The aforesaid steamer Montijo was an American vessel, lawfully registered as such, with her proper papers and evidences of nationality. She was under the flag of the United States, engaged in the lawful business of carrying freight and passengers from the city of Panama to other ports of that state.

Her owners are American citizens, residing in the city of Panama.

In the usual course of her legitimate business as a trading-vessel, the Montijo was in the port of David in said state. One of her owners, John Schuber, was on board. About the 2d or 3d of April, 1871, while still in said port of David, Thomas Herrera and Domingo Diaz proposed to Mr. Schuber to charter his steamer. Schuber, suspecting some revolutionary movement on their part, positively refused, and gave such suspicion as his reason for refusing.

On the 5th of April, the steamer, having taken on board her cargo and her passengers, sailed from David bound for Panama. She had a full list of passengers, among them Domingo Diaz and Thomas Herrera. On the morning of the 6th of April the Montijo, being then at anchor at Boca Chica to repair her boilers, a schooner appeared in the offing, upon sight of which Herrera and Diaz demanded of Schuber, the owner, and of Saunders, the captain, that they should set the American ensign of the steamer in a manner indicated by them. Both refused to do so, as it was evidently a preconcerted signal. Herrera and Diaz, and their friends on board the Montijo, then took the flag from the captain's possession by force, threatening him with drawn revolvers.

They then proceeded to set the ensign, upon which the schooner came alongside, and Manuel Diaz and a Colonel Parés, and some others, joined the party who had thus forcibly usurped possession of the Montijo.

From that time, for many days, this steamer was held by this band of pirates, used by them in making war upon the constitutional government of Panama, her officers and crew compelled, by threats and violence, to remain prisoners on board their own vessel, and to work her as ordered by her captors. The vessel itself, the boilers and machinery, were injured and damaged by such use, her stores were used up and destroyed, her insurance periled, her regular and legitimate business broken up, and the whole equipment of ship and crew diverted from legitimate commerce and made involuntary parties in the disgraceful internal quarrel between rival aspirants for power in the state of Panama.

I am instructed to state to the government of Colombia that, in the opinion of the Government of the United States of America, the acts aforesaid, committed by Thomas Herrera and others, his partisans, constitute the high crime of piracy, and deserve the most severe and condign punishment.

This offense, it is to be remarked, was not perpetrated upon the high seas, but in the navigable waters whose exclusive jurisdiction is with the republic of Colombia.

The right and the duty of punishing the perpetrators of this high crime rest upon the country within whose jurisdiction the offense was committed.

I am instructed to apply for reparation for the insult offered to the American flag within the waters of Colombia; for the highly criminal and piratical act of seizing by force and arms a peaceable American vessel; of reducing her owner, captain and crew to the condition of prisoners, and so holding them for many days, making them unwilling agents of a nefarious conspiracy against peace and good order, periling their lives and health in such enterprise, injuring the property of the owners of the steamer, and for all other damage which may have accrued or may accrue from such unlawful and felonious acts.

It is, therefore, reasonably expected by the United States of America that the perpetrators of these high-handed outrages will be vigorously prosecuted, under the laws of the United States of Colombia, to conviction for the crime of which they are evidently guilty.

This reparation by judicial punishment is due to the dignity of the nation whose flag has been insulted, and whose citizens have been imprisoned, and also to the dignity of the republic within whose waters so gross an outrage has been committed.

The undersigned is unofficially informed that some arrangement for an arbitration has been entered into by the owners of the steamer. The United States of America have nothing to do with any disposition made by them as to their private loss and injury, the question more immediately concerning the Government at this time being adequate and prompt punishment, by judicial proceedings against the criminals, for the offenses stated.

The undersigned may be permitted to state, in addition to the foregoing, that the fact that the outrages complained of occurred in the course of one of the numerous revolutions which unfortunately afflict this country, does not, in his judgment, constitute the slightest excuse for the acts complained of.

The revolution itself, in his opinion, was a crime, which the laws and usages of Colombia may mitigate, condone, or excuse; that, so far as affects Colombian citizens only, is a matter for Colombia alone. But when such a pretended revolution, not against the general government, but against a particular state government, assumes to violate the laws of civilized nations, the treaty stipulations of their own country, and the sovereignty of a foreign friendly nation over its own ships and its own flag, it is taken out of the category of domestic disorders, and arrives at the dignity of an offense against civilization, and must be promptly and effectually punished.

In the full confidence that the judicial power of Colombia is competent to administer complete and effective justice against the criminals indicated for the acts perpetrated by them, the undersigned, on behalf of his Government, has the honor to renew the request that all necessary steps may be taken by the executive power to bring about so desirable an end.

The undersigned also has the honor to present herewith the sworn statements of John Schuber, Robert Howard, Mrs. Hannah E. Saunders, and Captain Saunders, the originals of which are on file in the office of the United States consul at Panama, and which are believed to be absolutely true in all substantial matters, and has the honor to be, &c.,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: I transmit a copy of a letter of the 20th instant, addressed to this Department by David Hoadley, president of the Panama Railroad Company, setting forth the reasons for the failure of that company to pay the subsidy due by them to the Colombian government on the 15th of August last, and subsequently. The letter also represents that information had been received that that government had directed its attorney general to commence suit against the company on the isthmus for the amount due, and to attach the company's property for double that sum. A clause of the contract of the company is quoted to show that such a proceeding would be in violation of that instrument.

This Government must presume that, in entering into the contract, the company acted with deliberation, took into consideration both the ability and the disposition of the Colombian government to fulfill its part of the bargain, and its own ability to do the same under any contingencies, however unexpected or adverse. The abstract right of that government to hold the company accountable for any breach of the contract will not be questioned. This Government, however, will expect that if the Colombian government should deem it advisable to hold the company to the literal performance of their part of the contract, that it will itself be guided, in enforcing the penalty, by a strict observance of the terms. If, however, that government should take a more liberal view of the subject, and should cancel the contract of 1867, as proposed by the company, this Government, in view of the large interests of esteemed citizens embarked in the enterprise, would regard that course as a proof of a friendly disposition on the part of Colombia. It is not usual for this Government officially to interfere in matters of contract between citizens of the United States and foreign governments. There is no determination to disregard the rule in this instance. The considerable public interests involved in the matter may, however, be deemed to warrant you in at least making such informal representations upon the subject as may induce that government to pause in committing any harsh and premature act to the prejudice of the company. This course you will consequently pursue.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND THE COLOMBIAN LEGATION AT WASHINGTON.

No. 60.

*Mr. Perez to Mr. Fish.*LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA, Washington, D. C., February 7, 1871. (Received February 7.)

MR. SECRETARY: I have received instructions to solicit the issue of such orders as may be thought necessary, to the end that Colombian vessels may be treated in the ports of the United States to which they may convey merchandise, when the latter does not proceed from any other ports of the said United States in the same ocean, in the same manner as (are other) American vessels employed in the same trade; that is, "that neither distinct nor higher duties be collected for the tons of the vessel or for its cargo, be the importation made in vessels of the one or of the other country," as is stipulated in article 4 of the treaty of December 12, 1846, between New Granada and the United States.

By said treaty it was settled, as to commerce and navigation, that there should be perfect equality and reciprocity between the two countries, and indeed within the Colombian territory. Merchandise arriving there or going out under the American flag is free from every discriminating duty.

I deem it unnecessary now to enumerate the advantages which the United States have derived, almost exclusively, from the traffic and the transit across the isthmus of Panama since the ratification of the treaty.

I only need say that Colombia now desires to make use of the equality therein stipulated, in order to insure the establishment of a line of steam-vessels, to encourage commercial relations between the two countries with reciprocal and increasing benefit.

I have the honor, &c.,

S. PEREZ.

No. 61.

Mr. Fish to Mr. Perez.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 8, 1871.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your note of yesterday, stating that you had received instructions to solicit the issue of such orders as may be thought necessary, to the end that Colombian vessels may be treated in the ports of the United States to which they may convey merchandise, when the latter does not proceed from any other port of the United States in the same ocean, in the same manner as American vessels employed in the same trade. Your note further adverts to the fact that the privilege desired was secured by the treaty between the United States and New Granada of the 12th of December, 1846.

In reply I have to state that, as your request seems to imply an opinion on the part of your government that the treaty adverted to has been definitively terminated, it is deemed advisable to hold the application under consideration until no doubt shall remain upon that point. The 35th article of the treaty stipulates that it shall last for twenty years from the exchange of ratifications, which took place on the 10th of June, 1848. The same article further provides, "Notwithstanding the foregoing, if neither party notifies to the other its intention of reforming any of or all the articles of this treaty, twelve months before the expiration of the twenty years stipulated above, the said treaty shall continue binding on both parties, beyond the said twenty years, until twelve months from the time that one of the parties notifies its intention of proceeding to a reform."

It appears that under date the 23d of January, 1867, General Salazar, then accredited to this Government as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of Colombia, addressed to this Department a note from New York, in which he stated that he had been instructed to set on foot a negotiation for the purpose of renewing the treaty prior to the termination fixed in the 35th article.

The receipt of this note was acknowledged in one from the Department of the 29th of January.

With another note of the 23d of April, 1867, General Salazar transmitted a copy of the changes which his government desired in the treaty, and offered to discuss the subject at such time as might be appointed for that purpose.

It does not appear that any reply was made to the last-mentioned note, or that the discussion proposed by General Salazar took place. There is also nothing on record or on file here to show that the notes of General Salazar referred to were regarded and received as such a termination of the treaty as that for which the instrument itself provides.

Nor does it appear that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States has been informed that the treaty is at an end, and, therefore, that the privileges previously enjoyed under it by Colombia in the ports of the United States must be discontinued. Indeed, so far as this Department is aware, those privileges, including the one requested by Mr. Perez, are still enjoyed by Colombian vessels and their cargoes. In any event, before a definitive answer can be given to your application, or your request can be complied with, it will be necessary for you to state that, from your own knowledge, a similar privilege is enjoyed by vessels of the United States and their cargoes in the ports of Colombia.

I avail, &c.,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA,
Washington, February 13, 1871. (Received February 14.)

MR. SECRETARY: In the communication which I had the honor to address you on the 7th instant, it was not my intention to state that, in the opinion of my government, the treaty of 1846 between New Granada, now the United States of Columbia, and the United States of America had become null and void.

On the contrary, in soliciting, as I did, the issue of certain regulations, and in basing this request expressly on the provisions of the treaty, I think I recognized that it is now in force, and I have received no instructions whatever to present any observation against this.

It is, moreover, obvious that when my government thinks proper that any modifications should be introduced into said treaty, it will propose them to that of the United States, as it did in the cases which you have been pleased to mention.

With respect to the manner in which trade is carried on between the two countries, and to the necessity of issuing regulations to cause the observance of the treaty in respect to trade, I think it will be sufficient to state the following facts, and to make the following observations:

American vessels convey goods to the isthmus of Panama, or go there to receive them, and no tonnage duty is there required of those vessels. In Colombia, no duty is required, nor are goods brought to the isthmus by American vessels, or goods which, passing over it, are re-exported, likewise in American vessels, subjected to any detention. These same goods, which are, in reality, imported into Colombia, which pass over fifty miles of its territory, and which are re-exported from it, are considered, as regards the payment of duties in the United States, as if they were only directly transported from one place to another of its territory, and without leaving the same.

Regulations exist in order that goods which, before crossing the isthmus, have paid the proper duty in the United States, may not be obliged, on returning to said United States, again to pay the same duty. Perfect equality and reciprocity as to commerce and navigation having been established between the two countries by the treaty of 1846, it is evident that Colombian vessels have the right to carry on this trade with the same advantages with which it is carried on by American vessels, and across the isthmus of Panama. This trade cannot be included in the only exception which exists to that perfect equality and reciprocity, since it embraces territory of the one country and territory of the other country, and since the benefits which are derived from it proceed as much from the extent and productions of the one, as from the exceptional situation and liberality of the other.

But as the present regulations relative to said trade refer only to goods conveyed in American vessels, in order that this reciprocity may be effective, it is necessary to extend said regulations to goods conveyed in Colombian vessels.

Otherwise, the latter will be unable to carry on said trade, because they will have to take the goods when they have already paid the proper duty in the United States, and will again be obliged to pay the same duty on importing them definitively into the same United States.

Not to extend such regulations to Colombian vessels would be, therefore, to deprive them of the right of engaging in a traffic identical with that which is now carried on between the two countries in American vessels, since without the extension of the regulations there is in reality a double duty imposed on goods conveyed from one point to another of the United States, crossing the isthmus of Panama in vessels which are not American.

This is a discriminating duty, and therefore a duty which, according to the treaty, cannot be imposed upon the cargoes of Colombian vessels. If there had previously been Colombian vessels engaged in this trade, there is not the least doubt that, in accordance with the treaty, the regulations would have been extended to them. But as the effort is now being made to establish them in this trade, on account of the present urgent necessity of reviving commerce between the two countries, a request in accordance therewith is presented. The honorable Secretary perfectly understands the importance of multiplying the means of communication between the two Americas for the best service of their interest and their common aspirations, and he is also aware of the advantages of a new line of steamers, sustained by Americans of skill and experience, like the one which it is proposed to establish between Colombia and the United States, and which may very well be extended to the Antilles, to Central America, and to other nations of South America.

With this reply to your note of the 8th instant, I have the honor, &c., S. PEREZ.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your note of the 13th instant, on the subject of discriminating duties on Colombian vessels from Atlantic ports of that republic to similar ports of the United States. In reply I have the honor to state that, as the subject is obviously an important one, deliberation will be necessary properly to decide in regard to it. The opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury will be required for that purpose. This will be requested, without any delay which can be avoided.

Mr. Perez to Mr. Fish.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA,
Washington, April 15, 1871. (Received April 15.)

MR. SECRETARY: On the last occasions when I had the honor to confer with you, you were pleased to state to me that the treaty ratified in 1848, between Colombia and the United States, may now be considered as no longer in force, according to the third part of its thirty-fifth article, because Colombia declared its intention of reforming it, as is seen in the notes which its minister sent to the Department of State on the 23d of January and 23d of April, 1867. You will permit me to repeat, in the present communication, my remarks in relation to this declaration, to the end that this point may be definitely settled, and that I may then inform my government thereof.

In the first of said notes the Colombian minister gave notice that he was authorized to negotiate the renewal of the treaty before the expiration of the term fixed in its thirty-fifth article. It appears, therefore, that the main object was to renew the treaty, and to renew it in time. The modifications referred to only tended, in case of their acceptance, to perfect the relations between the two countries, the strengthening of which the Colombian minister said was the desire which actuated him.

Such documents cannot, therefore, be considered as a notification of the cessation of the treaty, and, in fact, they have hitherto not been so considered. In both countries the treaty has been and still is considered as being in force, and as the basis of their mutual friendly relations. It would be possible, if necessary, to find antecedents of both governments in which the treaty has been, since those notes, recognized as being in force. The government of Colombia has recognized it as being in force by founding on it all the proceedings which it has initiated with the Department of State, and the American Government has recognized it as being in force under your esteemed signature, and that at a very recent date.

In your communication of the 8th of February last, after stating the contents of the notes of the Colombian minister, in 1867, and quoting the provisions of the treaty relative to its remaining in force, and to the manner in which it was to terminate, you said as follows:

It does not appear that any reply was made to the last-mentioned note, or that the discussion proposed by General Salgar took place. There is also nothing on record or on file here to show that the notes of General Salgar, referred to, were regarded and received as such a termination of the treaty as that for which the instrument itself provides. Nor does it appear that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States has been informed that the treaty is at an end, and, therefore, that the privileges previously enjoyed under it by Colombia, in the ports of the United States, must be discontinued.

In your note of the 16th of the same month you deigned to notify me that, in the matter which I had submitted to your consideration as connected with the treaty and depending upon it, the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury had been asked.

Up to those dates, therefore, the American Government entertained no doubts of the treaty's being in force.

Subsequently, in relation to this matter, my reply has only been sent to your note of February 8, in which reply I stated that the instructions of my government are, to proceed in accordance with the treaty; and when my government may think proper to introduce any modifications in said treaty, it will propose them in due form. I therefore think that the American Government will have no objections to recognizing and declaring, now, that the treaty of 1848, between Colombia and the United States is, and has not ceased to be, in force according to its own provisions.

Meanwhile I avail myself of the occasion, &c.,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 27, 1871.

SIR: Your note of the 15th ultimo, relative to the treaty between the United States and New Granada of the 12th of December, 1846, was duly received. Almost ever since, however, my attention has been so engrossed by other important business that it has been impracticable to secure the leisure necessary to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion upon that subject. Now, however, I am happy to be able to announce that although literally and technically, pursuant to the clause of the 35th article of that instrument upon the subject, this government might hold that the application made by General Salgar for a revision of the treaty in anticipation of a lapse of the time fixed for its termination might be held to have brought about that result, the intentions of the parties at the time may, as you observe, be allowed to govern the question. General Salgar in his notice did not say that if his proposition should not be accepted the Colombian government would regard the treaty as at an end, and Mr. Seward does not appear to have received that proposition as a formal notice of termination. His silence upon the subject may fairly be construed as indicative of an opinion on his part that, so far as the interests of the United States were concerned, no change in the treaty was required, and the form of the application of Colombia may also be construed to imply that, although she might prefer the changes proposed in that application, she did not regard them as indispensable to its continuance. Under these circumstances it may be said to comport with the interests of both parties to look upon the treaty as still in full force, but as subject to revision or termination in the form and upon the terms stipulated.

The instrument, upon the whole, is believed to have been mutually advantageous. It is true that the flag of Colombia may not have as often been seen in the ports of the United States as that of the latter in the ports of Colombia. This, however, should not be imputed to any defect in the treaty, but rather to the different circumstances of the two countries. A principal object of New Granada in entering into the treaty is understood to have been to maintain her sovereignty over the Isthmus of Panama against any attack from abroad. That object has been fully accomplished. No such attack has taken place, though this Department has reason to believe that one has upon several occasions been threatened, but has been averted by warning from this Government as to its obligation under the treaty. This Government has every disposition to carry the treaty into full effect. If, in the opinion of Colombia, the Executive of the United States should have insisted upon a construction of the clause prohibiting the coasting trade of one country to the vessels of the other, incompatible with that equality in matters of trade and navigation which other articles of the instrument promise, the merchants of Colombia may on proper application to the courts of the United States have their rights under the treaty vindicated.

We heartily desire any practicable and advantageous increase in the commercial intercourse between the two countries, and are by no means so selfish as to prefer that this should be carried on exclusively under the flag of the United States, especially if we should have promised that Colombia may share therein on equal terms. Recent events, which it is needless to particularize, may have made the transit of the Isthmus of Panama less indispensable to communication between the Territories of the United States on the Atlantic and those on the Pacific than when the treaty was concluded. Similar events, however, may, it is hoped, soon impart increased activity to other traffic between the United States and Colombia to the mutual advantage of both countries.

MR. SECRETARY: As I have had the honor to state to you, my government desires commercial relations between our countries to be increased as far as is suitable to both, and to this end I have solicited the co-operation of the United States, in accordance with the treaty, with regard to which I have not received a definitive reply.

Meanwhile, in obedience to special instructions, I beg you to be pleased to inform me whether the American Government is disposed to aid with a subsidy a line of steam-vessels which it is proposed to establish between the ports of Colombia and those of the United States. As the government of Colombia is disposed to grant a subsidy to said steamers, and to grant them such other advantages as are in its power, the establishment of the line, if aid can be obtained from the United States, will be much more probable.

If your reply is favorable, I shall take much pleasure in communicating it, together with the circumstances and conditions which shall be required by the United States. The two governments may thus act in harmony, and with the promptness which the matter demands.

SIR: This Department has received a note from the minister for foreign affairs of Costa Rica, requesting a detail of two scientific engineers for the purpose of surveying a route for a wagon-road or railway between San José and the Atlantic.

In the note a promise is made that the salaries and expenses of the engineers shall be promptly paid. Inclosed is the reply of the Department under a flying seal which you may close after reading the answer, which you will then deliver to Mr. Montufar.

You will notice that although his request has been acceded to, the names of the engineers have not yet been determined upon and nothing is said about their compensation and expenses.

Before they set out, however, it may be prudent that some definite provision, for the latter at least, should be made in advance by that government.

You will consequently lose no time in endeavoring to make a satisfactory arrangement upon this point, of the result of which you will apprise the Department.

Immediately on receipt of your dispatch, I obtained an interview with the secretary of foreign relations, and delivered to him your note above mentioned. I at the same time said to him that it was desirable that some definite understanding should be had as to the compensation of the engineers and their expenses.

Mr. Montufar said that he would advise with the president the following day, and inform me without delay what arrangement the government proposed to make to carry out my suggestion.

A fortnight having elapsed since my interview with the secretary, and not having heard from him on the subject, I take it for granted that the government has concluded to postpone, at least for the present, the proposed survey of a route for a road to the Atlantic.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your No. 54, of the 15th ultimo.

I have communicated with the secretary of foreign relations on the subject therein referred to. A copy of my note and a copy and translation of his reply thereto, I inclose herewith, the former marked inclosure No. 1, the latter No. 2.

You will observe, on reading the note of Mr. Montufar to me, that he copies a note written by him, on the 25th ultimo, to the consul general for Costa Rica in New York and Philadelphia, in which they are directed to make an arrangement with the claimants to pay off at once their entire claim, if they will make a discount for the amount advanced. It is probable that some such arrangement as this has by this time been made. As to that, however, the Department is of course fully advised.

I desire to add a word in reference to the conference spoken of by Mr. Montufar, with me on this subject. Some four months ago, during a conference I had with Mr. Montufar on some other matters, he casually remarked that his government was considering the propriety of paying off those claims, if a proper discount was made for the advanced payments.

I said to him that if his government concluded to do so he had better write me a note to that effect, and state the terms upon which the advanced payments would be made, that I might lay the proposition before my Government. This he promised to do in a day or so. Since then I have not heard from him on the subject; I had supposed the idea had been abandoned.

I make this explanation in justice to myself, lest the Department might infer from his note that a definite proposition had been made to me by him, to settle these claims, and that I had failed to advise my Government of the fact.

"I have learnt, with concern, that delay is attributed to this republic in the payment of the American debt. This debt has gone on being religiously paid." "On 10th October, four hundred pounds were sent to Mr. G. Theisen." "Little was then wanting to the total payment, and in a conference which I had in this bureau with the Hon. Mr. Blair, minister resident of the United States, in Costa Rica, I represented that it would be convenient to pay the whole sum at once, the corresponding discount on prepayment being allowed."

"No result whatever followed in consequence of this point in that conference."

"The treasury of Costa Rica has always a cash surplus, and there is no creditor, who, on presenting his document, is not paid immediately."

"If you are pleased to make with the creditors referred to, the arrangement which I proposed to Mr. Blair, and to pay them off under corresponding discount, such operation will be very satisfactory to the government, and you will be reimbursed on your draft at sight."

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San José, Costa Rica, September 13, 1871. (Received Oct. 3.)

SIR: I have the honor to inform the Department that on the 20th of July last the government of Costa Rica executed a contract with Mr. Henry Meiggs, an American citizen whose fame as the great railroad contractor of South America is not confined to the limits of Chili and Peru, the scenes of his many stupendous operations to construct a railroad from the port of Limon, on the Atlantic Ocean, to the city of Alajuela, about fifty miles distant from the Pacific, via Castago, San José and Heredia; the estimated distance being one hundred and twenty miles.

Mr. Meiggs undertakes to construct this road within three years, to furnish it with all necessary rolling-stock, erect suitable buildings for ticket-offices, &c., or, in other words, to construct and equip it complete for the sum of one million six hundred thousand pounds sterling, one hundred and seventy thousand pounds of which was paid on signing the contract; the residue is to be paid in monthly installments as the work progresses.

The government has already obtained a loan in London for five hundred thousand pounds sterling, out of which the first payment to Mr. Meiggs was made. I learn it is the purpose of the government to put on the London market another loan at an early day for a sufficient amount to cover the entire cost of the construction of the road.

That this long-talked-of and much-desired enterprise will now be carried successfully through there can be no reasonable doubt. The name of Henry Meiggs to the contract is a sufficient guarantee that the road will be constructed against, if not before, the time fixed in the contract. So far as the trade of Costa Rica is desirable is the construction of this road of interest to the people of the United States. At present almost the entire coffee crop of the country, which seldom falls below two hundred thousand quintals per annum, is hauled in ox-carts to the port of Punta Arenas, on the Pacific, at a cost of one dollar and twenty-five cents per quintal; from thence it is shipped in sailing-vessels "around the Horn," and finds a market in London and Hamburg, after a four months' voyage. Construct this road and the trade of Costa Rica will take a new departure. It will not cost more than forty or fifty cents at most to take a quintal of coffee to the port of Limon, on the Atlantic, and then in nine days by steamer it is in New York, at much less expense than by sailing-vessels to the markets above mentioned, or to New York by way of Aspinwall, over the Panama Railroad.

I will advise the Department from time to time of the progress made in the construction of the road.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND THE LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES AT QUITO.

No. 74.

Mr. Fish to Mr. Wing.

No. 22.]

• DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 15, 1870.

SIR: Your dispatch (No. 39) of the 7th of November last, inquiring "what rules will the United States apply to Ecuadorians who have taken out American naturalization papers, and to their children," has been received. In reply, I have to state that the same rules must be applied to them as to other foreigners in their native country, who may have been naturalized in the United States. It is not conceived that you are bound to recognize any Ecuadorian as a citizen of the United States merely because he may have been so recognized by one of your predecessors. That recognition may have been occasioned by a misapprehension of the claims of the Ecuadorian to that character, or by other causes. It is certain that in every case of a native of Ecuador claiming of you protection as a naturalized citizen of the United States, it would be your right and duty to require him to exhibit to you his certificate of naturalization. If you should have no reasonable doubt of its authenticity, then there will be occasion to apply to the case the rules set forth in the second and third paragraphs of the circular of this Department of the 14th of October, 1869. An eminent predecessor of mine in this Department, in an instruction to a minister of the United States in a foreign country, expressed the opinion that "it can admit of no doubt that the naturalization laws of the United States contemplate the residence in the country of naturalized citizens, unless they shall go abroad in the public service, or for temporary purposes." In addition, the test prescribed in a recent instruction to another minister of the United States abroad may be applied. These are, in substance, when, and in what assessment district the returns required by the internal revenue laws of the United States have been made by the naturalized citizen. Where, and to whom, have the taxes been paid? The instruction referred to also says that "the omission to have made the returns, or to have paid any tax, would necessarily cast grave suspicions upon the claim of the party applying for the protection of a government from whose support he has withheld the contributions required of all the citizens whether resident at home or abroad, and if such omission has been long continued it will, as a general rule, justify the refusal of a recognition of the claim to protection." No Ecuadorian who may have merely declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States will have any right to your interference in his behalf. The law, justly regarding a change in his allegiance by a foreigner as an act of grave importance, wisely provides that there shall be two steps in the process. By the first, the purpose of change is announced. Between this and actual naturalization the lapse of a considerable interval is required, in order that the final step may be taken with due deliberation. Persons who may have declared their intention to become citizens often change their minds, and fail to carry that intention into effect. They have seen occasion to avail themselves of the locus penitentiae which the law allows. It is certain that no children of a foreigner, born before he was naturalized, can claim to be citizens of the United States merely because of his naturalization. It is hoped that these instructions will be sufficiently comprehensive to guide you in all cases which may arise in Ecuador. If, however, you should desire special instructions in any particular case, they shall be forwarded whenever that wish shall be made known to the Department.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Quito, Ecuador, January 5, 1871. (Received February 13.)

SIR: For some time past I have been aware of the recent discovery of a remedy which was declared to be a specific for the cure of some of the most terrible diseases which scourge humanity. Not being willing, however, to excite hopes liable to the chance of disappointment, I have refrained from bringing it to the attention of the Department hitherto.

Recent experiments which have been explained to me by credible parties, in addition to information concerning certain experiments set on foot by myself, both in Europe and the United States, have convinced me that there is, to say the least of it, enough of reality in the curative properties of the remedy to render it incumbent upon me to lay the matter before the Department; believing, as I do, that if the Department will at once give publicity to it many valuable lives may be saved, and relief afforded in most painful and distressing cases of affliction.

The remedy in question is the wood of a tree called the "cundurango," existing chiefly in the southernmost province of Ecuador, (Loja,) and its peculiar virtues were discovered, it is said, by one of those trivial incidents which evince oftentimes how humble are the means used by Providence to make known the mysteries of nature and the wonders of science.

The ignorant wife of a common Indian laborer who had for some time suffered most fearfully from an internal cancer concluded finally to administer eternal relief to him by the simple process of mixing poison in his food. The woman, it would seem, acted in perfect good faith and honesty of purpose and with no sinister or malevolent design. She wished really to save her husband from his agony; and, feeling that his cure was absolutely impossible, she determined to administer a decoction of the leaves of the cundurango, which are said to be an active poison. Not finding the leaves at hand, she administered a decoction of the wood itself.

To her surprise the man at once began to rally, and as her first attempt had failed she still continued to dose him with the lotion from day to day in increasing quantities.

As a result the man entirely recovered, and the matter becoming public, further tests have established the powers of the wood as a remedial agency.

Only last night I was informed from the most eminent sources in the land that some of the cures effected by it were truly miraculous.

I give the report in regard to the manner in which these properties were manifested as common rumor has it.

Its efficacy in cancerous and venereal diseases has been already approved, and I judge by analogy that it would likewise prove beneficial in scrofulous and ulcerous affections of the different types.

Certainly it commends itself to the experiments of the learned practitioners of the United States; and if its curative qualities go no further than to conquer that fearful malady, the cancer, so long deemed hopelessly incurable, and so fraught with anguish of mind and agony of body, and certain death hitherto, then truly will it have accomplished a most noble end.

The condition of the inland roads and the difficulty of transportation to the coast will for a time interfere with its exportation in large quantities, but the energy of President Morena will eventually open it up to the commerce of the world and the relief of the afflicted.

In this connection I may add that this month the President of Ecuador will forward to the State Department at Washington one boalter of the cundurango for experiment and distribution.

I have thanked him for his courtesy and consideration, and I have every hope that under the enlightened supervision of the Department medical science may achieve therewith one of its most valuable victories.

Appended, as accompaniment A, I transmit the simple recipe, setting forth the manner in which the article is as yet applied to use. Experiment and experience may soon be enabled to adopt a more powerful and skillful method of application.

If the Department sees fit to make this matter immediately public, it will afford me genuine pleasure to aid both experimental science and suffering humanity by any means that my location and information on the subject may render practicable.

I have, &c.,

E. RUMSEY WING.

A.

Method of using the "cundurango"

A decoction of the cundurango is made out of a small piece of the wood beaten out flat, and half an ounce of which is boiled in three teacupfuls of water.

Of this decoction one teacupful must be taken in the morning and another at night. If the patient has ulcers, they should be kept very clean by the use of aromatic wine or simple ointment, according to the degree of inflammation.

The decoction is only to be used for fifteen days consecutively. An interval of fifteen days must then elapse, when the remedy may again be resumed for the same length of time.

Great attention must be given in order to keep the digestive organs in the best possible condition.

With regard to any other counsel, the general aspect of the patient must serve as guide.

In this country (Ecuador) the cundurango has proven itself to be a powerful restorative, and must eventually work a complete revolution in the treatment of cancerous, venereal, and ulcerous diseases.

SIR: Referring to my dispatch No. 54, the contents of which I regard as very important, I desire to correct a slight error into which I had fallen, as I learn from conversations with President Morena and Minister Leon.

The accidental manner of the discovery of the remarkable qualities of the cundurango, as detailed in the dispatch referred to, is entirely correct, with the single exception that the fruit, and not the leaves, are poisonous, and it was in the absence of the fruit that the woman used the wood, supposing, as she did, that it must contain the same destructive properties.

From information given me by the distinguished gentlemen mentioned above, I am more than ever convinced of the great value of the discovery and the necessity for immediate scientific experiments with the wood.

No. 64.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Quito, Ecuador, January 30, 1871. (Received March 16.)

SIR: By communication of date January 18, the United States consul at Guayaquil called my attention to "the regulations of the fire department at Guayaquil," and remitted me a copy of the same.

Upon examination, I found that there were special clauses applying to foreign residents incompatible, in my judgment, with the general practice of nations, and not in accordance with the specific terms of the treaty existing between Ecuador and the United States.

Under these clauses it was within the election of foreign residents either to connect themselves with the fire department, thereby subjecting themselves to all its pains and penalties, or else to be mulcted in the sum of twenty-four dollars per year. In the first instance the fire department was based upon a semi-military organization, and absolute military service was the principal punishment of any violation of its rules. Hence a voluntary exposure to such a result could not consistently be expected of foreigners.

On the other hand, the "exemption tax," as it was called, was only applicable to foreigners, and besides being exceedingly onerous in comparison with the native military "exemption tax," (which, being paid, practically exempted a native both from military and fire service,) it really assumed the shape of a penalty affixed to the non-performance of personal service upon the part of foreign residents.

Under the terms of section 7 of the treaty of 1839 between the United States and Ecuador, American citizens resident here "shall be subject to such general taxes and contributions as are or may be established by law." "This certainly was no general tax;" within the purview of that article.

Under the spirit, if not the exact letter, of article 8 of same treaty, the citizens of the United States are entitled to compensation for the performance of any public or private service.

In this case, in place of receiving any compensation, they became liable to an absolute penalty in case such service was not fulfilled.

Moreover, is there not some doubt as to whether it would not be a special municipal tax instead of a "general tax," in the treaty acceptance of the sense, even if it were levied upon foreigner and citizen alike? Personally, I regard the consideration rendered in the assurance given to property owners by the existence of a trained fire brigade, certainly sufficient to induce just and liberal foreign residents to contribute a proper support to it, when levied in the shape of a tax bearing equally upon citizen and alien, and not in the discriminative, exceptional, and somewhat offensive manner in which this Guayaquilian penal tax was provided to be enforced.

The day upon which I received Consul Weile's communication I was waited upon by several of my diplomatic colleagues here, who were much exercised over the same matter.

Finally, they concluded to wait upon President Moreno in a body, and request the abrogation of the objectionable features of the regulations.

This I did not regard as judicious or proper for a number of reasons, but principally because such a step would have been a very formal one, and have assumed a shape not altogether palatable to a sensitive government.

Moreover, no specific case had as yet arisen under the regulation calling for official interposition, and even if there had I could not see that a step so formal was requisite, at least until the usual forms of individual and separate representation and appeal to the minister of state had been unsuccessfully tried.

I am happy to be able to say that, although alone in my position at first, I eventually led all of my colleagues to agree with me and to relinquish a project which, in my opinion, no matter how effective it might have been in accomplishing the desired result, would naturally have left unpleasant impressions upon the memory of the President and his ministers.

It is pleasant to be able to add that subsequent events have vindicated my judgment as to the advantage of the usual and prescribed mode of address, and the promptitude with which the error would be rectified by this government.

On the following day I called privately upon Minister Leon, and, assuring him of my great desire to avoid any possibility that might give rise to a question of issue, I laid the matter of these "fire regulations" before him as one calculated to lead to trouble at some future time unless it was immediately looked into. Minister Leon was inclined to differ with me in my judgment of the legality of the clauses in question, but decided to bring them at once to the attention of the President.

On the subsequent morning he asked me to meet him, which I did at the hour appointed. His first proposition was to reduce the amount of the "penalty tax" on foreigners to the same figure as the "military exemption tax imposed on natives." To this I demurred, on the ground that the payment of even one dollar would invalidate the principle for which I contended; and, moreover, that there was no objection urged to the amount of the tax if it were legally and properly levied.

Thereupon, after a further consultation with the President, Minister Leon agreed to order that the clauses relative to foreigners shall not be enforced, and that at the meeting of the national congress in August next, a system shall be devised entirely acceptable to all foreigners.

I may add, that the authorities evidently fully and thankfully appreciated my motives in directing attention to the matter, which might otherwise have had a sequel in claims for damages and disagreeable difficulties. I likewise am pleasantly impressed with the desire hereby evinced by the government to follow out its late declaration regarding foreigners (contained in my dispatch No. 59) and to render its regulations legally acceptable to them.

The result of my negotiations has given general satisfaction to the diplomatic corps here, all of whom will wait on Minister Leon and make known their appreciation of the courtesy and promptitude evinced in the premises.

In this connection, I am anxious to ascertain whether, in the view of the Department, a foreign government can demand even the personal civil service of an American citizen there resident in any capacity whatever.

Trusting that my action will receive the approval of the Department, I have, &c.,

E. RUMSEY WING.

P. S.—It may not be foreign to the subject to add that I have advised our countrymen resident at Guayaquil to show a practical proof of their appreciation of the action of the national authorities, and that their objection to the "fire-tax" was based upon no factious or niggarly reason, but simply because of the manner in which the tax was sought to be levied, by a voluntary contribution for the benefit of the "fire department." Such action would not only be in accordance with strict justice, but will, I am confident, add much to the prestige which our countrymen happily enjoy in Ecuador. As a material example, I took occasion to head the list with a very decent contribution, and the movement will, I am convinced, prove a success in every sense of the term.

SIR: Referring to my recent dispatch, No. 64, I desire to lay before the Department certain documents which conclusively establish the military nature of the "fire organization" described in that dispatch, and fully bear me out in my action in the premises.

I forward copies (A and B) of the recent correspondence between the commanding general at Guayaquil and the secretary of war, in this city, (C and D,) being translations of the same.

It will be perceived that the said "the department" is absolutely under the control and supervision of the commanding general, and that in the answer to his communication the minister of war explicitly states that said department is a bona fide military organization, and its members liable, in certain contingencies, to be coerced into the regular army of Ecuador.

REPUBLIC OF ECUADOR,
GENERAL COMMANDANT'S OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT,
Guayaquil, January 28, 1871.

SIR: The penalty that the "fire regulations" impose upon the firemen for failure of service is only limited to fines and arrests. As this corps is reputed to be in the condition of national guard, destined solely for fire service, by the necessity that there is for them in the city, I inquired of the supreme government, through your respectable intervention, if the punishment of fines and arrests is to be extended only until four consecutive absences, of which the national guard law speaks, or must the same punishment be continued indefinitely, even when they exceed that number. If such is the case, the national guard will be in a worse condition than the fire corps.

REPUBLIC OF ECUADOR, STATE OFFICE, IN THE DISPATCH OF WAR AND MARINE,
Quito, February 4, 1871.

Your appreciated communication No. 41, under date of 28th of the past month, was duly received at this department, explaining that the "fire regulations" only impose upon the firemen for failure of service the penalty of fines and arrests, and this corps, being like the national guard, and destined only for fire service by the necessity there is for them in that city, you inquire if the punishment of fines and arrests should be extended only to the four consecutive failures of which the law of national guard speaks, or has the same penalty to be continued indefinitely the same, even when they exceeded that number, urging at the same time that the active national guard, in time, will be in worse condition than the fire corps. His excellency the President of the republic has resolved that, considering the fire corps as a national guard, the Ecuadorians enlisted in it, who fail in attendance to exercise four consecutive times without a verified just cause, shall be enlisted in the army, it being understood that these failures are when in case of fire they do not repair to lend immediate aid.

UNITED STATES LEGATION,

Quito, Ecuador, August 26, 1871. (Received October 2.)

SIR: Observing that a very general interest has been evinced throughout the United States concerning the "cundurango," I have deemed it proper to forward a few facts relative thereto, in addition to the statements contained in my dispatches 54 and 61. I have been literally overwhelmed with letters on the subject from all parts of America and several of the countries of Europe, containing all sorts of inquiries, requests, suggestions, propositions, and demands.

I have endeavored to answer such of these letters as in my judgment deserved it, courteously and explicitly, but unfortunately my medical attainments have not permitted me to reply to all the intricate interrogatives upon the subject of pharmacy, surgery, botany, chemistry, materia medica, therapeutics, &c., &c., that have been propounded to me.

Nor, on the other hand, have I felt financially justified in sending "just a small box of the wood" to the numerous applicants who have made such requests.

From matters that have come to my knowledge I trust that there will soon be an ample supply of the drug in the United States.

Despite the adverse opinions that I hear have been rendered against it in some medical quarters in North America, I am still not disposed to surrender my faith in its remarkable curative properties.

Of course, I am not prepared to enter upon any theoretical or scientific analysis thereof, but I cannot shut my eyes to the practical results of its use not only in this country, but in eminent and responsible quarters in the States, two at least of which must be within the knowledge of the Department.

From the facts originally reported to me, I first felt it a matter of official duty and of real humanity to call attention to the "cundurango."

I believe that it is always best to risk the chance of failure, rather than to neglect to test an experiment which may result in infinite good.

I am now awaiting the effect in three notable cases, which will be ultimately reported to the Department.

The American consul at Guayaquil will soon be able to forward to the Department various facts in regard to the wood, as he is now giving it close and careful attention and investigation.

A medical gentleman from Washington, who came to Ecuador with high credentials, also reports very favorably concerning it. President Moreno conceived it of sufficient importance to advert to it in his message of August 10 to the Ecuadorian Congress.

If I may place credence in the opinions of medical men here, who have had the advantages of fine training and much practice, it has also proven very beneficial as well in neuralgic and rheumatic affections as in those set forth in my original communication.

It must be a powerful nervous stimulant, and in due season may become of use in the treatment of the spinal, cerebral, and paralytic diseases to which our people seem so singularly liable.

It certainly has eradicated in more than one instance what was called cancer. Further exploration has evinced the existence of several classes of the plant or vine, generally known as "cundurango" among the natives, which vary very much in their effects upon disease.

Hence the correspondence hereto appended (copy and translation 1 and 2) may be essential to purchasers and consumers.

Doubtless there is danger that ignorant or reckless speculators may foist an inferior or worthless article upon the markets; and that the genuine and efficacious species may not everywhere receive a thorough and proper trial. Hence much care should be exercised until the best quality has become well known to drug dealers and the medical fraternity.

The publication of an accurate chemical analysis and physical and fibrous description of the wood sent to the Department some months ago would be valuable in this connection.

No export tax has as yet been imposed upon the article by this government, but I learn that such an one will soon be levied.

Several parties are already engaging largely in its exportation, and, judging from appearances, there will soon be many more in the same traffic.

Since this drug was first called to my attention, several local remedies used here in the treatment of certain other obstinate diseases have been mentioned to me.

I prefer, however, not to enter into any statement relative to them until I am more fully convinced of their utility.

By order of his excellency the President of the republic, and for the consequent ends, I have the honor to remit the original of the dispatch sent to the commanding general of the district by the inspector of the military hospital.

S. DARGUEA.

To the SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

REPUBLIC OF ECUADOR, MILITARY HOSPITAL,
Guayaquil, August 12, 1871.

SIR: In the month of May, of last year, I received a few pounds of "cundurango" through the authorities, to experiment with. For fourteen months I have been assaying the properties of this new vegetable, not only in the establishment under my charge, but also in private practice, and I am happy to communicate to your excellency that this plant will do in a very short time better service than the quinine that is extracted from the woods of the favored province of Loja.

I commenced my experiments with various internal complaints, obtaining admirable results in several cases of rheumatism, neuralgia, and otalgia, as also in a case of eczema, after having employed all the other means advised without any good results.

In the cancer, before and after the ulceration, the "cundurango" is the most powerful agent, and can be qualified as the specific for this horrible scourge.

On one of the most notable persons of the country, whom I treated during the fearful duration of a cancer of the tongue that had destroyed more than half of this organ, prescribing this plant under different forms and combinations, I have obtained a splendid triumph, "the complete disappearance of the cancer," together with the conjunction of diathesis and swellings that made a deformity of all the base of the jaw-bone and neck, but had the misfortune to lose the patient in consequence of a sudden relapse of disease that had troubled him for several years: an access of asthma which gave rise to asphyxia that carried him off in an hour during the convalescence of a fever that he had contracted some time after having made "a radical cure of the cancer."

At present I have under my charge a lady very well known, who had a cancer upon the left breast which has been reproduced in two points of the enormous scar, and having been recommended by various persons to undergo a new operation, preferred my care, and I obtained what will be in fifteen days a complete cure.

Two cases more I have to refer to, in which if I have not obtained entire success, it has been on account of special circumstances of the patients, but in them I have proved the sure and efficacious action of the "cundurango." Later I will give a more detailed report of the action of the "cundurango" and of its results, with documentary proof that will convince all, even to the most incredulous. I regret, however, that my field of observation is so reduced.

It is just that the sons of the country profit by these providential discoveries, and that in honor of the nation to take part, without expecting everything from abroad.

Now the exportation commences with furore, hotly disputing the speculations, causing fraud to intervene, as they export portions of the vine, sell it at high prices without its being the true cundurango.

I hope that soon the genius of our chief magistrate will take the necessary measures to avoid these consecutive evils to the advantage of the country, and so that this splendid discovery will not suffer the attacks to which the scandalous falsifications of several speculators will give rise.

By order of his excellency the president of the republic, the original of the dispatch of the inspector of the military hospitals of that place was remitted to the war office, for the consequent ends to which it may give rise relative to the effect produced by the vegetable "cundurango," accompanying your esteemed communication No. 12.

No. 143.] UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Quito, Ecuador, September 14, 1871. (Received October 14.)

SIR: In addition to the inclosure in my dispatch 137, I herewith forward two articles taken from a Guayaquil paper concerning the cundurango.

No. 1 is a letter by a pharmacist of Guayaquil, of whose personal skill and aptitude I know nothing, but I inclose it nevertheless.

No. 2 is a communication from the surgeon-in-chief of the government hospital, who is reputed to be a gentleman of decided ability in his profession.

I particularly commend this last inclosure to perusal, as it contains matter relative to the exportation and sale of the cundurango, which had occurred to me as possible heretofore, (see my dispatch No. 137,) and which should render purchasers, if these statements are not erroneous, exceedingly careful in securing the article.

Having called attention to it because I believed it to be my duty to do so, I have no interest in the matter beyond that of seeing it patiently and fully tested. But that I do most earnestly wish to see, and such a test cannot, of course, be made, unless the real cundurango is obtained.

I learn that it exists in large quantities throughout Southern Ecuador, and there is no reason why purchasers need permit themselves to be deceived by a spurious article, if any such should at any time unfortunately reach the American markets.

I do not forward a translation of Dr. Chiriboga's communication, as, owing to the medical terms used, and the variety of tests suggested therein, I would prefer that the translator of the Department should make it for the sake of absolute certainty and accuracy.

Allow me to suggest that it be made public at once.

WASHINGTON, March 14, 1871.

MR. MINISTER: I have received from my government, in order to offer it to you, a vegetable called "cundurango," which is produced in the province of Loja, Ecuador, and to which great medicinal qualities are attributed, as you will see by the annexed extracts, copied from No. 425 of the official journal of Ecuador.

In case your excellency may think proper to accept this little offering, I take the liberty of inclosing the bill of lading of the box which contains it, to the end that you may be pleased, if you see fit, to return it to me with the necessary order for the custom-house at New York, and to take such other measures as you may think proper.

I have been specially directed by my government to communicate the result of the analysis and experiments which may be made. I will therefore thank your excellency to deign to afford me, as far as possible, the means of obeying this order.

In the hope that your excellency will be pleased to give to this matter the attention which is demanded, not only by humanity and science, but by the mercantile interests of Ecuador and the United States of America, I have the honor to reiterate to your excellency the assurance of my very high and distinguished consideration, and to subscribe myself your excellency's very obedient servant,

A. FLORES.

[Translation.]

Extracts from the reports of Doctor Casares, Eguiguren, &c., &c.

QUITO, April 28, 1870.

I am happy to reply to your excellency's esteemed communication of the 21st instant, in which you inform me that the supreme government has resolved to send fifty pounds of the "cundurango," in order that this vegetable may be analyzed by scientific societies of Paris and London, and I am ordered to make a circumstantial report of the therapeutic effects which I have obtained by its application in some diseases.

About the month of September last, I commenced to administer this remedy to Bernabé M——, who was suffering from a cancer, and the favorable result of this treatment, which was obtained in a few days, I thought proper to bring to the notice of the supreme government; but as the small quantity which I had obtained gave out, I was unable to continue the use of it.

The domestic, Santos A——, of Mrs. Mercedes Larrea, has suffered a long time from a cancerous ulcer on the thigh of her right leg; she has always been attended by respectable physicians without any favorable result; she is now well, only two or three lines being wanted where it has healed up.

Juan Bautista G—— was suffering from a cancer in the lower lip; I removed it apparently entirely; four months afterward, however, the cancer reappeared, and, instead of resorting to a new operation, I applied the "cundurango," which caused it to disappear completely.

Mr. D——, now priest of the parish of N——, has long been a sufferer from a cancer above and below his left eye; he has been for a short time under the influence of this medicament, and the edges of ulcer have become depressed, the suppuration has changed its aspect, and the cancerous humor does not exist.

The above are the cases of cancer which I have observed and subjected to the action of cundurango, and I have the satisfaction of being able to state that all the aforesaid patients are known in the country, and may be examined by any person desiring to do so.

Passing to another case, I will state that it is a year since José A—— entered this hospital, suffering from intermittent fever and scrofulous ulcers in the breast. Constant and diligent care did nothing toward restoring his health, until I resolved to administer the cundurango to him together with arsenic, and his present condition is very encouraging.

I will remark that the cancers which I treated with the cundurango were already in the form of fungus hamatodes, and none in the state of rawness.

The plan adopted in its use is as follows: First regulate the digestion and the biliary secretions in the best manner possible; surround the patient with pure air; take great care to secure cleanliness; give food which is easily digested; give him a cup of the decoction of cundurango in the morning, and another at night, until you observe that its action has caused debility; in which case I have replaced it sometimes by diuretics, together with tonics, and sometimes by diaphoretics and mild infusions of quinine. In cases of cancer I have made local applications of poultices, formed with the prepared shell of an egg and with water, alternating with some ointments promotive of suppuration, as was required by the state of the ulcer, after chloride lotions, slightly astringent.

In syphilis, the internal method is entirely similar to the one above-mentioned; and locally I have only used sometimes aromatic wine, and at other times simple cerate, according to the state of irritation of the part.

In case the result of the analysis of the cundurango be favorable, I think it proper for me to mention the fact that I have been assured that the kernel contained in the fruit of this vegetable kills dogs, just as strychnine does.

Reminding the patient of this terrible circumstance, (the difficulty of saving his life,) I obliged him to take the remedy, which I alone possessed in Quito. After a few days, it produced so surprising an effect that Dr. Casares was astonished at the rapidity with which the cure took place, until the edges became cicatrized, and also the bone, as if it had been a wound in soft parts and in a healthy subject. I caused Dr. Casares to be informed of the remedy which had cured him, and this professor appreciated a medicament of such high importance; and afterward learning that a servant of my brother, Manuel Eguiguren, had cured himself some months before of an ulcerated cancer which resisted the known appliances of art, he began to give it to a patient who was, by chance, in the hospital, and who would have died two or three days afterward if this remedy had not been so seasonably given him, as I was assured by Dr. Casares when he took me to see him.

I think it a matter of the utmost importance to point out the manner of administering this remedy, in order to facilitate observations in the places to which it is sent. The stem, (or trunk,) cut into small pieces, is boiled in water until the latter becomes of the color of Sherry wine or strong tea; of this decoction from four to five ounces are given, properly sweetened, once or twice a day, according to the urgency of the case; but it is to be remarked that it cannot be given many days in succession, as it gives rise, in some persons, to nervous phenomena of considerable importance, which disappear on the simple suspension of the remedy.

It has been used in this manner hitherto, as it is still an empirical remedy, and because it is thus used in Loja, where it was discovered.—El Nacional, (official journal of Ecuador,) No. 425.

No. 84.

Mr. Washburne to Mr. Fish.

No. 321.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, November 18, 1870. (Received December 12.)

SIR: I was in hopes before this time to have made to you a full and complete report of my action as connected with the protection of the subjects of the North German Confederation, Saxony, Hesse Grand Ducal, and Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, in France, with which I had been charged, during the existing war between those powers and France. But as my duties still continue, I cannot now make a final report, which would have to embrace my account with the Prussian government.

In the account for the contingent expenses of this legation, for the quarter ending on the 30th of September last, I have not included any of the items of expenditure pertaining to that business, for the reason that such expenses run into the present quarter, and that it would be better to have them all put into one account. I hope, at the end of the present quarter, to be able to include everything. I will state, however, for your general information, that such expenses so far scarcely reach a thousand dollars. These expenses already paid, and to be paid, independent of certain amounts, to which I will hereafter allude, will not reach more than fifteen hundred dollars. All the items will be given in detail, and I hope the amount will not be regarded as extravagant, when the extent of the service is considered. I was glad to know that the Department coincided with Mr. Bancroft and myself in the opinion that all these expenses should be paid by the United States. It would certainly have been unworthy of a great Government like ours to permit itself to be paid for hospitalities extended to the subjects of other nations, for whom our protection had been sought.

When, in accordance with your directions in July last, I took upon myself the protection of the German subjects in France, I had but a faint idea of what the undertaking was going to involve, for I had hardly supposed it possible that I would be charged with the care and with the superintendence of the departure of more than thirty thousand people, expelled from their homes upon so short a notice. From the time of the breaking out of the war, and as soon as it became known that the Germans had been placed under my protection, you can well imagine, considering so large a population, what would take place in that exciting period. The legation began to be crowded from day to day by persons desiring protection, advice, information, and assistance. Many were thrown into prison, charged with being "Prussian spies," many were under arrest as dangerous persons, and the lives and property of others were threatened in their neighborhood. My good offices were sought for and cheerfully rendered in all such cases, and I believe I never failed in accomplishing all I undertook in such emergencies. The first extraordinary order of the French government, prohibiting all such Germans from leaving France who might by possibility owe military service, and about which I had so long a correspondence with the Duke of de Grammont, created great alarm among a large number of them who were extremely anxious to get away. The practical operation of that order prevented any German from leaving French territory without special authority to that end, first had and obtained from the minister of the interior, and all applications for such authority had to be made through me; and after all this was changed, and the expulsion of the Germans decreed, it was required that I should visé the passports, or give a laissez-passer to every German leaving France.

I have spoken of thirty thousand as the number of Germans placed under my protection, and who were expelled from France. I make this estimate from the number of visas and passports which I gave out, and that number, as recorded in the legation, amounts to eight thousand nine hundred. In the rush and hurry of business there was no record made in many cases, and it is entirely safe to say that the whole number of visas and passports going through the legation amounted to not less than nine thousand; the larger number of these passports included the husband, wife, and children. It is a moderate estimate to say that there was an average of three and one-third persons to each passport. That would make the thirty thousand souls.

We issued our own cards, which by an arrangement with the railroad company entitled the holder to a railroad ticket from Paris, through Belgium, to the German frontier, for nine thousand three hundred and thirty-two persons, and gave pecuniary assistance to a smaller number. This involved an examination of each person as to his or her want of the necessary means to get out of the country, for our instructions were not to make advances to people who had the means to pay their own expenses. It also involved the necessity of sending two or three persons from the legation to the railroad depot every night, in order to see that the holders of the cards received their railroad tickets, and were properly sent off.

It was about the middle of August when the expulsion of the Germans from Paris began to be enforced, and when I received the credit of fifty thousand thalers from the Prussian government to assist them. From that time till the middle of September, when the northern railroad was cut, we were literally overwhelmed with these poor people, seeking the visas of their passports and the means of getting away. For days, and I may even say for weeks, the street was completely blocked up by them awaiting their turns to be attended to. On one day more than five hundred had gathered in front of the legation before 7 o'clock in the morning; and in some days there were not less than from twenty-five hundred to three thousand persons in waiting. It took a police force of six men to keep the crowd back and keep the door open, so that the people could enter in their turn. With such an amount of work so suddenly thrown upon the legation, I found it almost impossible to get the necessary help to assist me, though authorized by the Department to employ the requisite force. I was fortunate in being able to procure the services of the secretaries of the Saxon and Darmstadt legations, and of the clerk of the Prussian consul general in Paris, all of whom proved invaluable, from their knowledge of both the French and German languages. I had also the benefit of the services rendered voluntarily, by your son, by Mr. Eustis, and by several other friends. Some days there were no less than eleven persons engaged at the legation, but with all the force we had it was impossible to keep up with the demands upon us.

And in further connection with this matter, I now beg leave to make a suggestion. I have stated what will be the probable amount of the expense actually paid out and to be paid out of the contingent fund. In my judgment that amount should be added to. The extra duties which have been devolved upon the two secretaries and the messenger of the legation have been arduous and responsible, and certainly such as have never been contemplated. They have been discharged with a zeal and fidelity worthy of all praise. I think, therefore, in justice that they are entitled to some extra compensation, and I hope it may be granted to them. I say this the more readily as I disclaim anything of the kind for myself. My salary is ample, and I would receive no extra compensation on any pretext whatever. Not so with the persons to whom I refer, for their salaries are low. When the extra and exceptional services they have rendered, and the vastly increased prices of living consequent upon the siege, are considered, I do not think a claim for extra compensation on their behalf can be considered as unreasonable. I shall hope, therefore, that Congress will consent that you shall allow Wickham Hoffman, the first secretary of legation, $600; Frank Moore, the second secretary of legation, $500; Antoine Schmit, the messenger of the legation, $300; and Antoine Roger, the concierge, (who had to guard the door fourteen hours a day for two months,) $100. These amounts added to the expenses already incurred and to be incurred in this behalf will not reach more than $3,000, which is not half the amount I have taken for passports since the war broke out, and which the state of war obliged our countrymen to have.

I will add a few observations in regard to the present condition of the Germans in Paris at the present time who are under my protection. Considering the large German population here prior to the breaking out of the war, it is not a matter of wonder that a good many were found here when all communication was finally cut off. When it became evident that the city was to be besieged, I redoubled my exertions to get these unfortunate people away. Deprived of all work, their little resources exhausted, the intense hostility of the French people toward them, bad as their condition was, it was to become infinitely worse in case of a siege. Many were in prison for vagabondage, and many were detained charged with being spies, dangerous persons, &c. Upon my application to Mr. Gambetta, he concerted with the Count de Kératry, the prefect of police, for their discharge en masse, and for sending them, at the expense of the French government, to the Belgian frontier. But quite a number yet remained. Many were too old and infirm to leave. Some were sick, some were children left behind who had been put out to service; but perhaps the larger number were female domestics, most of whom had been persuaded by their employers to remain, under pledges of protection. But as the siege progressed and the price of living augmented, many of these persons, discharged by their employers or denounced to the authorities, were turned into the street, only to be arrested and imprisoned. In one of the prisons, which I visited some three or four weeks since, I found seventy-four persons of this class. I arranged for the release of most of them, and have had them comfortably cared for, and with the promise of the French authorities that they shall be protected. There are others yet in prison, and I hope soon to complete an arrangement for the release of all who do not stand charged with some criminal offense. Not a day passes now that there is not some new application for assistance. I have now one hundred and fifty that I am providing for. From the Prussian fund still remaining in my hands, I think I have sufficient to take care of them till the end of the siege.

In conclusion I beg to say that the duties imposed upon me in virtue of the functions with which I have been charged in this regard have been laborious, responsible, and delicate, and it is perhaps too much to expect that I have discharged them in a manner entirely satisfactory to both the belligerent powers and to my own Government. My position has sometimes been very embarrassing. None of the writers on public law, so far as I have been able to find, have laid down any rule to be observed, or refer in any manner as to what is proper to be done by the representative of a neutral power charged with the protection of the subjects of one belligerent power remaining in the country of the enemy during a state of war. I have had, therefore, to grope somewhat in the dark and do the best I could. I have not shrunk from any duty or any labor. During two months I was occupied every day from twelve to eighteen hours. When the pressure for the departure of the Germans was the greatest, I went myself to the railroad depot at night, after working all day at my legation, and remained till midnight to superintend their departure and to seek out and provide for cases of extreme destitution that had not been made known. You will permit me to say that whatever services I have been able to render have been rendered most willingly and most cheerfully, for with the means so generously placed at my disposal by the Prussian government I have had the satisfaction of relieving a vast amount of suffering and misery. It is pleasant to know that no complaint of any German has ever reached this legation of a failure on my part to do everything that could properly be done by me in respect of protection, advice, or assistance. On the other hand, all classes have signified to me their thankfulness and gratitude for what I have been able to do for them.

I will only add further, in closing this dispatch, that during the period about which I have been writing the business properly belonging to our legation was increased to an extent never before known, and I have endeavored faithfully and satisfactorily to discharge all the duties I owed to my Government, and to our countrymen abroad, who have in any manner sought my good offices, protection, or advice.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, November 21, 1870. (Received December 12.)

SIR: The official dispatches from you, which came in the bag that arrived this morning, are acknowledged in another communication. By the bag that will leave to-morrow morning I cannot send you anything of much interest pertaining to military or political events. In fact, there have been no military movements for several weeks, and since the miserable affair at the Hotel de Ville of the 31st ultimo nothing of particular interest has taken place in the city. Everything is quiet, even to dullness. The reported advantage gained by the French at Orleans has done much to encourage the Parisians, and there is a disposition now manifested to hold out to the last. Yet, should there be news of disaster, all may change, and the siege may be raised before this reaches you. We remain in ignorance for a long time as to what is going on in the outside world. No newspapers get into Paris except those that come to this legation. Our last London dates are of the 10th instant. The latest New York papers are of the 29th ultimo.

The people are suffering their privations with a good deal of fortitude. If they could be made to believe that France could be saved they would suffer to the last extremity. As it is, I can see no prospect of the siege being raised in any way. I shall not be as much surprised in seeing the city now hold out till January as I have been already in seeing it hold out so long as it has. There has been no real pinch up to within a short time, but now things are getting to be a little hard. Fresh meat, including horse and mule, is very nearly exhausted. Poultry, butter, cheese, &c., are about out of the question. A turkey sells for sixteen dollars, a chicken for five dollars. Butter sells for four dollars a pound. There is yet quite a quantity of vegetables, but at high prices. The price of bread is fixed by law, and it has not raised much. Wine is abundant and cheap. The time is not far distant when the great mass of the people of Paris must live on bread and wine almost entirely.

No members of the diplomatic corps have left for several weeks, and I believe that those who are now here propose to remain to the end. No foreigners at all are now leaving Paris.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, December 3, 1870. (Received December 30.)

SIR:—I have received both from Mr. Motley and Mr. Bancroft a copy of your telegraphic dispatch of the 15th ultimo, in which you state that the President instructs you to say that whenever General Read and myself, or either of us, desire to leave Paris, we are at liberty to do so, going to "Tours and communicating with the proper officials there." I have communicated the message to General Read, and we are both very grateful to the President and yourself for your kindness in this regard.

The dispatch leaves it discretionary with me to remain in Paris, or go out and repair to Tours. It is, therefore, for me to determine what, in my judgment, the interests of my Government requires, and what my duty is in the premises. If I were shut off from all communication with you it might be important that I should leave here in order to hold intercourse with you. Such is not, however, the case at present, for I am now enabled to send dispatches to you and receive them from you once each week, which is as much as I would be likely to do were I at Tours. That being the case, the question for me to decide is, where can I be of the most service, in Paris or in Tours? I have no doubt on that subject, and great as my desire is to get out of this besieged city and to join my family, from whom I have been so long separated, I consider it my duty to remain here, at least for the present. Paris is the seat of government of the country to which I am accredited, and is the seat of the present provisional government of the national defense, which has been duly recognized by the United States. And here is also the minister of foreign affairs, with whom I have to be more or less in communication. There are yet remaining in Paris some one hundred and fifty Americans, many of whom have been unable for various reasons to get away, and some of whom have remained here because I have remained.

The French government having heretofore given them every opportunity for leaving, which they did not take advantage of, now declines, for military reasons, to permit the people of any nationality to leave Paris. Therefore, my countrymen now here all look to me for a certain protection, and they would much regret to see me go away, leaving them behind. There is also a large amount of American property in Paris under my protection, and circumstances may arise when it might become important for me to be here.

Independently of what belongs to our own legation, I am more or less occupied every day with the affairs of the North German Confederation. I am now furnishing three hundred and forty-one poor Germans pecuniary assistance, and the number is increasing every day. It is impossible for the messenger of the legation to attend to them all, and I have had to employ a man specially for that purpose.

Under all the circumstances, therefore, I think my determination to remain at my post will meet with the approval of the President and yourself.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, December 5, 1870. (Received December 30.)

SIR: For military reasons the authorities were obliged to decline giving me a "parliamentaire" for last Tuesday morning, the 29th ultimo, to take my dispatches to the Prussian outposts. I now hope to have one for to-morrow morning; and if so, my dispatches will only be one week behind. I received a bag from London last Tuesday afternoon, with London papers up to the 18th, and New York papers up to the 3d ultimo. I was disappointed, however, in getting nothing whatever from the Department.

Military operations around the walls of Paris began in earnest on Tuesday, the 29th ultimo. There was heavy fighting on Wednesday, the 30th ultimo, and on Friday the 2d of December. Though I could hear these battles raging distinctly from the windows of the legation, I am unable to give you any particular information in regard to them. As a movement to break through the Prussian lines, it was a failure; as a fight, the French claim an advantage. As the newspapers are forbidden to say anything, and as the official journal does only vouchsafe to us a few solemn official lines, we are utterly in the dark as to the real results of the fighting which actually took place. No statement has yet appeared of the losses of the French in killed, wounded, prisoners, missing, &c. I do not know that I can do anything more, or anything better, than to send you all that has appeared in the official journal in regard to military matters during the last week. The results of the battles, such as they are, and the news received from the provinces during the last week, have done much to inspire the people of Paris. The morale of both people and soldiers has greatly improved. I do not think the prospects for a successful sortie are very good, and unless it is understood that the armies which are supposed to exist in the provinces have been substantially annihilated, the siege may yet last for a long time. At present the authority of the government is supreme, and all Paris is confronting its sufferings with fortitude and courage. But no one can tell how soon this may all change. The weather is now excessively cold for the season, and the privations of the people are very great.

Another sortie is talked of very soon, and if it takes place as is expected, you will hear of it long before this dispatch will reach you.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, December 6, 1870.

SIR: I inclose herewith a copy of a dispatch of the 5th ultimo, and of its accompaniments, addressed to this Department by Mr. John de la Montagnie, United States consul at Boulogne, in relation to the expense incurred by him in subsisting French soldiers, by order of the authorities at that place.

You are instructed to bring this matter to the notice of the French government, and to request that proper steps may be taken for the repayment to the consul of the amount thus expended by him.

You will observe from the letter of the mayor of Boulogne to the consul, that he disclaims the right of subjecting the consul of the United States to the tax for the support of soldiers. The act really seems to have been that of billeting soldiers upon the consul, and, as such, is in direct contravention of the 2d article of the convention of 23d February, 1853.

The mayor, in his letter of 15th October, assimilates the position of the American consul to that of certain other consuls, who by custom of previous years have not been subjected to this imposition.

The action of the mayor relieves the present case from any serious aspects, and this Government is indisposed at the present time to dwell upon irregularities in this regard which may have occurred.

But you will call the attention of the minister for foreign affairs to the violation of the immunities of the consul, which have thus been invaded, and say that the exemption admitted to attach to the consul at Boulogne, exists in the opinion of this Government, by virtue of the convention of 1853, and cannot be accepted by reason of any special custom with regard to the consuls of other nations.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, December 12, 1870. (Received January 4, 1871.)

SIR: I have the honor to send you herewith a translation from the "Journal Officiel" of December 8 of the government report of the battle of Villiers, and of the military movements immediately connected therewith.

I am, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURNE.

[From the Official Journal, December 8, 1870.]

The late sorties made by the army of Paris on the 29th and 30th of November, and on the 1st, 2d, and 3d of December, led to engagements on most of the points of the enemy's lines of investment.

On the evening of the 28th of November operations commenced.

To the east the plateau of Avron was occupied by the seamen of Admiral Taissat at 8 o'clock, supported by the division of Hugues; a powerful artillery of pieces of long range was placed in battery on this plateau, threatening, at a great distance, the positions of the enemy, and the roads used by their convoys at Gagny, Chelles, and Gournay.

To the west, in the peninsula of Gennevilliers, earth-works were begun under the direction of General de Liniers; the batteries were armed anew, gabions were placed, and rifle-pits dug in the islands of Marante, of Bezons, and on the railroad to Rouen. The next day General de Beaufort ended the operations on the west side, making a reconnaissance toward Buzenval and the heights of Malmaison, resting on his right, which joined the troops of General de Liniers in front of Bezons.

The 29th at daybreak the troops of the third army, under General Vinoy, made a sortie on Thiais, l'Hay, and Choisy-le-Roi, and the fire of the forts was directed on several points remarked as selected for the concentration of the enemy's troops.

Movements executed during the two preceding days had filled the plain of Aubervilliers with numerous forces, and united the three corps of the second army under the orders of General Ducrot, on the banks of the Marne.

The 30th November, at the break of day, bridges, prepared out of sight of the enemy, were thrown across the Marne near Nogent and Joinville, and the two first corps of the second army, led by Generals Blanchard and Renault, rapidly effected the passage of the river with all their artillery. The success of this movement had been secured by a sustained fire of artillery from the batteries of position placed on the right bank of the Marne at Nogent, at Perreux, at Joinville, and in the peninsula of Saint-Maur.

At nine o'clock, these two corps d'armée attacked the village of Champigny, the wood of the Plant, and the nearest portions of the plateau of Villiers. At eleven o'clock, all these positions were carried and intrenchments were already commenced by the troops of the second line, when the enemy made a vigorous forward movement, supported by fresh batteries of artillery. At this moment our losses were serious; in front of Champigny, the Prussian pieces in position at Chennevières and at Conilly forced back the column of the first corps, while a heavy infantry force, descending from the intrenchments of Villiers, charged the troops of General Renault. At this point it was owing to the vigorous efforts of the artillery under the command of Generals Frébault and Boissonet that the advance of the enemy was checked.

Thanks to the changes made in our batteries, the Prussian artillery was partly dismounted, and our men, led to the charge by General Ducrot, took final possession of the crests.

During these operations, the third corps, under the orders of General d'Exéa, advanced in the valley of the Marne as far as Neuilly-au-Marne and Ville-Evrard. Bridges were thrown across the Petit-Bry, and Bry-au-Marne was attacked and occupied by Bellemare's division. Its advance, delayed by the passage of the river, was continued beyond the village as far as the slopes of the plateau of Villiers, and the efforts of its columns aided in taking possession of the crests effected by the second corps in front of Villiers. In the evening our bivouac fires extended over all the hill-sides of the left bank of the Marne, while those of our reserve blazed on the slopes of Nogent and Foutenay.

The same day, November 3, the division of Susbille, supported by a strong reserve of the "bataillons de marche" of the National Guard, advanced in front of Crétail and carried the positions of Mesley and Montmesley, which they occupied till evening. This diversion on the right of the operations of the second army was supported by fresh sorties, made on the left bank of the Seine, towards Choisy-le-Roi and Thiais, by the troops of General Vinoy.

To the north, Admiral La Roncière, supported by the artillery of his forts, occupied Drancy and the farm of Groslay in the plain of Aubervilliers; strong bodies of the enemy were thus drawn to the banks of the rivulet, the Morée, behind the bridge of Iblon. Toward two o'clock, the admiral passed through Saint Denis, and, at the head of fresh troops, directed an attack on Epinay, which our soldiers, supported by the batteries of the peninsula of Gennévilliers, successfully occupied.

The 1st December, there were only some skirmishes of sharp-shooters at the beginning of the day in front of the positions of the second army, the fire of the plateau of Avron continued to disturb the movements of the enemy at Chelles and at Gournay, as he concentrated his troops in large numbers, (at night particularly,) with a view to bring up fresh forces behind the positions of Cœnilly and of Villiers.

December 2, before day, the fresh forces, thus concentrated, attacked the positions of the army of General Ducrot; on the whole line the attack was made suddenly and unexpectedly upon the advanced posts of the three corps d'armée, from Champigny as far as Bry-au-Marne.

The effort of the enemy failed; supported by a considerable force of artillery, our troops, notwithstanding the losses they sustained, opposed the most solid resistance. The fight was long and terrible. Our batteries checked the advance of the Prussian columns on the plateau; at 11 o'clock, the efforts of the enemy were entirely defeated. At 4 o'clock the fire ceased, and we remained masters of the field of battle. The 3rd of December, without the enemy being able to harass our retreat, aided by the 100,000 of the second army recrossed the Marne, leaving the Prussian army to carry it its dead.

Our losses on these several days were—

Officers:		Killed.	Wounded.
Second army.....		61	34
Third army.....		8	2
Army corps of Saint Denis.....		3	1
		72	37
Soldiers:		Killed.	Wounded.

Résumé.
Officers.....		72	4
Soldiers.....		936	6,021
		1,008	6,025

* It is to be observed that in this number of wounded soldiers are included at least one-third slightly wounded not sent to hospital.

A detailed report addressed to the minister of war will be published hereafter. The losses of the enemy were very considerable; they are in proportion to the efforts he made to carry our positions. Overwhelmed by a formidable artillery fire on all points where he showed himself, our projectiles reached his most distant reserves. In addition, officers, prisoners of war, have stated that several regiments were annihilated by the fire of our infantry in front of Champigny.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, December 12, 1870. (Received January 4, 1871.)

SIR: Since my dispatch of one week ago to-day, No. 328, no events of any importance have transpired in Paris. The extreme cold weather of the last week has prevented any military operations about the city. It is said that preparations are going on for another sortie, and if the weather be favorable, that it is likely to take place the last of this week. In the Paris journals that I have the honor to transmit you herewith, you will find the correspondence between Moltke and Trochu, which will explain itself. The news of the defeat of the army of the Loire, and the retaking of Orleans, as communicated by Moltke, seems to have made but a very little impression on the people of Paris. General Trochu has been fully sustained in his refusal to send an officer to verify the facts, as suggested by Moltke. The government of the national defense and the people of Paris seem to have abandoned all idea of an armistice, or of a peace, and to have made up their minds to resist to the last extremity, and until every resource is exhausted. There are various opinions as to the length of time the city can hold out. Yesterday there was a great bread panic, but it is allayed to-day by the announcement in the official journal that there is bread enough, and that there is no necessity of any rationing for the present. I think the prevailing opinion is that it is possible for the city to hold out until the 1st of February, but that must be guess-work to a very considerable extent. A good many people think that the provisions will give out suddenly, to be followed by an irresistible clamor for a surrender. We shall see. You may infer from what I have written that I do not expect to see the siege raised by a successful sortie. Everything seems almost as bad as can be for the people of Paris as well as France. The suffering in the city is much aggravated by the extreme and unseasonable cold weather. The mortality last week was frightful, over two thousand. A great many old people and a great many children perish from the want of suitable food and from the cold.

SIR: There have been no military movements in or about Paris for the last week, and since my dispatch No. 335; but, on the other hand, the greatest quiet has prevailed. It now seems to be well understood that another sortie is to be attempted day after to-morrow, the result of which you will learn long before this reaches you. There is not the least indication of yielding on the part of the people of Paris, and I see no reason to change the opinion I have hitherto expressed, that the city may hold out until the 1st of February. The surrender appears inevitable, and now only a question of weeks. Peace is regarded by every one as entirely out of the question. The Prussians will hold military possession of Paris, and of course there will not be even the shadow of a French government here. I shall hope to have full instructions as to the course that I shall pursue in the emergencies which are so certain to arise. The telegraph will inform you of the events as they occur, and perhaps it may be necessary for you to advise me by a telegraphic dispatch sent to our minister in London. Unless something unforeseen occurs, I propose to remain here till the end. The last dispatch-bag that I have received left London on the 25th ultimo. We have no news from outside since that date, except the merest scraps brought by pigeons, and a few items from certain German newspapers that have by some means found their way into Paris. In one of these journals is a very brief abstract of the President's message, from which I am glad to learn that the President testifies that I have acquitted my mission, as the protector of the Germans residing in France, in a "satisfactory manner." I am afraid it will be a long time before I get the message in full, the reports of the heads of the Departments, and the first day's proceedings in Congress. The date of your last dispatch is the 10th ultimo, and the last New York dates are of the 12th ultimo.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, December 26, 1870. (Received January 21, 1871.)

SIR: The "sortie" about which I had the honor to write you on the 19th instant was attempted on Wednesday last, and proved entirely unsuccessful. The loss of men in battle was not very serious, but the army suffered immensely from the intense cold weather of the last five days. I should judge that there will be no further military operations attempted for some time. The failure of the sortie and the great suffering of the army have produced a very bad impression in Paris, and the clubs have become extremely violent. I shall not be surprised to see very serious disturbances take place. Hunger and cold will do their work. The wood-riots have already commenced.

I received, on Tuesday afternoon last, after I had sent off my dispatches, two dispatch-bags from London, one of them leaving there on the 2d, and the other on the 10th instant. The bag leaving on the 10th brought only your official dispatches, and no newspapers. I therefore have London papers only to the 2d instant, and New York papers only to the 19th instant. I am, therefore, without intelligence from the outside for a very long time, except some little items taken from German papers found on prisoners captured in the fight of Wednesday. The most important item of news is the reported denunciation by Prussia of the Luxemburg treaty of 1867, and it has created quite a sensation here. Not enough is known about the matter, however, to enable any judgment to be formed as to the figure it is to cut in the present situation.

The mortality of the city continues to be very great. The number of deaths last week was 2,728, which is the precise number of the week previous. The suffering here has increased very much during the last week, and if it keeps on, and there are no military successes to keep up the spirits of the people, I am not so clear that my prediction in my dispatch No. 337, in regard to the time the city might hold out, will be verified.

The number of poor Germans who are coming to me for aid is increasing very fast. They now number fifteen hundred and forty-seven, and are increasing daily. Our legation is thronged with them every day, from morning till night. I have been compelled to employ two additional men to help me. If this thing is to continue, the charge upon the contingent fund will be larger than I have heretofore estimated.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, January 2, 1871. (Received February 4.)

SIR: Nothing of very great importance has taken place during the last week. The French have been driven off the plateau of Avron by the Prussian artillery, and three of the French forts have been severely bombarded. No very great damage has as yet been done to the forts, but I think the French military authorities have been greatly surprised at the long range and heavy metal of the Prussian guns. Many people are now predicting that the Prussians will have possession of one of the French forts before long. Such possession would enable them to bombard the city. As for myself, I have no information to enable me to form any opinion on the subject. The excessive and exceptional cold weather continues, and the suffering in the city is steadily increasing. The fuel famine is likely to become as severe as the food famine. The deaths in the city for the last week, independent of the number dying in the military hospitals, amounted to the frightful number of 3,280. Great discontent is now prevailing among the poorer classes, but yet there seems to be a disposition to hold out to the last extremity. Opinions differ as to the length of time the city can stand, but I think the prevailing idea is that it will not surrender till the 1st of February. There are some who even think it will hold out longer than that. It is all speculation, at best. I have myself been so often at fault on this subject that I will not hazard a further opinion.

The number of indigent Germans who are now calling on me for assistance is increasing fearfully. It amounts to-day to seventeen hundred and fifty-three. They are suffering severely, in spite of all I can do for them. They have become so numerous that the legation could not accommodate them, and so I have hired a small room on the ground-floor immediately under our legation, where I have their wants administered to. I am doing everything in my power to alleviate the suffer ings of these unfortunate people, but if the siege continue much longer, I really do not know what is to become of them, for the time is fast approaching when money cannot procure what is necessary to sustain human life. My position in this regard is becoming embarrassing to the last degree.

The government has no intelligence whatever from the outside world since the 14th ultimo. I have London papers of the 23d, and New York papers of the 10th ultimo, but I cannot make their contents known. The dispatches I have received from you will be acknowledged in another communication.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, January 9, 1871. (Received February 4, 1871.)

SIR: I have the honor to state, referring to my dispatch No. 343, that I wrote to Mr. Jules Favre upon the subject of the claim made by Mr. de Montagnie, United States consul at Boulogne, for reimbursement for the expenses incurred by him in the entertainment of French soldiers in that city. Mr. Favre admits promptly the justice of the claim, and states that as soon as possible he will examine the question of the amount of the reimbursement to be paid.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, January 9, 1871. (Received February 4.)

SIR: The bombardment which the Prussians commenced on the "forts of the east," as they are called, that is to say, upon the forts of Romy, Nogent, Noisy, Remanville, Aubervilliers, and the East, as well as upon the Plateau of Avron, on the 27th ultimo, has continued to the present time, save some brief intervals. It has been violent and long continued, and with the exception of driving the French from the Plateau of Avron, very little damage has been done, if we are to give credence to the official reports. On Wednesday night, the 4th instant, a bombardment "en règle" was commenced against the "forts of the south"—that is, against Issy, Vaunes, Montrouge, Bicêtre, and Ivry. This bombardment has continued up to this time with great fury, though with some short interruptions. It is, therefore, now nearly five days since the Prussian batteries opened their fire on these forts. The cannonading of some of them, particularly Vannes, has been terrific, but the military reports, while acknowledging the extreme violence of the fire, do not confess to any material damage. Whatever injury may have in reality been inflicted upon any of the forts, one thing is certain, no fort has yet been taken or even silenced, but on the other hand some of them have replied with great spirit, and, it is claimed, with considerable effect. But what is more serious is the bombardment of the city. A great many shells have fallen in the city, on the left bank of the river, particularly in the neighborhood of the Luxemburg and the Pantheon. Some twenty or thirty people have been killed and wounded, including women and children, but no very great damage has been done to the buildings. This bombardment of the city must be considered as an incident to the bombardment of the forts, (the shells passing the forts and coming into the city,) for, I take it, no premeditated bombardment of the place would be commenced until due notice thereof had been given, and a surrender demanded. And I assume further that the diplomatic corps remaining near the government in Paris would be duly notified in case a regular bombardment were to be commenced. And yet it may be said that, in point of fact, the city is under bombardment to-day. The matter is assuming a grave aspect, and Mr. Kern, the doyen of the diplomatic corps, will call the body together to-morrow to determine what action may be necessary in the premises.

There is no doubt that the people of Paris are greatly surprised to find that the enemy can send his shells into the very heart of their city, for it has always been contended that such a thing was impossible without the possession of one of the French forts. I am quite confident that my residence can now be reached by the Prussian batteries, but it is doubtful whether the legation is within the reach of any battery yet opened. If the shells begin to fall in a too close proximity to us, we shall have to remove to some safer place, provided it can be found.

There has been a good deal of discontent in the city during the past week. It has not, however, taken the direction of a cry for peace, or surrender, but resulting in a sharp arraignment of the government for a failure to perform its whole duty. On Thursday last an address to the people of Paris, signed by a large number of persons, calling themselves "Delegates of the twenty arrondissements of Paris," was placarded in a large red handbill. I send the address herewith as cut from one of the journals. Although a great many people said the arraignment was partially just, yet but few were willing to accept the remedy proposed by replacing the government of the national defense by the revolutionary commune. They evidently adopted Mr. Lincoln's theory, that it was no time to swap horses while swimming a river. The consequence was that the handbills were torn down as fast as they were put up, even in the most turbulent parts of the city. General Trochu made this trouble the occasion of issuing another proclamation, a copy of which I also inclose, and in which he declares "that the governor of Paris will not capitulate."

The bombardment has been the great subject of interest and conversation during the past week. As I am writing I learn that it was excessively violent the latter part of last night, and that it has continued equally violent during to-day. Many people are reported to have been killed. There is apparently not the alarm felt that one might suppose amid all this danger. So far the people have accepted it with a calm and nonchalance almost amounting to recklessness. When it shall become more terrible, however, a panic might seize the population and great trouble may come.

The cold has moderated and the suffering of the people in that respect has been very sensibly ameliorated. The number of deaths for the last week is three thousand six hundred and eighty, which is quite an increase over the number of the week before. The number of Germans seeking aid from me is still increasing. Nobody could have supposed there were so many left here when the gates of the city were shut. Cases of terrible suffering are brought to my notice every day. I heard a few days ago of a family in the last stage of destitution, absolutely perishing of cold and hunger. I immediately sent my messenger with a small quantity of wood, some wine, chocolate, sugar, confiture, &c. He found a family of seven persons, consisting of the father and mother and five children, cooped up in a little seven-by-nine attic, entirely without fire and nothing to eat but dry bread. They had already burned their last bedstead as a last resource. On a little pallet of straw on the floor was a little boy, seven years old, so weakened by hunger as to be unable to sit up, or scarcely to lift his head. I directed some money to be given them, and I now hope to get them through, unless this siege shall last forever. The number that we are now assisting is two thousand and thirty-nine, an increase of two hundred and eighty-six in one week.

I have not yet received my dispatch-bag which should have left London on the 30th ultimo. My latest London dates are of the 23d, and I have dates of the 10th ultimo.

I have, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURNE.

P. S.—Monday evening, January 9.—Since writing the above I have heard of an accident that befel a young American last night, Charles M. Swazor, of Louisville, Kentucky, was struck by a shell in his own room, No 7, Rue Cassimir de la Vigne, Hotel St. Sulpice. The shell burst in the room and a fragment struck his foot and injuring it to such an extent that amputation was found necessary. He was taken to the American ambulance and the operation was performed by Doctors Swinburne and Johnston this afternoon. The patient is doing well.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, January 16, 1871. (Received February 17.)

SIR: It was but a short time after I closed my dispatch No. 346, bearing date the 9th instant, before the bombardment took such proportions as to leave no doubt as to its true character. Bombs, in increasing numbers, continued to fall in the interior of the city, not only upon private buildings, but upon hospitals, schools, churches, ambulances, prisons, &c., and men, women, and children, in considerable numbers, were killed and wounded. Not only has one of our own countrymen been grievously wounded, but the property of Americans has been destroyed, and a further destruction is imminent. In view of the gravity of the situation the diplomatic corps (and the consuls acting in the absence of their respective legations) was convened to consider what was proper for them to do, looking to the protection of the lives and property of their countrymen now in Paris. After several meetings it was agreed to address a communication to Count de Bismarck on the subject, a translation of which I have the honor to inclose you herewith.

To-day is the twelfth day since the bombardment of the city and the forts of the south commenced, and as it is generally supposed with all the power of the besieging forces. The Official Journal of yesterday has an official report of the results of the bombardment of the city from the 5th to the 13th instant. This report shows one hundred and eighty-nine victims, fifty-one killed and one hundred and thirty-eight wounded. Of the fifty-one killed there were eighteen children, twelve women, and twenty-one men. Of the one hundred and thirty-eight wounded there were twenty-one children, forty-five women, and seventy-two men. The public edifices that have been struck are the Val de Grâce, the Sorbonne, the Bibliothèque Sainte Geneviève, the churches of Sainte Etienne du Mont, Sainte Geneviève, Sainte Sulpice, and Vaugirard; the prison de la Santé, the barrack of Vieux Colombier, the hospital de la Pitié, the prison St. Pélagie, l'Ecole Polytechnique, l'Ecole Pratique de Médecine, the convent of the Sacré Cœur, the hospital of Salpêtrière, the normal school, the Institution for the Blind, the hospital of the Infant Jesus, Maternité, and de Loureine, and the ambulances of St. Perine and of the Dames Augustines. The number of private buildings struck is about three hundred and fifty, but many of them but little damaged. No building of any great value has yet been burned. No bombs have yet fallen on the right bank of the Seine. When the length of time is considered that the bombardment has been going on, and the enormous quantity of material that has been expended, the small number of killed and wounded and the small amount of actual damage is surprising. The bombardment so far has not had the effect of hastening the surrender of the city. On the other hand it has apparently made the people more firm and determined. In the presence of a common danger the feeling of hostility to the government, which was so openly manifested some two weeks ago, has been greatly modified. So much in regard to the bombardment of the city. It is hard to tell what the real state of facts is in regard to the damage done to the forts. The forts of the east have been bombarded for twenty, and the forts of the south for twelve, days, and one thing is certain that no fort has been either taken or silenced. How long any or all of these forts can hold out I have no means of judging. With the possession of one of these forts the besiegers would have a much larger part of the city immediately under their guns, and a bombardment from such a point can only be contemplated with horror. And with the spirit now manifested by the people of Paris I do not believe the city would then yield. In the event of the city not yielding to bombardment or assault, the question always is, how long before it will have to yield to famine? I am reluctant to speak further on that subject, as my predictions have so often failed of verification. I saw yesterday the gentleman who has charge of rationing the people of the arrondissement in which I live, and he assured me they had enough provisions for two months yet. While the amount of flour was running short, he said they had a great quantity of grain, and the only trouble was in making it into flour fast enough to supply the demand for bread. I met last night a gentleman in a high official position, and whose duty it has been to gather all the information possible in regard to the amount of food in the city, and he says there is enough to last easily till the first of March. The bread will be of a poor quality, but there will be enough of it. Of rice there is a very large quantity, and an unlimited supply of wine, coffee, sugar, &c. Another man, claiming to be equally well informed, will positively assure you that there are not more than provisions enough to last more than two weeks longer at the outside. You will see, therefore, how widely the opinions of people differ on this most vital question.

We are again having cold weather, and the suffering of the people has been intensified. The number of deaths is steadily increasing, and last week it amounted to thirty-nine hundred and eighty.

My dispatch-bag which left London on the 30th ultimo, only reached me on Tuesday night the 10th instant. It brought me home-papers to the 17th, and London papers to the 30th ultimo. The bag which undoubtedly left London on the 6th instant has not yet arrived.

I have, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURNE.

Sir: For some days past a large number of shells, coming from positions occupied by the besieging troops, have entered the interior of Paris.

Women, children, and sick persons have been struck. Among the victims there are many who belong to neutral states. The lives and property of persons of all nationalities, residing in Paris, are in constant danger.

These things have happened without the undersigned (the greater part of whom have no other mission for the present at Paris, except to watch over the security and interests of their countrymen) having been enabled by a preliminary notice to warn against the dangers which menaced them, those of their countrymen who had been hitherto prevented by "force majeure," and especially by the impediments placed in the way of their departure by the belligerents, from placing themselves in safety. In presence of events of so grave a character, the members of the diplomatic corps present at Paris, with whom are associated in the absence of their respective embassies and legations, the undersigned members of the consular corps, have thought it necessary, with a full sense of their responsibility toward their respective governments, and of their duties toward their fellow-countrymen, to concert upon the measure to be taken.

Their deliberations have led the undersigned to the unanimous resolution to request that, in accordance with the recognized principles and usages of the law of nations, steps be taken to permit their countrymen to place themselves and their property in safety.

Expressing with confidence the hope that your excellency will interpose your good offices with the military authorities, in accordance with the object of this request, the undersigned take this opportunity to beg you will receive the assurances of their very high consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, January 16, 1871. (Received February 17.)

SIR: In my dispatch No. 321, dated November 19, 1870, I estimated that the amount to be paid out of the contingent fund of this legation, as connected with the expenses entailed upon it by virtue of our protection to the subjects of the North German Confederation, would not be likely to reach more than fifteen hundred dollars. That sum was independent of what I proposed should be paid to persons connected with the legation. At the time I had the honor of addressing you that dispatch, I supposed that my duties in that regard would have been ended before this time. Instead of that being the case, they have greatly increased, and no man can now venture to predict how long they are likely to continue. I am to-day furnishing aid to twenty-two hundred and seventy-six destitute Germans, and I have had to employ three additional persons in my legation to perform the service necessary to look after these people. Besides, it is necessary to consider the vastly enhanced prices of everything which we have to purchase, as incidents to the state of siege. For instance, I have had to pay at the rate of more than fifty dollars a cord for wood. There is besides quite an amount to pay for carriage-hire. Instead, thererore, of three thousand dollars (including extra compensation) which I estimated, it may in the end reach four thousand. I have thought proper to thus call this matter to your attention, in order that you might bring it to the notice of Congress, provided you should deem it necessary.

[Translation.]

VERSAILLES, December 6, 1870.

SIR: The "Daily News" newspaper, of the 24th November, contains an article from its Paris correspondent, stating that the English papers arrive regularly by the dispatch-bag which is sent you each week by the United States legation in England. He adds a detailed account of the eagerness of the French journalists to peruse the English papers, so as to reproduce their contents in the Paris papers.

If the statement alluded to be exact, it would imply relations incompatible with the rules dictated by the interests of military operations during the investment of Paris. The military authorities cannot sanction that foreign papers of recent date should reach the besieged without having been previously examined.

In obtaining for the United States legation the privilege of receiving closed dispatches within a besieged fortress, I allowed myself to be led by the conviction that we had not to fear any inconvenience liable to compromise our interest.

I believed it to be understood that the authorization only applied to official communications between the Washington government and the United States legation at Paris. The King's ambassador at London is instructed to make the like remarks to your colleague, Mr. Motley, who will, doubtless, know on his side how to put an end to any abuse if there should be such.

Receive, sir, the renewed assurance of my high consideration.

V. BISMARCK.

MR. WASHBURNE,
Minister of the United States of America, Paris.

PARIS, December 12, 1870.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, in relation to the reception of the London papers at this legation.

I took it for granted that a few numbers of the London papers of an old date could do neither good nor harm to any interest, and hence I permitted them to lie upon my table to be perused by people who were sufficiently interested to come and look over them. But, as some of the Paris journals charge that they are sent to me by the Prussian authorities in the hope that the bad news they contain will discourage the French, and as you consider their reception incompatible with the rules dictated by your military operations, I shall decline receiving any more, and I have this day written to London to have no more sent to me.

It is proper for me to say that I received some London papers in the bag which arrived on Saturday last. They will be seen by no person whatever, excepting myself, and I shall most strictly guard their contents. I hope you will find no objection to my receiving, through the bag, the papers from my own country, with the understanding that they are particularly for my own perusal. I would be very glad if you would instruct Count Bernstorff to consult with Mr. Motley on the subject. I shall write to Mr. Motley not to send me even the American journals without the assent of your government, signified by Count Bernstorff.

The bag arriving on Saturday only reached here the sixteenth day after leaving London, and I am curious to know whether the great delay was on account of the French military authorities refusing to receive it. It ought not really to take more than four or five days for the bag to come from London here, and I wish that hereafter I might receive it within that time.

I have, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURNE.

His Excellency COUNT DE BISMARCK, ſc., ſc., ſc.

PARIS, December 12, 1870.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Count Bismarck writes that my reception of the London journals is incompatible with the interest of their military operations before Paris, and he says you will be conferred with in the same sense. I desire, therefore, that no more London papers be sent to me. I find their reception only a nuisance. It seems now the Prussians object, and some of the French papers have charged that they are sent to me by Bismarck, in the hope that the bad news they contain will demoralize and discourage the Parisians. It is, therefore, best that I should receive no more London papers, but I have written Count de Bismarck that I hope he will not object to my receiving our own home papers, and that he will instruct Count Bernstorff to consult with you on the subject, and if Count B. does not assent to it, you will be good enough not to send me the American papers.

The Prussian authorities having granted me the privilege of having a bag, their understanding of what it should contain must be conformed to, and I do not wish that it should cover anything improper.

Believe me, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURNE.

[Translation.]

VERSAILLES, December 15, 1870.

SIR: I had the honor to receive the letter which you have kindly addressed to me under date 12 December, in relation to the English papers which reach you by the dispatch-bag forwarded from London, and I hasten to assure you that you have misunderstood the bearing of my remarks.

In addressing you my letter of the 6th December last, I only intended to call your attention to the abuse noted by the correspondent of the Daily News, convinced that you were unaware of it, and that this would be sufficient to put an end to it, if it had existed.

But I had no intention to deprive you personally of the English or American papers which you wish to receive, and you are entirely free to have them come for your own private use. I am persuaded that you will take the necessary precautions, so that no inconveniences shall result incompatible with our military interest.

The King's ambassador at London is instructed to inform Mr. Motley that there is no opposition on our side to his continuing sending you the English and American papers which you wish to receive.

Receive, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

V. BISMARCK.

His Excellency Mr. E. B. WASHBURNE,
Minister of the United States of America, Paris.

Mr. Washburne to Mr. Moran.

PARIS, January 1, 1871.

DEAR MR. MORAN: Please send me no more London papers; only cut out the telegraphic dispatches from the United States, from day to day, and send them. It is too much to be the only person, in a city of two millions of people, who receives any outside news. It has become a great annoyance, and I prefer being without news to being subject to it. I hope you will receive permission to send all my private letters. I expect you will send me all the American papers as usual.

Yours, truly,

E. B. WASHBURNE.

PARIS, January 4, 1871.

SIR: The reception of the London journals may involve me in trouble, and I write Mr. Moran by General Read not to send me any more, only inclosing me the telegraphic dispatches from the United States which appear in them. Some Paris papers represent that I have given out news; others say that I give out nothing, because the news is favorable to the French arms; and attempts have been made to bribe my servants to get hold of them. I conclude the only safe way is to receive no more English papers. I shall expect to receive my home papers as usual, and hope also to have permission to receive my private letters.

I have the honor, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURNE.

His Excellency COUNT DE BISMARCK, &c.

VERSAILLES, January 15, 1871.

SIR: I beg to inclose extracts of three letters addressed by persons residing in Paris to correspondents abroad. They are taken out of a balloon sent up in Paris and captured by our men. You will see from the copied passages that the facilities we have accorded to the correspondence of the American legation in London are known to private persons, some of them French, and made use of by them in order to carry on a clandestine correspondence with other people, some of them French. Those extracts further prove that Mr. Hoffmann is expected to lend a helping hand to an epistolary intercourse of that kind. I trust your excellency will effectually prevent the members of your legation from lending themselves to a practice, the continuance of which would make it imperative for me not to allow any letters to pass, except those bearing the seal of the State Department of Washington. It is the possibility of occurrences like these that makes the military authorities indisposed to favor a prompt expedition of your correspondence. Having reluctantly acceded to the whole arrangement, they would have preferred sending your dispatch-bag not to London, but directly to Washington; and now the question may be raised by them of cutting off any correspondence between you and London. In that case the best way, in my opinion, of obtaining a prompter expedition with the least inconvenience to you, would be to have the dispatch-bags for you made up and sealed, not in London, but in Washington, and to send private letters addressed to you personally together with, but not inclosed in, the bag.

Please let me know if such an arrangement would eventually suit you.

I remain, with the highest consideration, your excellency's, &c.,

V. BISMARCK.

His Excellency Mr. E. B. WASHBURNE,

Minister of the United States at Paris.

VERSAILLES, January 15, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to your excellency the dispatch-bag received from London. In accordance with the wish expressed in your letter of the 13th instant, I have, on my personal responsibility, immediately forwarded your dispatch-bag to London. In so doing I acted against the principle adopted by the general staff, that no sealed packages or letters shall be allowed to pass through our lines in either direction without a stoppage of several days. The motive of this rule is the apprehension of the general staff that even the most scrupulous loyalty and attention on the part of the responsible chief might not always exclude the possibility of missives being, by irresponsible parties, introduced into an official cover.

However much I may, from personal consideration, feel inclined to oppose this restriction in all cases where you are concerned, I cannot help perceiving that all my endeavors will be fruitless after the impression produced upon our general staff by the balloon letters which form the subject of another communication.

I therefore regret to state that it is out of my power to establish the present instance of immediate transmission as a precedent.

I remain, &c.,

V. BISMARCK.

His Excellency E. B. WASHBURNE,
Minister of the United States at Paris.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, January 19, 1871.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your two letters, both under date of the 15th instant, relating to matters connected with the transmission of the United States dispatch-bag to and from this city. One of those letters incloses extracts from those letters said to have been addressed by persons residing in Paris to correspondents abroad, such letters having been sent out in a balloon which was captured by your men.

There is no doubt but the facilities for correspondence which the legation of the United States at Paris has had are known in London and elsewhere, and that certain persons have sought to abuse those facilities, and, in order to accomplish their purposes, have attempted to make an unwarrantable use of this legation. A good many letters have found their way to our legation here. Many have been sent by your excellency, some by Count Solms, and some by Count d'Hatzfeldt. These letters having, as I have assumed, passed through your hands, I considered that I had a sufficient guarantee that they contained nothing compromising to either belligerent, and I caused them all to be delivered to the parties to whom they were addressed, without examination.

Of the letters that have found their way into my dispatch-bag, coming from London, some were addressed to my compatriots who have been detained in Paris. Such letters, after having been examined and found to contain no allusion to military or political matters, have been delivered.

A very few letters have come to me addressed to people of nationalities other than French, and after examining them and finding that they contained no allusion to military events, I caused them also to be delivered. Perhaps in half a dozen cases I have delivered some very brief notes to French people well known to me, but only after the most scrupulous examination which showed them to contain absolutely nothing but reference to family matters. And I may say that nine out of ten of the small number of letters I have received through my dispatch-bag have not been delivered by me at all, as I considered that it was not in accordance with your understanding of what the bag might contain. I have to remark, therefore, that no letters, received through my dispatch-bag from London, have ever gone out of this legation which contained anything in regard to military or political events, or containing anything in the least degree compromising to either of the belligerents; and I beg to say further, that I have equally guarded the contents of my outgoing bag.

In this connection permit me to observe that you will find inclosed herewith an envelope, containing certain letters addressed to persons in Paris, and which you sent to me by the last parlementaire. I know nothing of these persons, and I know no reason why I should deliver the letters. I therefore have the honor to return them to you.

As you suggest that the extracts of the balloon letters prove that Colonel Hoffmann was expected to lend a helping hand to the epistolary correspondence, I am authorized by him to state that he has no idea of the parties who wrote two of the letters in which his name has been used, and he denies in the most emphatic manner that they could have been authorized to use his name in any way. As to the other party, Mrs. Chaudor, an American lady, whom he says he found in great distress on account of the sickness of her children with the small-pox, in Brussels, he consented to have information sent to him in regard to them. He had no conception that this act of pure kindness would be taken advantage of to get in a letter to the gentleman therein named, whom he had never heard of. I make haste to speak of Colonel Hoffmann as a gentleman of the most unquestioned loyalty and honor, a man who thoroughly appreciates his duties and obligations, and holds to a most rigorous observance of them. I have no idea who the writer of the letters is who speaks of receiving news by the "intermediary of Mr. Washburne," but I do know that he never had any authority from me to use my name in that way, and in doing so was guilty of a gross impertinence and a gross outrage.

I beg to thank your excellency for your prompt transmission of my bag to London, in accordance with the request of my letter of the 13th instant.

In relation to the suggestion which your excellency makes, that my dispatch-bag shall be sent directly to Washington, not to be opened in London, I have to state that such an arrangement would deprive me of communicating with the United States legation in London, and through that legation, in case of need, with the Washington Government by telegraph.

In regard to sending my dispatches from Washington in a bag made up there to be transmitted directly to me here, its practical operation at the present time would be to deprive me of all communication from my Government. My weekly dispatches from Mr. Fish for the last four weeks are now on their way from Washington to Paris. If I am deprived of a bag from London, those dispatches, therefore, could not reach me under the seal of my Government, which is the only way that I would feel authorized to receive them. Independent of that, it will take between three and four weeks for me to get a letter to Washington, requesting that the bag may be made up there directly for Paris. In the mean time, dispatches to me would be coming weekly to London, with the expectation that I should receive them in the usual manner. And further, after my letter should have finally reached Washington, requesting that the bag should be made up there for Paris, it would take the contents of such bag three or four weeks more to reach me.

Hence, your excellency will perceive that if I should receive no bag from London I should be deprived of hearing from Mr. Fish for a period of some three months.

With a knowledge, therefore, of the views of my Government on this subject, and its opinion that it has a right to promptly communicate with me as its representative near the government of France, it is impossible for me to acquiesce in the arrangement which you have done me the honor to recommend. I have concluded, therefore, to send you by the parlementaire, which I hope to obtain for Tuesday next, my dispatch-bag addressed in the usual way to the United States dispatch agent in London. If you should feel constrained to decline sending it forward without an unreasonable delay, I will thank you to return it to me here by the first parlementaire. And also, if you should feel constrained to retain my bag sent to you from London to Versailles beyond a reasonable time, I will thank you to return it to London.

Out of respect, due alike to myself, as well as to the Government which I have the honor to represent, I should feel compelled to decline receiving or transmitting any dispatch-bag or any communications through your military lines upon terms and conditions which might be construed as implying a distrust of my good faith and of the loyal manner in which I have discharged my duty toward both belligerents and to my own Government, to which I am alone responsible for my official action.

Before closing this communication, I trust your excellency will pardon me a further observation. For the period of six months I have been charged with the delicate, laborious and responsible duty of protecting your countrymen in Paris. Of the manner in which those duties, having relations to both belligerents, have been performed, I do not propose to speak; I am content to abide by the record made up in the State Department at Washington. But I can state that there has never been a time when these duties have involved graver consequences and responsibilities than at the present moment. As I have expressed to you before, I have been astonished at the number of Germans who, as it turns out, were left in the city when the gates were closed. Having exhausted their last resources, and finding themselves in a state of the most absolute destitution, they have applied to me for protection and aid, which I have so far been enabled to extend to them from the funds placed in my hands by the royal government. The number of these people amounts to-day to two thousand three hundred and eighty-five (2,385,) and it is certain, had there not been some one here to protect and aid them, many must have inevitably perished of cold and starvation. My position in relation to these people, and to your government, is known to the people of Paris, and as the siege wears on and the exasperation is intensified, I now find myself exposed to the hostility of a certain portion of the population of the city. While your military authorities seem to be agitated by the gravest fears in relation to my dispatch-bag, I am daily violently assailed by a portion of the Paris press as a "Prussian representative," and a "Prussian sympathizer," and a short time since it was proposed in one of the clubs that I should be hung—rather a pleasant diversion in these dreary days of siege through which we are passing.

I will only add that, so long as I am the diplomatic representative of my country in Paris, I shall discharge every duty, even to the end, and in the face of every circumstance, that I owe to my own Government, and every duty that I have by its direction assumed towards the subjects of the North German Confederation.

No. 99.

No. 351.]

LEGATION OF UNITED STATES,
Paris, January 25, 1871. (Received February 17.)

SIR: The past week has been one of great interest. The government issued its order for the rationing of bread on the 18th instant, which is an evidence of the "beginning of the end." The amount issued is three-fifths of a pound to all, except children under five years of age, who receive one-half of that quantity. This allowance is small, and the quality of the bread issued is very poor indeed. It has only about thirty-one hundredths of flour. The balance is made up of oatmeal and rice, and some say peas and beans form part of this admixture. It is a sad sight to see the long queues at all the bake-shops. One sees posted at all the cafés the notice to their customers that they must bring their bread with them. The mairies are rationing very small quantities of horse-meat, a little rice, beans, peas, and occasionally herring and cod-fish. The quantity of coffee, sugar, and wine is sufficient for the siege, and can be had at enhanced prices.

The third grand sortie was made on Thursday morning last beyond Mont Valérien, and in the direction of Versailles. The movement was under the direction of General Trochu himself, his third army corps being commanded respectively by Vinoy, Ducrot, and Bellemon. The French appear to have had some success in the morning, and to have captured some of the advanced positions of the enemy, but after a bloody fight, continuing nearly all day, they were finally driven from the positions they had captured under the protection of the guns of Mont Valérien. There has been no official statement of the French killed and wounded, and the number of men placed hors du combat.

The number of killed and wounded is variously estimated at from four to eight thousand. I, of course, have no means of judging as to the correctness of any of these estimates.

The attack was not renewed on Friday morning, but on the other hand the troops began coming into the city. The national guard participated largely in this sortie, and it is said that they fought very creditably. The complete failure of the movement, with so great a loss of men, produced a very profound impression in the city on Friday. The feeling became very much intensified toward evening, when the government published a pigeon dispatch stating that Chauzy had been defeated, and had lost two thousand prisoners and twelve guns. The agitation in the evening became intense, particularly in the revolutionary parts of the city, and the clubs were crowded with an exasperated and excited population.

On Saturday the excitement was still greater, and the most violent and revolutionary movements were set on foot in Belleville, La Villette, and Montmartre. Measures having been concocted, on Saturday night the prison of Mazas was attacked and many of the insurrectionists of the 31st October, who were there imprisoned, were set at liberty, and among them Flourens, who was the leader of the émeute of that date. It would seem extraordinary that in a city where there are five hundred thousand soldiers a prison like that of Mazas should have been left to be captured by an insignificant body of men. It is said, however, that the prison was not actually forced, but was opened by the treachery of the director.

On Sunday (yesterday) the Journal Officiel announced that the commandant-in-chief of the army of Paris would henceforth be separated from the presidency of the government; that General Vinoy was made commander-in-chief of the army of Paris; that the title and functions of the government of Paris were suppressed; that General Trochu would be continued as the president of the government. This was considered a half-way measure, and did not seem to give general satisfaction. It was claimed that Trochu had completely lost the public confidence, and that he ought no longer to occupy any position whatever, in the government.

During all the day of Saturday, and on Saturday night, arrangements were being made by certain turbulent spirits, and by some battalions of the national guard from Belleville, in addition to attacking Mazas, to make an attack on the government.

Hence, after they had delivered the prisoners from Mazas they attempted to seize the mairie of the twentieth arrondissement, (which includes Belleville,) and to install themselves there as the headquarters of the insurrection. They remained there long enough to steal all the bread which had been laid aside for the poor. Notices of the invasion of the mairies having been conveyed to the military commander in that section of the city, he proceeded hither with a few companies of the national guard, and very soon summarily expelled the insurgents.

About 1 o'clock in the afternoon of yesterday crowds of people, including men, women, and children, particularly from Belleville, began flowing toward the Hôtel de Ville, crying "Donnez-nous du pain," "Nous mourrons de faim," "Vive la Commune!" "A bas Trochu!" After remaining in the great square in front of the Hôtel de Ville for an hour or two the crowd began slowly to disperse. About 3 o'clock, however, a troop of about five hundred men arrived in front of the Hôtel. They marched in order with shouldered arms, and with drums beating the charge. They massed on the sidewalk in front of the hotel, crying "A bas Trochu!" "Vive la Commune!" After some parleying shots were fired from the ranks of the mob, and an officer of the garde mobile received three balls and fell seriously wounded upon the sidewalk. Then an indiscriminate firing took place between the mobiles guarding the Hôtel de Ville and the rioters. Some of the insurgents had posted themselves in houses opposite the Hôtel de Ville and directed a fire against the windows of the first story of the building. They also threw out a certain number of bombs and explosive balls. And now the rappel commenced to beat in the quarters near to the Hôtel de Ville, and soon afterward in other localities. The national guards everywhere rallied with great alacrity to sustain public order, and in a few minutes the insurgents were put ingloriously to flight. The Journal Officiel of this morning says that in this "combat" there have been five persons killed and eighteen wounded. There has since been no further trouble. It was quiet all last night, and the most perfect tranquillity reigns to-day.

Vinoy is fully installed as the commander of the army of Paris, and has issued a soldierly order of the day. His position is one of the most difficult that was ever undertaken by a soldier, and of course it is idle for me to speculate as to the line of action which he will adopt.

The government published yesterday morning a dispatch from Chauzy, dated the 16th of January, which showed that his army was in a very bad position. This news has added still further to the discouragement of the people of Paris, but no whisper of surrender is yet heard. In all of these terrible circumstances no man talks either of surrender or of peace. The bombardment has so far utterly failed of accomplishing what was its apparent object. This is the nineteenth day, and its effects now are not as great as they have been. The number of killed and wounded cannot exceed three hundred, and the material damage is not very great. No fort has either been or is likely to be taken; and I hold to my opinion that the city will only be taken by famine. It may, however, fall suddenly, and the siege, now extended over four long months, be ended before this dispatch shall reach you. The government seems to have suddenly waked up to an unusual degree of energy. The Journal Officiel of this morning publishes one decree suppressing all the clubs; another decree to facilitate the rapid administration of military justice, and yet another suppressing the red republican journals, Le Réveil and Le Combat.

The number of deaths in the city per week is still increasing. Last week the number reached four thousand four hundred and sixty-five, (4,465,) not counting the deaths in the hospitals, which are estimated for the last week at one thousand.

The weather has moderated very much, and the suffering by cold has been greatly alleviated.

VERSAILLES, January 28, 1871.

SIR: I had the honor of receiving your answer, dated the 19th instant, to my two letters of 15th, relating to your correspondence with the United States legation in London. I should very much regret if you should have construed anything in these two letters so as to convey the indication of any complaint against you. Nothing, indeed, could be further from my thought, and I take pleasure in renewing the expression how deeply sensible I am of all the trouble you have in carrying on your correspondence with the authorities in Paris, and in taking care of our countrymen there. But the balloon letters having been brought officially under my notice by the military authorities, I thought it my duty to inform you of the reference made in those letters to your legation, and to that in London. The delay occurred now and then in the transmission of your dispatch-bags, is not occasioned by any doubt as to the right of your Government to correspond with you, but by obstacles it was out of my power to remove. I hope that for the future there will not be any more delay of that kind.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

No. 355.] Paris, January 30, 1871. (Received February 18.)

SIR: The crisis has at last been reached. In my dispatch of a week ago, No. 351, I spoke of the discouraging state of things in Paris, but of the still resolute determination of the people not to surrender. I added, however, that the city might fall suddenly, and the siege be ended before my dispatch should reach you. The disturbances of Sunday, the 22d instant, and the additional news which the government received on Monday, of the substantial defeat of all the outside armies, taken in connection with the utter impossibility to feed Paris but a few days longer—all taken together imperatively demanded immediate action on the part of the French authorities. Paris had held out beyond every reasonable calculation, and the population had suffered all the horrors of famine, cold, and bombardment. From the 27th of this month only seven days of provisions remained, limiting to each one only the small possible amount necessary to sustain human life. On Monday evening, a week ago, negotiations were commenced at Versailles between Mr. Jules Favre and the Count de Bismarck. Of course the greatest anxiety has existed in Paris as to what would be the result of those negotiations. The general idea has been that Paris, resisting to the end, would have to capitulate unconditionally. Such a thing as a general armistice was not contemplated, and while Paris should fall into the hands of the Prussians, it was supposed that the government of the national defense would still hold its existence in the provinces and continue the war à outrance. I was myself inclined to take the same opinion, and in view of the probable fact that in case of a surrender there would be no shadow of a government of France at Paris, I wrote to you in my No. 338, asking for instructions as to the course I should pursue in such an emergency. I thought that it would be necessary in such case to leave Paris and repair to the seat of the French government. Instead of the absolute surrender of the city and the military possession of it by the Prussians, we have the armistice, a copy of which, from the official journal, I have the honor to send you herewith. I do not see anything in the present situation which will necessitate my leaving Paris to repair to Bordeaux, for the seat of government will remain here until such a time at least as the armistice shall expire and peace fail to be made.

I also send you the decree of the government of the national defense convoking the national assembly at Bordeaux on the 12th proximo, and also fixing the number of delegates to the assembly. You will see that the number of delegates to the assembly is seven hundred and fifty-three, which I think is quite too large, particularly when it is considered that the assembly would have but one week in which to conclude the important work for which it has been convoked. We are now entering on a new and interesting phase of the events which have been convulsing, not only the belligerent powers, but the whole civilized world, for the last six months. It is to be seen whether a peace can be made on terms which will be acceptable by the French nation, or whether the war is to be indefinitely continued. You will be likely to receive full information by telegraph of the action growing out of this armistice and of the national assembly before this dispatch shall reach you, and I will not, therefore, indulge in any speculations as to the probable shape which things will take.

[Translation.]

VERSAILLES, January 17, 1871

Count de Bismarck-Schoenhausen, Chancellor of the North German Confederation at Versailles to Mr. Kern, minister of the Swiss Confederation at Paris.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive the letter of the 13th of this month, signed by you and by the minister of the United States, as well as by several diplomatic agents formerly accredited to Paris, in which, invoking the principles of the law of nations, you request me to use my influence with the military authorities in order that such measures may be taken as will enable the fellow-countrymen of the signers of the letter to protect themselves and their property during the siege of Paris.

I regret that it is impossible for me to admit that the reclamations which the signers of the letter have done me the honor to address to me, find in the principles of international law the authority necessary to justify them. It is undeniable that the German nation, standing alone in modern history, to transform the capital of a great country into a fortress, and to make a vast fortified camp of its environs, inclosing nearly three millions of inhabitants, has created for those inhabitants a distressing state of things which is much to be regretted. The responsibility falls exclusively upon those who have chosen to make of this capital a fortress and a battle-field. Under all circumstances, those persons who have chosen their residence in a fortress, and continued of their own accord to reside there during the war, should have been prepared for the inconveniences which have ensued.

Paris being the most important fortress in France, in which the enemy has concentrated his principal forces, which, from their fortified positions in the midst of the population, constantly attack the German armies by their sorties and by the fire of their artillery, no good reason can be alleged why the German generals should give up the attack upon this fortified position, or conduct their military operations in a manner which would be in contradiction with the object they have in view.

I take the liberty to recall to you, in this place, that on our side nothing has been neglected to preserve the peaceful portion of the population belonging to neutral countries from the inconveniences and the dangers inseparable from a siege. On the 26th of September last, the secretary of state, M. de Thiele, addressed a circular upon this subject to the ministers accredited to Berlin, and I stated for my part, in a letter bearing date October 10th last, addressed to his excellency the Papal nuncio, and other diplomatic agents still residing at Paris, that the inhabitants would henceforth have to bear the effects of military operations. A second circular, dated October 4th last, attempted to show the consequences which must result to the civil population of Paris from a resistance prolonged to extremities. On the 29th of the same month the contents of this circular were communicated by me to the minister of the United States of America, whom I begged at the same time to communicate it to the members of the diplomatic corps. It results, from what precedes, that warnings and recommendations to leave the besieged city have not been wanting to the subjects of the neutral powers, although these warnings, inspired by a sentiment of humanity and by the consideration which we desire to show toward citizens belonging to friendly nations, are as little prescribed by the principles of international law as the permissions which were granted to pass our lines.

The recognized usages and principles of the law of nations require still less that the besieger should notify the besieged of the military operations which he thinks it necessary to undertake in the course of the siege, as I have already had the honor to state as regards the bombardment, in a letter addressed to Mr. Jules Favre on the 26th of September last.

It was evident that the bombardment of Paris must take place if resistance was prolonged, and it was therefore to be looked for.

Although an example of a fortified city of such importance, and inclosing within its walls armies and material of war so numerous and abundant, was unknown to Vattel, he says upon this subject:

"To destroy a city by shells and hot shot is an extremity which must not be resorted to without very strong reasons. But it is authorized, however, by the laws of war, when it is impossible to reduce otherwise an important place, upon which may depend the success of the war, or which may serve to inflict dangerous blows."

In the present case, it would be the more unjustifiable to raise an objection against the siege of Paris, inasmuch as our intention is not at all to destroy the city, (which would, however, be permissible, according to the principle laid down by Vattel,) but to render untenable the central and fortified position where the French army prepares its attacks upon the German troops, and which serves them for a place of refuge after such attacks. I take the liberty finally to remind you, sir, as well as the other signers of the letter of the 13th instant, that after the warnings had been given, which I have recalled to your recollection, it was nevertheless permitted during whole months to those neutrals who made the request, to pass our lines without other restriction than their identity and their nationality should be certified, and that to this day our avant-postes place at the disposition of the members of the corps diplomatic, and of those persons whose presence is required by their governments or by their diplomatic agents, the safe conduct necessary for them to pursue their journey. Many of the signers of the letter of January 13th instant were notified some months since that they could pass our lines, and they have for a long time had the authorization of their respective governments to leave Paris. Hundreds of subjects of the neutral powers, whose representatives have addressed to us the same requests in their favor, are in a similar position. We have no authentic knowledge of the reasons which have prevented them from availing themselves of a permission which they have had for a long time; but if private communications are to be believed, it is the French authorities who have opposed their departure, and even that of the diplomatic representatives. If this information is correct, we can only recommend to those who are compelled against their will to remain in Paris to address their complaints and their protestations to the representatives of the existing power. Under all circumstances, I feel authorized, after what I have stated, not to admit, as far as the German authorities are concerned, th assertion contained in the letter of January 13th instant, that the countrymen of the signers have been prevented from withdrawing themselves from danger by the "difficulties opposed to their departure by the belligerents."

We will even maintain, at this day, the permission accorded to the members of the diplomatic corps to pass our lines, considering this to be a duty of international courtesy, however difficult and injurious it may be to our military operations in the present state of the siege. As regards their numerous countrymen, I regret that I can not, at the present day, see any mode, other than the surrender of Paris, for them to withdraw themselves from the dangers inseparable from the siege of a fortress.

If it were admissible in a military point of view to organize the departure from Paris of a portion of the population, which may readily be estimated at 50,000 men, with their families and their property, we should not have the supplies to feed them, or be able to provide for their transportation the means which would be necessary to enable them to cross the zone which the French authorities caused to be abandoned and stripped of all its resources before the investment of the city. We find ourselves in the sad condition of entire inability to subordinate military operations to the sympathies with which the sufferings of the civil population of Paris inspire us. Our line of conduct is rigorously proscribed by the necessities of war, and by the duty of guarding our troops against new attacks by the enemy's army. After our conscientious observance of the convention of Geneva, which we have given proof of under the most difficult circumstances, it would be superfluous to give the assurance that the German artillery does not direct its fire intentionally upon buildings occupied by women, children, and sick persons. In consequence of the very nature of the fortifications of Paris, and of the distance at which our batteries are still placed, it is as difficult for us to prevent damage by accident to buildings which we would desire to spare as to prevent wounds from being inflicted upon the civil population, which are to be deplored in every siege. If these painful accidents, which we sincerely regret, occur in Paris on a larger scale than in other besieged fortresses, we must conclude that either it should not have been converted into a fortress, or that it should not have prolonged its defense beyond a certain period. In no case can it be permitted to any people, after having declared war against its neighbors, to preserve its principal fortress from surrender by invoking the kind consideration of the enemy for the inoffensive population, for the foreigners who dwell in the fortress, or for the hospitals which may be there, in the midst of which its troops seek shelter, and where, after each of their attacks, they are enabled to prepare others under the shelter of these hospitals.

I beg you, sir, to have the kindness to bring my reply to the knowledge of the signers of the letter of January 13th instant, and to receive the renewed assurance of my high consideration.

V. BISMARCK.

The minister of the Swiss Confederation at Paris to Count de Bismarck-Schoenhausen, chancellor of the North German Confederation at Versailles.

PARIS, January 23, 1871.

SIR: I had the honor to receive the reply addressed by your excellency, the 17th instant, to the note signed on the 13th of the same month by the members of the diplomatic corps at Paris, as well as by a certain number of members of the consular corps, in the absence of their respective embassies and legations. In accordance with the wish expressed by your excellency, I immediately communicated this reply to the signers of the note of January 13. I have been charged by their unanimous resolution to call your excellency's attention to certain errors contained in your reply.

Your excellency informs the signers that by a circular, bearing date October 4, you endeavored to show the consequences which must ensue to the civil population of Paris from a resistance prolonged to its extreme limit, and you add, "On the 29th of the same month this circular was communicated by me to the minister of the United States of America, whom I begged at the same time to communicate it to the members of the diplomatic corps." After having made the necessary examination, Mr. Washburne declares that no communication expressing a wish of the kind has been received by him, and that this statement is erroneous. In another passage of your reply, your excellency expresses yourself as follows: "I believe myself authorized, in accordance with what I have just stated, not to admit (as far as the German authorities are concerned) the assertion contained in the letter of January 13, that the countrymen of the signers were prevented from withdrawing themselves from danger by the difficulties opposed to their departure by the belligerents."

While acknowledging the readiness with which your excellency placed at the beginning of the siege "sauf conduits" at the disposal of persons belonging to neutral states, and not denying the fact that the French military authorities thought proper to revoke at the commencement of November permission before granted, it nevertheless results from the declaration of several members of the diplomatic and consular corps, that in the course of the same month your excellency informed them that the German military authorities had "resolved to grant to no one permission to cross the lines of the besieging troops." The signers of the note were therefore correct in declaring that "difficulties had been put in the way of the departure of the belligerents."

Your excellency adds that, in accordance with private communications which you have received, the French authorities opposed the departure of the diplomatic representatives of neutral states. This fact not having been brought within the knowledge of any one of the chiefs of the diplomatic corps present at Paris, it may be assumed that these private communications were founded upon erroneous information. On submitting to a fresh examination the correspondence upon this subject, you will easily convince yourself, sir, of the accuracy of the corrections which I have had the honor to submit to you. As regards the substance of their request, it appears to the signers of the "note" of January 13 that the point of view in which the German military authorities have placed themselves is too widely different from their own, and that the refusal is conceived in too positive terms to permit that any further argument upon the principles and usages of the law of nations, should reach the desired conclusion. They cannot, however, omit to observe that your excellency principally endeavors to show, invoking the authority of Vattel, that the laws of war authorize, as a last extremity, the bombardment of a fortified city. The intention of the signers of the "note" of January 13 was not to contest this extreme right. They confine themselves to affirming, and they believe that they can maintain, in accord with the best authorities on modern international law, and with the precedents of the different periods, the rule that the bombardment of a fortified city should be preceded by notice.

There remains, therefore, only to the diplomatic and consular representatives of the neutral states, in consequence of the duties which are imposed upon them by the gravity of the situation, and of the importance of the interests at stake—the duty to communicate to their respective governments the correspondence exchanged with your excellency, while always insisting upon the substantial foundation of their request.

It may be permitted me, in conclusion, to express, in the name of the signers of the "note" of January 13, as well as in my own, my lively and sincere regret that the German military authorities could not resolve to reconcile the necessities of war with the wish to diminish the sufferings of the civil population of every nationality residing in Paris.

I take this occasion to beg you to receive, sir, &c.

The minister of the Swiss Confederation.

Paris, January 2, 1871.

SIR: I beg leave to thank you for sending my dispatch-bag at an earlier period than heretofore. I am enabled thus to answer the dispatches of my Government to go out by the courier to-morrow morning. I should be very glad if they could arrive in London by Friday, so as to go by the Saturday steamer. I duly received the London journals, and it is unnecessary to say that their contents have been most strictly guarded. I think there must have been some misapprehension in London in regard to my private letters. Mr. Moran, our chargé d'affaires, writes me that he was not permitted to send me any letters, except from my wife, who is now at Brussels. The consequence is that private letters to me from the United States minister at Brussels; from my son, who is in college in the United States; another son, who is at school in London, as well as a great many letters from my personal and political friends at home, have been detained, and are now at London. As the greater includes the less, I suppose that, after you had kindly conceded to me the journals containing military and political information, there would be no objection to my receiving my private correspondence having probably no reference to such matters, but if containing any information, it would be equally guarded with information I obtain from the journals. If such should be your understanding, I would be very glad if you would so telegraph to London, so my letters can come to me by the bag which leaves London next Friday. I should hope by the following Wednesday to receive them.

I have the honor, &c.,

[Extracts.]

No. 362.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, February 5, 1871. (Received February 23.)

SIR: During the past week the people of Paris have been patiently and quietly awaiting the ravitaillement, and agitating the question of the election of members to the national assembly which is to convene at Bordeaux on the 12th instant. Small quantities of provisions have commenced coming in to-day.

The first train contained supplies sent by the population of London to the population of Paris. These supplies have been distributed among the twenty arrondissements in proportion to their respective population, and are to be given out only to the most necessitous. It will be but a short time I hope before all can be reasonably supplied. The lower classes in the city have during the last months of the siege suffered untold miseries of cold and hunger, and with a patience and fortitude which does them great credit. Indeed the suffering of all classes has been very great, and it might be said that all classes have sustained the sufferings and privations of the siege in a manner that must excite the wonder and admiration of the world. * * *

Now that the siege is over I am thankful that I have remained through it all, for I believe that I have been of some service to the interests with which I have been charged. It is with pleasure that I am enabled to state that I have succeeded in protecting all American property in Paris, and that no harm has come to any of our Americans who have remained here. This statement must be qualified, however, so as not to apply to the young American, Mr. Swagar, who lost his life by having his foot torn to pieces by a Prussian shell, and to the two young men whose property was destroyed by the bursting of a shell in their apartment in the Latin quarter.

Several attempts were made to interfere with American property at different times, but I must do the government of the national defense the credit to say that they have treated all such matters as I have deemed it necessary to bring to their attention with the utmost fairness and consideration. In the first place it was proposed to quarter the garde mobile in the American apartments, but upon an application to Gambetta, then minister of the interior, he gave an order that it should not be done. Afterward the city authorities proposed a special tax upon the apartments of the absent, which bore very heavily upon our countrymen. I had a correspondence with M. Jules Favre upon that subject, which I had the honor to transmit you and by which you will have seen that the city authorities were overruled and the tax not enforced. Then it was proposed to put the refugees from the neighboring villages, who had come into Paris, into the apartments of some of the Americans. I resisted that, and the intention was not carried out. And when the bombardment took place, and the people from that part of the city exposed to the shells were driven out, it was proposed to shelter them in the vacant apartments in the other parts of the city. Many of the apartments of the Americans were threatened in this way, but I gave orders that in no case would I consent to have the furnished apartments of Americans occupied in this manner, and I am happy to say that no apartment has thus been occupied. And lastly, after the armistice was declared, and all the troops came into the city, another attempt was made to quarter soldiers and officers also in the vacant apartments of Americans, but I protested against that, and no apartment has yet been occupied in that way. I hope, therefore, that when our country people return to their homes in Paris they will find everything in as good condition as when they left.

Very little damage has been done to the property of the people of other nationalities with whose protection I have been charged. At an early period the home of a German, Mr. Hedler, was invaded by the garde mobile in search of Prussian spies, and some damage was done to the furniture. Upon my representation of the matter to the government, Count de Kératry, who was then the prefect of police, took the affair promptly in hand, brought the offending parties to punishment, and permitted agents selected by me to assess the damages, which were promptly paid. Immediately after the breaking out of the war I took under my protection the magnificent hotel of the Prussian embassy in the Rue de Lille. All the persons who had charge of it, even down to the concierge, had been expelled from France, and as it seemed to be the objective point of the hostility of the Prussian population, I had great fears of its safety. I at once placed it under the charge of an American friend in Paris, who has exercised a most vigilant guardianship over it, and protected it from all harm. While there has been a good deal of hostility against me among a certain number of the population of Paris during the siege, and while I have been assailed in the clubs and in the newspapers on account of my protection of the Germans, I have no cause whatever for complaint against the government of the national defense, but have been treated by them with the greatest kindness and with all the consideration due to me as the diplomatic representative of our country.

PARIS, February 10, 1871.

SIR: I have received, with the letter you did me the honor to write to me on the 8th of this month, a check for thirty-five thousand francs, representing the amount of the subscription opened at New York in favor of the French poor who have suffered from the present calamities. I hasten to thank you for the gift of these funds, and I shall be obliged to you if you will inform the citizens of New York who have united in this subscription of our profound gratitude for their generous assistance. I have agreed with the minister of finances that the distribution of the amount which you have sent me shall be made through a commission, of which Mr. J. Karrick Riggs is, according to your wish, to be a member.

Receive, &c.,

SIR: I am infinitely touched by the striking mark of sympathy which my country receives from your free America, and I beg you to convey the impression of my gratitude to your countrymen of New York who have been kind enough to take the initiative in this generous offering addressed to France so cruelly tried. I transmit to-day to my colleague M. Picard, minister of the finances, the check for thirty-five thousand francs you have had the kindness to send me, begging him to name, for the distribution of this amount, a commission, of which Mr. Joseph Karrick Riggs shall be a member—the gentleman whom you have named, and who will hasten to take your instructions.

I take this occasion to renew the assurances with which I have the honor to be,

SIR: We have reached another stage in the progress of the extraordinary events which have convulsed France for the last seven months.

M. Thiers having been named by the National Assembly at Bordeaux chief of the executive power and president of the council of ministers of the French Republic, has selected his ministers. The new ministry is announced in the Journal Officiel of this morning. I advised you of the fact of the complete organization of this new government by telegraph this morning, and asked instructions. Four of the old ministers are in the new ministry. Much to my gratification M. Jules Favre retains the portfolio of foreign affairs, M. Ernest Picard has been transferred from the finance to the interior department, M. Jules Simon remains in the public instruction, and General Le Floa in the war. The minister of finance has not yet been designated; rumor has it that this portfolio will be confided to Buffet, one of the late ministers of finance under the empire. He has the reputation of being an honest and capable man; but, when he was minister, he distinguished himself by his opposition to any liberal postal treaty with our Government. Of the other ministers, De Larcy is the minister of public works, Lambrecht is the minister of commerce, and Vice-Admiral Pothnan is minister of the marine and the colonies. The antecedents of the last three gentlemen named I am not familiar with. All the gentlemen have accepted the portfolios which have been confided to them.

Messrs. Thiers, Favre, and Picard arrived yesterday from Bordeaux, and to-day M. Thiers has gone to Versailles to open negotiations for a peace. The national convention at Bordeaux, after having appointed fifteen commissioners to assist in the peace negotiations, took a recess until negotiations shall have been concluded.

I have the honor to send you the communication which M. Thiers made to the National Assembly at Bordeaux on Sunday last. I am sure your will read with profound interest that wonderful production of that venerable and patriotic man. He is now the leading figure in France. The nation leans upon him with hope and confidence.

My health has not permitted me to be out in the city for the last few days, but I understand that a most wonderful change has taken place; that Paris has become quite herself again. The tone of the press, however, shows there is intense anxiety in regard to the peace. The great problem must soon be solved, for it is evident, from the expression of the German official paper at Versailles, that the whole matter must be settled without much further delay. Of all these matters you will be fully advised by telegraph before you receive this dispatch.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 24, 1871.

SIR: Your Nos. 350, 353, and 358, severally dated 23d, 30th ultimo, and 4th instant, have been received.

Your letters to Count Bismarck on the subject of the dispatch-bag, and its conveyance to and from Paris, meets the entire approval of the Department. It is dignified, forcible, and just.

It was not unnatural that the powers besieging Paris during their long and terrible efforts should have had their susceptibilities aroused at times, by the various rumors and statements (originated and put in circulation possibly for the very purpose of operating upon those susceptibilities) of information prejudicial to their military operations being conveyed into and from the beleaguered capital.

But it would be very much to be regretted, and would have been very unjust, had even a momentary suspicion found its lodgment in minds capable of achieving the results that have attended the civil and military operations of Germany toward the representative of a friendly state, and that representative being the one who at the request of Germany, and with the consent of his own Government, had charged himself with the arduous and critical duty of the care and protection of the German residents shut in with the millions of Frenchmen in the capital which Germany was endeavoring to reduce by siege, starvation, and bombardment.

The President observes, however, with satisfaction the very just disclaimer of any suspicion of the good faith of our conduct, in the letter of the chancellor of the North German Union to you, under date of 28th January last.

The question of the right of uninterrupted correspondence between a neutral power and its representative, duly accredited and resident in the capital of a belligerent, which, while he is thus resident, becomes the object of attack and siege by another belligerent, is now, happily, no longer one of immediate practical application.

It is satisfactory to notice that although Count Bismarck, in his note addressed to you on 6th December last, speaks of "obtaining for the legation of the United States the privilege of receiving closed dispatches," in his note of January 28th from Versailles he recognizes the principle asserted by me in a note addressed to Baron Gerolt on 21st November last, (of which a copy was sent to you with my No. 206 of 22d November,) and admits of no "doubt as to the right of your Government to correspond with you."

The delays and interruptions to that right are, I trust, wholly of the past, and may have been, and it is hoped were, the unavoidable accidents of the then pending military strife. In the absence of any recurrence we are content with the recognition so fully made by Count Bismarck of the right which we claimed.

I inclose herewith for your archives, and in connection with the correspondence on this subject, a copy of a dispatch from Mr. Bancroft of 21st January, with a translation of a letter to him from Count Bismarck of 15th January last, replying to my note of 21st November, (above referred to,) addressed to Baron Gerolt, and of my reply to Mr. Bancroft of this date.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, February 28, 1871. (Received March 20.)

SIR : The treaty of peace between France and the new German Empire to be ratified hereafter by the National Assembly at Bordeaux, was signed at Versailles on Sunday afternoon last. It has not yet been published, but the principal conditions are well understood. The news of the signing of the treaty was received in Paris on Sunday evening, and it created, as you may well understand, a very profound impression. The condition that a portion of Paris is to be occupied by thirty thousand German troops until the ratification of the treaty has produced an intense feeling, but I am in hopes the city will pass through this trying ordeal without any scenes of violence. It was generally supposed that the greater part of the German army about Paris would make a triumphant entry into the city, marching through its principal avenues, but without quartering in any part of it. The change in the proposed programme, by having a smaller number of the troops enter and remain here until the peace is ratified at Bordeaux, would seem to indicate that this partial occupation of the city was intended as a pressure on the National Assembly to hasten its action. The government has made a strong appeal, counseling forbearance and moderation, and the press has, with great unanimity, seconded such appeal. Indeed, by a slip which I cut from one of the journals and inclose to you herewith, you will see that the publication of all the newspapers of Paris is to be suspended during the Prussian occupation. Our legation is situated in that part of the city which is to be occupied by the German troops, and it is in this part that the greatest number of American residents have their apartments. There has been a great deal of alarm felt by our countrymen lest the German troops might be quartered upon them, but I yesterday wrote Count Bismarck on the subject, and called his attention to the correspondence between Mr. Bancroft and Mr. Thiele in regard to the protection of American property in the event of the entry of German troops into Paris, to the end that such orders might be given by their military authorities as would secure protection to all American property in the city. I will say there can be no reasonable doubt of the ratification of the treaty by the assembly at Bordeaux. You undoubtedly will have the full text of it by telegraph long before this dispatch will reach you, and you will be able to form a judgment upon it, and determine in your own mind whether the peace now to be secured will be a lasting one. It is impossible to tell what will be the influence of time upon the French people, but I think it is safe to say that to-day there exists all over France such a feeling of hatred toward the Prussians as is almost without a parallel in the history of nations. The article which I send you herewith from the Siecle, one of the oldest and ablest of the French journals, will give you a pretty good idea of the prevailing sentiment in France upon this subject.

The principal negotiators of the treaty on the French side were Messrs. Thiers and Favre. A more cruel task was probably never before imposed on patriotic men, and it was only during the final hours of the armistice that the treaty was signed. I am advised by the most reliable authority that the great "hitch" was in regard to the cession of the Fortress of Belfort. That was persistently demanded by the Germans and equally persistently refused by the French negotiators, and at last

M. Thiers declared absolutely that he would sign no treaty which ceded Belfort, though the Germans were willing to agree that they would not important fortress by France will do much to reconcile the Parisians to enter Paris if they could have Belfort. I think the retention of this the entry of the Germans into their city. Some of the American residents of Paris have already returned here, and as soon as peace shall have been definitely made, and the railroad trains shall be running regularly for passengers and baggage, I shall expect to see them all back. There has been considerable alarm expressed as to the future health of the city, but I believe it is without any reasonable foundation. The number of deaths per week is decreasing. Provisions are now plenty and cheaper than before the siege. The great want here now is the means of locomotion, the greater number of the horses having been killed for food during the siege, but as soon as peace is made that want will be supplied. Paris has already become again quite Parisian, and during the last few pleasant days the streets have been filled by the same bright-hearted population, presenting that cheerful aspect which so peculiarly belongs to this historic city. But when you go outside the walls the destruction and devastation of war can hardly be described. The most fearful and complete change is at St. Cloud; that beautiful village, with its magnificent palace, rich in the associations of centuries, is literally one mass of ruins. Bois de Boulogne, stripped of its trees, is a sad sight, recalling to mind the fate which befell it under somewhat similar circumstances in 1815. The interior of Paris is not much changed. A great many large and beautiful trees, on many of the avenues, have been cut down, but the smaller trees are left standing, so the alteration is not so great as to be much remarked.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, March 1, 1871. (Received March 20.)

SIR: They have come in. At 9 o'clock this a. m. three blue hussars entered the Port Maillot, proceeded up the avenue of the Grand Army, and walked their horses slowly down the magnificent avenue of the Champs Elysées, with carbines cocked and fingers upon the trigger. These hussars looked carefully into the side streets and proceeded slowly down the avenue. But few people were out at that early hour in the morning. Soon after, six more made their appearance by the same route, and every few minutes thereafter the number increased. Then came in the main body of the advance guard, numbering about one thousand men, consisting of cavalry and infantry, Bavarian and Prussian, forming part of the eleventh corps, under the command of General Kamichi. By this time the crowd on the Champs Elysées had increased and met the advancing Germans with hisses and insult. A portion of the German troops then halted and with great deliberation loaded their pieces, whereat the crowd, composed of boys and "roughs," incontinently took to their heels. According to a previous understanding among the French, all the shops and restaurants along the route had been closed, but notwithstanding their vigorous asseverations, that no consideration whatever would induce them to look upon or speak to the "Prussians," I found, on going to the Champs Elysées at half-past nine o'clock, a large number of them attracted thither by a curiosity which they were unable to resist. In walking down the avenue to the point where the main body of the force had halted, in front of the Palace of Industry, notwithstanding the vehement protestations that had been made that no Frenchman would look at or speak to a German soldier, I counted a body of twenty-five French people, men, women, and children, in the most cordial fraternization with the German soldiers. Stopping for a moment to listen to the agreeable conversation which appeared to be carried on, a German soldier advanced to salute me, and addressed me by name; he turned out to be the clerk at a hotel at Hamburg les Bains, where I had lodged during my visit to that place in 1867 and 1869. From what I learn this evening the great body of the troops were reviewed by the Emperor of the new German Empire at Long Champs, before their entry into Paris. Instead, therefore, of the great mass of the troops entering at ten o'clock, as had been previously announced, it was not until about half past one o'clock in the afternoon that the royal guard of Prussia, in four solid bodies, surrounded the Arc of Triumph. Then a company of Uhlans, with their spears stuck in their saddles and ornamented by the little flags of blue and white, headed the advancing column. They were followed by the Saxons, with their light blue coats, who were succeeded by the Bavarian riflemen, with their heavy uniform and martial tread. Afterward followed more of the Uhlans, and occasionally a squad of the Bismarck cuirassiers, with their white jackets, square hats and waving plumes, recalling to mind, perhaps, among the more intelligent French observers, the celebrated cuirassiers of Nansousty and Le Tour Maubourg, in the wars of the First Napoleon. Now come the artillery, with its pieces of six, which must have extorted the admiration of all military men by its splendid appearance and wonderful precision of movement. Next fell into line the royal guard of Prussia, with their shining casques and glittering bayonets, which had been massed around the world-renowned Arc of Triumph, erected (and with what bitter sarcasm it may now be said!) to the glory of the grand army. I witnessed this entry from the balcony of the apartment of Mr. Cowdin, at the head of the Champs Elysées. A good many French people were on the sidewalks, on either side of the avenue. At first the troops were met with hisses, cat-calls, and all sorts of insulting cries, but as they poured in thicker and faster, and forming by companies, as they swept down the avenue to the strains of martial music, the crowd seemed to be awed into silence, and no other sound was heard but the tramp of the soldiery and the occasional word of command. The only disturbance I saw was occasioned by some individual advancing from the sidewalk and giving his hand to a German cavalryman, whereat the crowd "went for" him; but his backing seemed so powerful that the discontents soon dispersed without inflicting any injury. The entry of the main body of the troops occupied about two hours, and, after that, they began to disperse into the various quarters of the city to which they had been assigned, in search of their lodgings. We were busily engaged at the legation almost the entire day, endeavoring to secure protection for American apartments and property, and which will be made the subject of another and further communication. At 5 o'clock I went to see Mr. Jules Favre, in relation to the sudden and indiscriminate billeting of the German soldiers upon the American residents, and learned from him of the probabilities of the ratification of the treaty of peace by the assembly at Bordeaux this evening, and of his hopes that everything would be settled before to-morrow morning, and that the German troops would be withdrawn from the city to-morrow. He seemed to think there was no doubt of the ratification of the treaty. He had been in hopes that it would have been ratified last night, and thus have prevented the entry of the Germans into Paris at all. But Mr. Thiers had been unfortunately delayed in reaching Bordeaux, which necessitated the postponement of action until to-day. Mr. Favre said he would send me notice of the ratification of the treaty the moment he received it, in order that I might telegraph you of the result. Starting to return to my residence on the other side of the Seine, I found the bridge guarded by French soldiers, who resolutely refused to let me pass. Soon a large crowd of "roughs" appeared and attempted to force the guard, and for a time it looked as if a sharp little battle was to be improvised. After standing around for about an hour, I was enabled, by the courtesy of a French officer, to slip through the guard and finally to reach my residence. My coachman was so thoroughly penetrated with fear of the "Prussians," that he utterly refused to harness his horses during the day, and, as I have been obliged to be upon my feet most of the time since morning, you can well imagine my fatigue as I sit down to write this dispatch in the evening.

As I now write it is eleven o'clock at night. The day opened cloudy and somber, with a raw and chilly atmosphere. A little after noon the sun came out bright and warm, and the close of the day was magnificent. Colonel Hoffman and Mr. Harris, who have been through the city this evening, have come in to report as to the situation. From the Boulevard du Temple to the Arc of Triumph not a store or a restaurant is open, with the exception of two of the latter on the Champs Elysées, which the Germans have ordered to be kept open. There are no excited crowds on the boulevards, and, what is very remarkable and without precedent in the memory of the "oldest inhabitant," not an omnibus is running in the whole city and every omnibus office is closed. Neither is there a private or a public carriage to be seen, unless a hearse shall be deemed and taken as a "public carriage;" unfortunately, too many of which are to be seen now every hour of the day. Paris seems literally to have died out. There is neither song nor shout in all her streets. The whole population is marching around as if under a cloud of oppression. The gas is not yet lighted, and the streets present a sinister and somber aspect. All the butchers' and bakers' shops in that part of the city occupied by the Germans are closed, and if the people had not provided themselves for the emergency, there would have been much suffering. The Bourse has been closed by the order of the syndics of change. No newspaper has appeared to-day, except the Journal Officiel. No placards have been posted upon the walls of Paris, and, up to this moment, I can hear of no act of violence of any significance. I have, this evening, sent you a telegraphic dispatch stating that the entry of the German troops has been quiet and peaceful, and that all is calm in Paris. I do not know that it will reach you. The headquarters of General Kamichi, in command of the troops of the occupation, is in the splendid hotel of Christina, ex-Queen of Spain. It is but just to say that the people of Paris have borne themselves to-day with a degree of dignity and forbearance which does them infinite credit. I propose dispatching a special messenger to London to-morrow to take this and other dispatches, so that they may go by the steamer which leaves Liverpool on Saturday next at noon.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, March 2, 1871. (Received March 20.)

SIR: My messenger to London, who was to have left this morning, was unable to get off and only leaves this evening. I have but little to add to my dispatch of yesterday, No. 376. At an early hour this morning I received a note from Mr. Jules Favre, advising me of the ratification of the treaty at Bordeaux, and saying that he should go to Versailles this morning and demand from Mr. Bismarck its immediate execution. I at once sent you a telegram to that effect, a copy of which you will find in a separate dispatch. I had understood from Mr. Favre that one of the provisions of the treaty was that the German troops should leave Paris immediately on the ratification of the treaty by the National Assembly. I had supposed, therefore, that such troops would have left Paris in the course of this afternoon. Such, however, is not the case, for at this hour (6 o'clock p. m.) there seems to be a larger number of German troops in the city than there was at any time yesterday. Everything, however, is perfectly quiet. The Champs Elysées, from the Arc of Triumph to the Place de la Concorde, has to-day been crowded with German soldiers, and this afternoon I saw great numbers of French people on the avenue mingling with them. The shops and restaurants in many parts of the city remain closed, but in other parts, more remote from the portion occupied by the Germans, everything is going on as usual. In driving out through the Boulevard du Temple to the Bastille, and returning by the Rue St. Antoine and the Rue de Rivoli, as far as the Hotel de Ville, I found the stores all open, the omnibuses and carriages in the street as usual, and the streets filled with people. No one could have supposed that the hated enemy of France held military occupation of the city. The day has been remarkably pleasant. In all parts of the city where I have been, in which circulation has not been interdicted by the military authorities, the streets have been crowded with people, but yet there was no unusual excitement anywhere.

Lieutenant General Sheridan, accompanied by a member of his staff, General Forsyth, arrived here this afternoon from Bordeaux, which city he left at 6 o'clock last evening. I understand from him that he proposes to remain in the city for some time.

SIR: They have gone out. Consummatum est. In my No. 379 I spoke of the ratification of the treaty by the National Assembly at Bordeaux, my notification of the fact by Mr. Jules Favre, and the apparent delay of the German troops in leaving Paris.

These troops, that is, the thirty thousand of them, the number stipulated in the treaty, came in, as I wrote you, on Wednesday, the 1st day of this month. The third article of the treaty provided that, immediately after the ratification of the treaty by the National Assembly, sitting at Bordeaux, the German troops should immediately quit the interior of Paris. The ratification of the treaty was had on Wednesday evening, and the fact was telegraphed immediately to Mr. Jules Favre. At 6 o'clock on the next morning he left for Versailles to demand, in conformity to its provisions, the immediate evacuation of the interior of Paris. The German headquarters, however, refused to receive the telegraphic intelligence as conclusive evidence of the fact of ratification, and insisted upon a regularly certified copy of the proceedings of the National Assembly. It was not until 11 o'clock on Thursday morning that the special messenger arrived from Bordeaux with a regularly certified copy of the proceedings of the assembly ratifying the treaty, and at half past 12 Mr. Jules Favre, then armed with the official documents, again proceeded to Versailles to claim the exchange of ratifications. But it was not until 9 o'clock on that evening (Thursday) that the details for the evacuation were regulated by the French and German military authorities. It was agreed that the evacuation should commence the next (Friday) morning at 8 o'clock, and terminate at 11. The German troops commenced moving out at the appointed time, marching up the Champs Elysées and passing under the Arch of Triumph, with great cheering. At 11 o'clock precisely, the last German soldier passed through the gate of the Porte Maillot, and Paris breathed free. During the occupation there was a good deal of excitement in that portion of the city occupied by the German troops, but there was no serious disturbance anywhere. Indeed, everything passed off much better than could have been anticipated. No sooner were the troops fairly on their way out of the city than the closed stores, cafés, restaurants, and hotels threw open their doors, the avenue Champs Elysée was swept and sprinkled, and the magnificent fountains in the Place de la Concorde began to play. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon (the day was splendid) all the invested part of the city, which had for two days been under the guise of a funeral pall, presented a most gay and cheerful aspect, and the people looked far happier than I had seen them for many long months.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, March 15, 1871. (Received March 31.)

SIR: In my dispatch numbered 376, I had the honor to state that my efforts to secure protection for American apartments and property, during the occupation of Paris, would be made the subject of a further communication. You will recall to mind that, on the 29th of August last, looking to possibilities, I telegraphed and wrote to you, suggesting whether you would not ask the German government to protect American property in Paris, in the event its army reached here. In your dispatch numbered 158, dated August 30, 1870, you state that "instructions will be forwarded by this day's post to Mr. Bancroft, to ask that in the event of the occupation of Paris by the German force, American property may be respected." In your dispatch numbered 190, dated October 18, 1870, you state that Mr. Bancroft was "instructed to ask that proper measures be taken by the government of North Germany for the protection of American property in Paris, in the event of the occupation of that city by the German forces." In reply Mr. Bancroft states, in his dispatch No. 143, dated September 29, 1870, that he had addressed to the secretary of foreign affairs a request that measures might be taken for the protection of the large amount of American property in Paris, upon its occupation by the German troops, and concludes as follows: "I append a translation of the reply of Mr. Von Thile conveying the desired assurances."

Notwithstanding the somewhat non-committal character of Mr. Von Thile's letter to Mr. Bancroft, Mr. Bancroft understood it, as I presume you did, and as I certainly did, that American property in Paris would be respected by the German troops in the event of their occupation of the city. As soon as it was officially announced that a certain number of German soldiers were to enter Paris, and as they were to occupy that portion of the city where the greatest number of Americans resided, I lost no time in addressing Count de Bismarck on the subject. A copy of my letter to him I send you herewith. In view of Mr. Von Thile's letter, and of the fact that French soldiers had not been billeted on Americans, I felt entirely confident that the German soldiers would not be quartered in American apartments. Although I sent my letter to Count Bismarck by a special messenger on the day on which it was written, I received no answer from him until eight o'clock on the evening of the 3d of March, nine hours after the last German soldier had left the city. A copy of that answer I inclose herewith for your information. On the day of the entry of the Germans into Paris the legation was filled by people who had charge of American apartments, and who had come to claim my protection for them, stating that the German soldiers had been billeted on them by direction of the mayor of Paris. I must confess I was somewhat surprised that the mayor of Paris had given such an order, as none had ever been enforced billeting French soldiers upon Americans.

It now appears that the mayor, or his subordinates, had undertaken to quarter as many German soldiers as possible on foreigners, particularly Americans, and spare their own people. I immediately made an appeal to German officers, in view of what I considered the meaning of Mr. Von Thile's letter to Mr. Bancroft, that American property should be respected, not to quarter their soldiers in the apartments of my countrymen. As they had no order on the subject they did not consider themselves bound to conform to the suggestion of Mr. Von Thile's letter, but in many instances, upon a statement of the case, they did not insist upon going into American apartments, but found lodgings elsewhere. In other instances they went in under threats of using force unless the apartments were opened to them, although the American flag was in all cases displayed, and the persons in charge had papers from me certifying that the property belonged to Americans, and was entitled to be respected as such. Occupying the apartments for so short a time, and upon full explanation of the ownership of the property, and upon an earnest request that it should not be damaged, I am happy to say that scarcely any injury has been inflicted upon a single apartment. I made it a matter of complaint to Mr. Jules Favre that the mayor of Paris had billeted so many of the German soldiers in the American apartments while so large a number of the French apartments had been spared. He expressed great regret at such being the case, and said the condition of things had come upon them so suddenly that everything had been done in great confusion, and that if any damage whatever happened to American property by the German troops, all such damage should be scrupulously paid for. But no claim for damages has yet been put in, and you can well imagine my relief in finding, at the end of the war, and after all the danger and tribulations through which we have passed in Paris, that out of American property estimated from seven to ten millions of dollars, the damages by the casualties resulting from the state of war does not amount to $500, excepting always the horses which were taken by requisition for food, at a stated price per pound, and not according to values. I have, in this dispatch, gone over the matter somewhat at length. While fortunately, as I have stated, no particular damage was done to American property by the German troops during their stay in Paris, you will be able to judge how far the Count de Bismarck was disposed to carry out what you must have understood to be the views expressed by Mr. Von Thile to Mr. Bancroft. The occupation of the American apartments by the German troops was but for two days, and not followed by any material damage, but, had such occupation been, as it might have been, for six months, excluding the proprietors from their apartments, and attended by the destruction of furniture belonging thereto, I take it a grave question must have arisen as to reclamation for damages sustained by the subjects of a friendly neutral power. Count de Bismarck having observed in his letter to me that the military authorities, obliged to provide quarters, could not be expected to enter into researches about proprietorship of houses, or relations between landlord, tenant, and occupant, it is evident that he had overlooked that portion of my letter in which it was stated that the proprietors of nearly all the American property in Paris had been provided by me with protection papers, and authorized to display the American flag. Every American apartment, therefore, that was entered by German troops, was known to be American property by the German officers.

I have, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURNE.

Count de Bismarck to Mr. Washburne.

VERSAILLES, February 28, 1871.

SIR: I had the honor of receiving your letter of yesterday's date on the subject of the forthcoming entry of German troops into Paris. In answer I beg to say, in confirmation of the letter of Baron Thile, of September 28, that the German troops, as a rule, respect private property, and that any of the exigencies of war necessitating a deviation from that rule is not likely to arise during the intended partial occupation of Paris.

Respecting the billeting of soldiers, how desirous soever we are to exempt or alleviate citizens of friendly states, who have their domicile or residence in France, I cannot acknowledge a claim to such exemption as founded in international law, landed property and tenements of aliens not bearing any character of extritoriality.

I also beg to observe that the military authorities who have to provide quarters cannot be expected to enter into researches about proprietorship of houses, or relations between landlord, tenant, and occupant.

I have, &c.,

V. BISMARCK.

Mr. Washburne to Count de Bismarck.

PARIS, February 27, 1871.

SIR: In view of the official announcement that a certain number of the German troops are to enter Paris on Wednesday next, to remain for some time, and of the fact that the part of the city in which they are to be quartered contains a very great number of apartments of American citizens, and a large amount of American property, I beg leave to call the attention of your excellency to the correspondence upon this subject between Mr. de Thile and Mr. Bancroft. I have the honor to inclose a copy of Mr. de Thile's letter in reply to Mr. Bancroft, who had applied on behalf of my Government to have American property in Paris respected in case of the entry of the German troops.

As fear has been expressed by some of my countrymen that German soldiers might be quartered in their apartments, I have thought proper to call your attention to this subject, to the end that such action may be taken by the North German military authorities as would carry out the purposes expressed by Mr. de Thile. The proprietors of nearly all the American property in Paris have been provided by me with protection papers and authorized to display the American flag.

I take this opportunity, &c.,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, March 17, 1871. (Received March 31.)

SIR: Affairs in Paris for the past week have not been of very great interest. The National Assembly, as you will have seen, has removed its place of sitting from Bordeaux to Versailles, and the members of the government who were at Bordeaux have all returned to Paris. The question of the removal of the National Assembly from Bordeaux excited a good deal of feeling and an animated discussion in that body. Versailles, by a large majority, was carried, over the unanimous report of the committee in favor of Fontainebleau, by the powerful and personal influence of Mr. Thiers. The assembly meets at Versailles on Monday next, and though it sits in that place the seat of government will be at Paris. Mr. Thiers will occupy the splendid hotel of the minister of foreign affairs, where he will hold his official receptions. The council of ministers, however, is to hold its meetings at Versailles. The proceedings of the assembly will be vastly important, and will be watched with the greatest interest. Its great mission will be to legislate for the immediate exigencies of the country, but it is not supposed that it will attempt to act as a constituent to form a new government, without, at any rate, obtaining a power for such purpose from the people by a plebiscite. It is quite evident to my mind that the tendency of the country is to continue the republic, as the only form of government which can be sustained in France at the present time. But political events are so uncertain in France, that it is unsafe to venture predictions as to what may happen. Since the raising of the siege, some half a dozen very violent newspapers had been established, which were daily filled with the most revolutionary appeals, and teeming with incitations to bloodshed and civil war. A few days ago General Vinoy, military commandant of Paris, issued an order, not only suppressing the whole batch, but forbidding other papers of a like character to appear until the siege of Paris should be raised by direction of the national assembly. This order of General Vinoy has been unfavorably commented upon very generally by the press, but I think it has given very general satisfaction to a large majority of the people of Paris. But that which has created more talk and comment, and is, in my judgment, of far more serious import, has been the action of some regiments of the national guard, who seized upon large numbers of cannon and mitrailleuses, some two weeks since, and fortified themselves on the Butte Montmartre. These people have set up a sort of independent side-show in opposition to the government. I do not regard any great degree of violence as probable, but it must be confessed that the condition of the lower and working classes of Paris is alarming. Each man fit to bear arms has been enlisted in the national guard, receiving for himself a franc and a half a day, and an additional sum for his wife, if married, and if he have children a certain sum for every child. But now, it having become necessary to disband the national guard and stop this pay, it is a question of the greatest gravity what is to befall these people. Every branch of industry is paralyzed; all building and improvement of the city has been stopped, and it is about impossible for the laborers to get work.

Nothing, as yet, has been disclosed as to the projects of the government for raising the money to pay off its indemnity to the Germans. There is an evident disposition in all circles to make a superhuman effort to satisfy this debt, and get the Germans out of France at the earliest possible moment. The procuring of such a vast amount of money will, I am afraid, interfere very much with the negotiations of our new five per cent. loan. To raise this money it is thought France will be obliged to offer its securities on better terms than our new loan can be had at. The French people have always had great faith in their own securities, and in their own national credit, and do not generally go abroad after investments unless they can purchase foreign securities on terms that will bring them higher rates than their own will yield.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, March 19, 1871. (Received April 3.)

SIR: In my No. 390, of day before yesterday, I alluded to the insurrectionary movements in Paris, and expressing the opinion that they would not amount to much, and that no great degree of violence was probable. It was not then possible for me to conceive that in a little more than twenty-four hours from that time Mr. Thiers and all the members of his government would be obliged to flee from Paris, and that an insurrectionary committee of the national guard would, at the moment I am writing, be complete masters of the city. Yet such is the fact. The attempt of the government to dislodge the insurgents at Montmartre, and to get possession of the cannon there installed before daybreak yesterday morning, proved a complete failure, the troops of the line fraternizing with the national guard and refusing to fire upon them. All was lost from that moment, though the government did not appear to realize it, and various feeble demonstrations were made during the day to vindicate the public authority. All day long, whenever the troops of the line and the national guard came within reach of each other, they reversed their muskets in token of peace. Without knowing the full gravity of the situation, I started about noon yesterday to make a trip into the country. On my return at six o'clock in the evening, by the way of the Bastille, I found the circulation for carriages interdicted on the principal streets. Being turned into the by-streets, I soon found my way impeded by barricades which had been improvised, and everywhere the insurrectionary national guard. After making various turns, however, I was enabled to get through the obstructed quarter. While I saw so many evidences of great public commotion, I had no idea how serious matters were until this morning, when, in coming down to my legation, I found the city full of the most fearful rumors. I at once went to the Foreign Office, and found that Mr. Jules Favre and the whole government had left for Versailles at half past nine o'clock last night. Leaving the Foreign Office and going to the boulevards, the intelligence of the shooting of Generals Clement, Thomas, and Lecompt, by the insurgent troops yesterday, was confirmed, and, as I am now dictating this dispatch, Count Sartiges has come into the legation to say that General Vinoy was also shot this morning. I am not sure but the same fate awaits Chauzy, for three men have just been here to claim my protection for a young American, who is his aid, and who was arrested with him yesterday, and both of whom are now held in close custody by the insurgent troops. The ministry of the interior and the ministry of justice, as well as the prefecture of police and the Hotel de Ville, are occupied by the insurgents. The central committee of the insurrectionary national guard has issued a proclamation, which is placarded on the walls this afternoon, stating that they have taken the power of the government, driven out the members thereof who betrayed it; that their mission so far is ended, and they call upon the people of Paris to elect a government to-morrow. The regular government of France, constituted by the will of the people, as expressed through the National Assembly at Bordeaux, having been driven from Paris, by the insurrectionary movement, and established itself at Versailles, I deem it my duty to follow that government, and shall, therefore, on to-morrow or the next day, remove thither with the legation, leaving one of the secretaries in charge here. Every member of the diplomatic corps will also leave. If the seat of government shall remain at Versailles, which is now very doubtful, my removal will be more nominal than real, for while I shall have my official residence at Versailles, I shall come into Paris every day.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 21, 1871.

SIR: Your Government has sympathized deeply with you in the trials and privations and annoyances to which you were subjected during the long-continued siege of the capital to which you were officially accredited, and where a high sense of duty, which is appreciated and commended, induced you to remain in the efficient and heroic discharge of the most difficult and delicate responsibilities that fall within the province of diplomatic service.

The President recognizes that your continuance within the besieged capital after the discretionary permission given you in my dispatch No. 226, of the 24th January last, has been from the promptings of your own conviction that the interests committed to you required the very great sacrifice of comfort; of the separation from your family; isolation from the intercourse of friends, personal discomforts, and risk of health and life. This sacrifice and these trials you have endured, and I desire officially to record the high appreciation and warm approval of your Government. You have done your duty faithfully and ably, and the President tenders you his thanks for the manner in which you have discharged the delicate duties devolving upon you, and have, on all occasions, maintained the dignity of your position and the rights of your Government.

An acknowledgment is also due to Mr. Hoffman, the secretary of your legation, for his faithful and able service during this long period of trial. You will please express to him the sense of the Department of his conduct.

Herewith you will receive a printed copy of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, by the 5th and 6th clauses of which appropriations are made to meet increased expenses incurred by the legation at Paris, (among others,) caused by a state of war, and for extra compensation to the secretaries and messengers of the legation, in conformity with the recommendations made in your dispatches on the subject.

I will thank you to prepare and forward to the Department a statement of expenses that may be fairly charged against these appropriations, to be presented in the form of a special account.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, March 23, 1871. (Received April 6.)

SIR: I addressed you a somewhat hurried dispatch, No. 394, on Sunday afternoon last, which was forwarded to Mr. Moran, at London, to be transmitted to you by open mail. The intelligence which I sent to you by telegraph of the shooting of General Vinoy was incorrect, though I had the most positive assurance that it was true. The next day (20th) Paris was very quiet, and no very great number of national guards were to be seen in the most frequented part of the city, many people hoping that the worst was over, and that there would be a solution of the difficulties in some unforeseen manner. I went out to Versailles on that day to see what was the situation there. The National Assembly had met on that day, and nearly all the deputies were present. Very little was accomplished. I was unable to see Mr. Jules Favre, and I returned to Paris in the evening. There were large numbers of the troops of the line (estimated at forty thousand) in and about Versailles, but great doubts were expressed whether they would prove true to the government in the event of a collision with the insurrectionary national guard. On Monday evening some fifty Americans gave a public dinner in honor of Lieutenant General Sheridan at the Hotel Splendide, and everything in that central portion of the city was profoundly tranquil that night. On Tuesday there was a sort of dead, fearful calm in the city, and a feeling of great uneasiness. In the afternoon there was a considerable demonstration made by persons calling themselves friends of order, men of property and character, who went entirely unarmed. The effect of this demonstration was to inspire some confidence among the friends of order, and to exasperate the insurgents. It was determined to repeat the demonstration, and yesterday a shocking occurrence took place, which has created the intensest excitement in the city. An interesting account of the affair is given by Mr. Moore, the assistant secretary of legation, who was eye-witness, and which I send herewith. In his letter to me Mr. Moore does not allude to the killing of an American citizen. On the dead body of this man there was found a passport issued by Mr. Seward to George S. Hanna, but he had cards upon his person bearing the name of George H. Taniel, and I learn he is a young man from St. Louis, who had been in the service of the franc-tireurs during the war here. I ascertained that he had been at our legation in company with young Mr. Chouteau, of St. Louis, and I went to the banking-house of Bowles Bros. & Co., this afternoon, to look at the corpse, but I could not recognize it as of any person I had ever seen before. General Read took charge of the body, and placed it in the hands of the friends of the deceased in Paris. I again went to Versailles yesterday to make final arrangements for changing my official residence to that place. I procured an apartment for my legation, and shall take up my residence (nominally at least) to-morrow. The business of the legation here is now very large, keeping us all constantly engaged, and my own presence in the city at this critical period seems almost indispensable. I shall, therefore, come into Paris from Versailles about every day, in the interest of my countrymen and of the Germans, with whose protection I am still charged, and whose situation is becoming more and more precarious. This removal to Versailles will involve quite a large additional expense, in regard to which I would be glad to be advised.

I was down in the city at one o'clock this afternoon, and everything was very quiet. The friends of law and order have been greatly strengthened and the number of the national guards who are loyal to the interests of order is increasing very rapidly. Ten thousand of them are now guarding the Bank of France, and they hold to-day the mayorality of the second arrondissement.

In my 394, I spoke of an American who was an aid of General Chauzy, and who had been arrested on his arrival in Paris. I took immediate measures to ascertain where he was, in order to have him released. I sent Mr. McKean, my acting private secretary, in search of him on Sunday afternoon last, but he was unable to find out anything about him. The man, however, turned up at my legation this afternoon, while I was engaged in writing this dispatch. His name is J. Schenowsky, and he was late brevet captain in the Fifth United States Cavalry. He resigned his position in the Army to come to fight for France, and here he became the chief of squadron attached to the cavalry division of the 21st army corps, and was placed upon the staff of General Chauzy. Chauzy himself arrived in the train from Orleans on Saturday night, and was arrested by the national guard and taken to prison. Captain Schenowsky arrived by the next train at three o'clock on Sunday morning, and on his arrival he and several others, Frenchmen, were arrested and taken off by the same guard. He was kept a close prisoner until one o'clock on Sunday afternoon, when, showing his commission, which bore upon its face that he had formerly been an officer in the United States Army, he was released. Feeling very anxious about his old commander Chauzy, who he esteems highly as a brave soldier, and whose misfortune he considers attributable solely to the character of his troops, on Monday last he attempted to visit him, and even after receiving an authority for that purpose he was arrested again by the national guard and taken to the prefecture, where he was kept in "durance vile" for some six or seven hours, and then again released. Another man, a Frenchman, who was long in our service during the rebellion, Mr. Ulric de Fruvielle, who, I believe, was in the engineer service of General Warren's corps in the Army of the Potomac, and who has been serving France since the war, was also arrested by the national guard, but I learn that he has escaped and that he has been condemned to death for "contumacy."

Mr. McKean has given me a very interesting account of his searches for Captain Schenowsky, which brings vividly to mind the scenes of the first revolution. He says that in company with two French gentlemen he went first to the prison where Chauzy had been incarcerated, in the avenue d'Italie. It was in one of the most wretched quarters of Montrouge. The streets of the neighborhood were all barricaded, furnished with cannon, and full of drunken and ferocious-looking men. Having entered the prison and stated the object of their visit, two captains of the troops stationed there got into a most violent dispute as to which of them were in authority. The one who had actual possession of the key was beastly drunk, but he finally surrendered it to the other, and they were admitted into the prison. They found there only one man, a Mr. Edmond Turquet, a member of the National Assembly from the department of the Aisne, a young and gallant-looking man, who had fought with brilliant courage under Chauzy, and received three several wounds. He was on his way to the meeting of the assembly at Versailles, and was arrested at the same time as General Chauzy. Captain Schenowsky had not been there, but Chauzy had, and had been removed to the prison de la Santé. Here they learned that on his way to this last prison Chauzy had been fallen upon by the mob, kicked, cuffed, and beaten with canes and sticks, and threatened with instant death. In making further searches for Captain Schenowsky, they went to the prefecture of police, between eight and nine o'clock at night. All the usual entrances were barred, and access to the building was obtained by a small side door, which led into the basement. There they were ushered into a little, dark, dismal room, for the purpose of obtaining permission to see the prefect. Here a most extraordinary spectacle was presented. The room was densely packed with soldiers of the most sinister look. A court-martial was being held. Three desperate and savage-looking men, in the uniform of officers of the national guard, were sitting at a small table in one corner of the room, which was lighted by a diminutive oil lamp that stood upon the table. Before this terrible tribunal was arraigned a respectable-appearing young man in citizen dress. As they entered, the tribunal was upon the point of pronouncing judgment, but in the confusion it was impossible to hear what it was. From the vehement protestations of the young man and the intense agony in which he appeared to be, they had but little doubt that his sentence was death. He was immediately taken in charge by four soldiers and hustled out of the room, probably to be shot. Finding themselves in such a crowd, they did not dare to make any inquiries in reference to what the sentence really was. Mr. McKean went to the prefecture the next day in further search of Captain Schenowsky, and while there three respectable men were brought in charged with wearing a badge of blue ribbon. They were immediately sent down to this self-constituted revolutionary tribunal in the cellar, to undergo a mock trial, and very likely to be condemned and shot. It is only by visits like these that the world will ever get an inkling of the terrible atrocities which have been committed during this new reign of terror.

You will have seen by the telegraphic dispatches, and by the newspapers I send you, the proceedings of the National Assembly at Versailles. Never did a heavier weight rest upon the shoulders of any deliberative assembly than weighs upon the body at Versailles at this time, and it remains to be seen whether it can save France. The whole aspect now is such as to inspire every man in France with terror. The state of things in Paris to-day is without a parallel in its history. Since Saturday evening last there has been not even the shadow of a government in this city of two millions of people. There is nothing but a direction, whose behests are enforced by the power of the insurgent national guard. How far this thing will go, and how it is to end, it is useless for me to predict, for you will know by telegraph of results as they occur, long before this reaches you, and I fear that which I am writing will be old news and of little interest.

I have, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, March 22, 1871.

SIR: Following your instructions, I have the honor to submit a report of what I personally saw at the collision which took place this afternoon in the rue de la Paix, between a body of insurgent national guards and a large crowd of persons belonging to the law-and-order party of this city.

At half past one o'clock, as I turned the corner of the rue Neuve des Capucines entering the rue de la Paix, I saw a large body of men, composed about equally of persons in the uniform of the national guard and civilians, coming into the last-named street, at its junction with the Place de l'Opéra. The crowd appeared to be led by a few under-officers of the national guard and about twenty or thirty armed soldiers. Whether the latter belonged to the insurgents, and were being driven before the crowd, I was unable at the moment to determine, but it is now understood that they formed a part of the law-and-order party. The civilians and unarmed soldiers carried ordinary walking sticks in most instances. Fearing the consequences of remaining in the crowd, I entered a jeweler's shop, No. 10 rue de la Paix, from which I could see all that transpired in that thoroughfare between the rue Neuve des Capucines and rue Neuve des Petites Champs, but was unable to look into the Place Vendôme, where a considerable body of the insurgent national guard was posted. Across the rue de la Paix a line of the insurgents was drawn at the junction of the rue Neuve des Capucines, and two cannon were stationed immediately in their rear. As I entered the jeweler's store the crowd pressed by, making loud cries of "Arm, arm yourselves!" and "Vive la république!" the soldiers loading their guns and the others brandishing their canes high in the air, as they surged on toward the Place Vendôme. In a moment more the crowd seemed to come to a stand, when I went through a rear door of the store and entered the courtyard of the premises. Finding the door of the main entrance to the rue de la Paix partly open I went to it, and discovered on the sidewalk General Chetlain, the American consul at Brussels, among the crowd. I beckoned him in, as another forward movement of the law-and-order party had then commenced, and returned to the jeweler's store. The crowd pressed on more furiously than before, filling the air with cries of "Vive la république!" "Vive l'ordre!" and "Arm, arm yourselves!" In about two minutes a single gun was fired, and in a moment more a general firing of small arms-commenced, which continued about ten minutes. The firing was very irregular, and did not appear to be by platoon. The cannon were not fired. Looking from the store in which I was, I saw seven men fall to the pavement, two of whom were killed instantly. A person in citizen's dress who attempted to succor a wounded man was shot down and killed. About two minutes after the general fusillade had ceased a single shot was fired immediately in front of my position. General Chetlain tells me that this shot was fired at a man already wounded, and who was crawling up on the sidewalk. As soon as quiet had somewhat returned I again went into the court-yard and ascended to the first story of the apartment, from which I could look up and down the rue de la Paix its entire length. In the window of the parlor of Lieutenant General Sheridan, at the Westminster Hotel, immediately opposite, I discovered General Merritt and Mr. Paul S. Forbes, who must, from their position, have been able to see all that was going on. Immediately after I saw General Chetlain safe and inside the court-yard into which I had called him at the moment of the second advance of the crowd, and he joined myself and a friend. We remained in the first story of the apartment about fifteen minutes, during which time we saw the dead bodies of two men lying on the opposite sidewalk. Both of these bodies were carried inside the insurgent lines at the Place Vendôme. General Chetlain informed me that a young man who was standing in the rue de la Paix, a few feet from him, was shot through the arm and had his wound dressed in the rear court-yard of the building in which we had taken refuge. Comparative order having been restored, General Chetlain, my friend, and myself left the house and soon gained the boulevards, from which place we experienced no difficulty in returning home. As we passed No. 12 rue de la Paix, we saw the body of a dead old man, whose head had been terribly mutilated by a shot, and who had evidently been shot down on the edge of the sidewalk, for the marks of his crawling to the place where he died gave sufficient proof of that fact.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Versailles, March 27, 1871. (Received April 12.)

SIR: The election for the commune which took place in Paris yesterday was a perfect farce. It was ordered by the comité central without the shadow of authority, and the acquiescence in it at the eleventh hour by nearly all the mayors and some ten members of the National Assembly representing Paris, gave it no legality. Yet if the people had generally voted there would have been a certain moral force in the result. But that was not the case. There are some five hundred and fifty thousand voters in the city. On yesterday there were not more than one hundred and eighty thousand votes cast. It is estimated that sixty thousand of these votes were given by men not in sympathy with the commune movement, leaving, therefore, the central committee at the Hotel de Ville only backed by a little more than one-fifth of the whole number of votes. Notwithstanding all this, the insurgents will claim an advantage from the election, and assume that they have been indorsed by the people of Paris. The election will bring no change for the better, but, on the other hand, the situation will become more threatening. It is now the insurgents of Paris who are endeavoring to associate with themselves the insurgents in the other cities against the government of France. A dissolution of the present assembly is to be pronounced and a decree of accusation against its members, when the "order of revenge is to strike without pity."

There seems to be little doing here. The assembly had to-day a very short session. Mr. Thiers made a speech, appealing to the members to be patient and to be silent. He denied in the most emphatic terms that the government intended to overthrow the republic. He said, "We have formed the republic and we will here serve the republic." Further, he said: "Our mission is to re-organize the country, to bring back peace, activity, labor, and prosperity, if it be possible, and then to leave to France entire liberty as to the choice of its destinies."

The government here evidently does not feel strong enough to cope with the Paris insurgents, and is waiting to get up other and more reliable troops.

Mr. Thiers told a gentleman to-day it would probably be two weeks before they would be ready. In the mean time you may well ask what is to become of Paris! Domiciliary visits have already commenced. The Père Duchêne, one of the worst of the Jacobin journals, and the favored organ of the government of the Hotel de Ville, demands the inauguration of the "policy of suspicion" and a "committee of public safety." The red flag has replaced the tri-color at the Hotel de Ville, the palace of justice, and the tribunal of commerce. Chauzy has been released, and is now here. He made his way on foot out from Paris. Henri de l'Espée, appointed prefect of the Loire on the 20th instant, has just been assassinated at the Hotel de Ville of St. Etienne. The spirit of insurrection and revolution is spreading over all France, and who knows that while the Versailles government is wasting its days in a "masterly inactivity," the insurrectionists, by their activity and audacity, will not gather power enough to completely defy it, if not overthrow it. I shall return to Paris to-morrow, and come out here again Thursday!

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Paris, March 30, 1871. (Received April 14.)

SIR: Events are marching apace. The election of members of the commune was proclaimed with great ceremony at the Hotel de Ville on Tuesday afternoon last. It was a great popular demonstration. All the national guards were invited to be present. At about four o'clock they commenced to arrive from every direction, drums beating and flags flying. Upon a platform in front of the hotel there was placed a large square table, which was surrounded by some members of the "comité central" in citizens' dress, and many officers of the national guard, all distinguished by a red scarf. The proceedings are opened by a display of flags, by repeated salvos of artillery, followed by great applause and cries of "Vive la commune!" "Vive la république!" &c. The Place de l'Hotel de Ville is densely packed with the national guard. At a given moment the soldiers place their caps upon the point of the bayonet and raise their muskets in the air. M. Ranvier, the president of the central committee, read to the multitude the list of members elected to the commune. Two other members of the committee then stepped forward and made brief speeches, which were received with loud cries of "Vive la commune!" The military bands placed at the foot of the balcony then struck up the Marseillaise, the Chant du Départ, and the Gérondéus, the entire assemblage joining in the chorus. The ceremony of the proclamation of the commune having been finished, all the battalions which had been massed upon the place of the hotel defiled before the balcony to the cry of "Vive la commune!" The scene was extraordinary. More than one hundred thousand persons were present at the ceremony. All the windows of the neighboring houses were well filled with spectators, the barricades were covered with people, and the gamins perched themselves in all the trees of the avenue Victoria.

The commune having thus been proclaimed, it met for the first time on Tuesday evening in the hall of the municipality of the Hotel de Ville. In contempt of all that has been insisted on by all liberal people, and by all journals of every shade of opinion, opposed to the régime of the empire, that the sittings of all representative bodies should be public, or, at least, there should be a full publication of the journal of their proceedings, the meeting of the commune was in secret, and although there are rumors of great dissensions in the body, no one outside knows what actually took place. The Nouvelle République, which perhaps may be considered a semi-official organ of the commune, intimates: First. That the sittings of that body will not be public. Second. That there will not be a tribune. Third. That there will be no published report of its sittings, but only a daily publication of its decrees. To-day the government of the commune seems to be fairly installed. There is no longer any "Journal Officiel de la Française," but it appears to-day as the "Journal Officiel de la Commune de Paris." This journal makes the official announcement that the committee central has remitted its powers to the commune of Paris, and that organization issues an address to the inhabitants of the city. It claims, in the first instance, as I had supposed it would, that the vote of the 26th instant sanctioned the revolution of the 18th of March. It denounces the government at Versailles as criminal, and proclaims the work it is about to undertake. Already it has commenced issuing its decrees, the first of which abolishes the conscription, and declares that no military force other than the national guard shall be created or introduced into Paris; and further, that all able-bodied citizens shall be enrolled for service in that body. The second decree exempts tenants from the payment of rent for the last nine months, and, if perchance any rent has been paid during that period, it is to be applied as a credit on future payments. All leases are canceled at the will of the tenants for the period of six months from the date of the decree. Notices to quit are to be extended on demand of the tenant for a period of three months.

The journal of the commune this morning contains an announcement of the organization of the commissions of the commune, ten in number, and among them is one of foreign relations, of which the somewhat notorious Delescluze is the chairman. There is also the ominous commission of public safety, and then there are the commissions of justice, of military affairs, of finance, of subsistence, and what is termed the "commission executive." Independent of these commissions the Paris journal states that a central sub-committee, composed of twelve persons, has been formed at the Hotel de Ville. It also says that General Cluseret is a member of that committee, and that it will have jurisdiction of all accusations of treason against the republic. The article published in the Journal Officiel, the organ of the committee central, on Tuesday last, recommending all persons to murder the Duke d'Aumale and other princes, merely because they belong to families connected with royalty, did not seem to excite any great degree of horror, as people are beginning to look upon all these incitations to violence and to murder as matters incident to the present state of things here.

The commune may be said to be complete masters in Paris to-day, as there is no force to oppose them. The barricades are beginning slowly to disappear. The insurgents are getting possession of all the public places and public institutions. The general post-office of Paris has at last fallen, and a member of the commune has taken possession of the direction of that bureau. The result will probably be that the government at Versailles will not permit mails to come into Paris. I shall not intrust anything more of importance to the post-office here. I am sorry to say I cannot see any improvement in the situation. Matters must grow worse from day to day. A placard has already been put up in the quarter of Montmartre informing the public that certain commissioners have been named to receive the denunciations of citizens suspected to be in complicity with the government at Versailles. This is probably the commencement of that system of denunciation which will soon fill the prisons of Paris. Mr. McKean was at the prefecture yesterday, and found an enormous crowd of well-dressed persons there, all of whom were looking for friends who had been arrested and spirited away.

Colonel Hoffman was at Versailles yesterday, and I shall go out there to-morrow.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Versailles, April 1, 1871. (Received April 17.)

SIR: I came out from Paris yesterday, and can see no change in the situation. The National Assembly is not concerning itself with anything which has relation with the state of things in Paris. Large numbers of troops are coming in, but the government seem to have no confidence in them, and is apparently awaiting the arrival of those who have been prisoners in Germany, upon whom they think they can rely. Some of the military men are anxious to take the offensive with the troops already in hand. I attended a reception of M. Thiers last night at the prefecture, which is now his official residence. It is a new and beautiful palace which was occupied by King William while he was at Versailles. I found quite a number of gentlemen there, and the conversation between them and the president of the executive powers in regard to the crisis was very earnest. I had but few words with M. Thiers, and found that he differed with me very materially as to the condition of matters in Paris, and he was far more hopeful of a favorable solution of affairs than I supposed any man could be with a full knowledge of passing events. Although the trains on the railroad by the right bank of the river, from Paris to Versailles, were stopped yesterday, and many of the gates of the city were closed, I found the one at the Point du Jour open as I came out in my carriage. I had no occasion to use the pass given me by the commune. This place is becoming more and more crowded, and people are flocking out from Paris in great numbers. I sleep on a cot in my legation, and consider myself wonderfully well off; but when it comes to the question of getting something to eat, hic est opus hic labor est. The scramble in the restaurants would put a western steamboat in the shade in emigration times. After a brisk skirmish of an hour I succeeded in obtaining a plate of soup, a slice of cold veal, and a piece of bread for my dinner. The worst of it is, one does not know how long this thing is to last; but I know of no other way than to take it as it comes, and to make the best of it.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, April 2, 1871. (Received April 17.)

SIR: I came in from Versailles last night, entering the city by the gate of Point du Jour without any interruption. After leaving my home to come to the legation, at half past ten o'clock this morning, I had not proceeded far when I heard the discharge of cannon, mitrailleuses, and musketry. Soon the reports became more and more distinct, and it was quite evident that fighting was going on in the vicinity of the bridge of Neuilly, about one mile and a half from the legation. A gentleman who has just come in from that vicinity says that it was undoubtedly an engagement between some insurgent troops, who went out of the city last night in the direction of Versailles, and the government forces. He was a good way to the front, and several shells burst near him. Finding themselves opposed the insurgents beat a hasty retreat, and came into town pell-mell by the gate of Maillot, and, in order to be entirely safe, they drew up the bridge and closed the gate after them. As I am writing this, Antoine, whom I had sent out in search of information, has returned, and he reports the affair much more serious than I had supposed; but in such times of excitement great allowance should be made, and one hardly knows what to believe. He talked with many soldiers, who had run away from the fight, who told him that several thousand men had left the city last night to march upon Versailles. All acknowledged that they had been badly handled, some attributing their disaster to one cause and some to another. One said they were sent off without ammunition, and that they were therefore unable to return the fire. Others said that they were assured they would meet no opposition from the government troops, but on the contrary would be received with open arms. Instead thereof they were welcomed "with bloody hands to hospitable graves." One thing, however, is quite certain, the insurgents have met with a repulse, which may possibly lead to important results. On going to the Champs Elysées at half past twelve I found a regiment of the insurgent national guard had advanced up the avenue and halted near the Arc of Triumph. On the other side of the Arc there was an immense crowd of people and national guards, all looking in the direction where the firing had been going on up to within half an hour. While standing there some emotion was created by a few artillerymen dashing along with a piece of six, and although they were yelling and brandishing their swords they failed to obtain but a feeble acclamation as they passed from the crowd or from the regiment of soldiers. The most distinct recognition was from an enthusiastic little Frenchman at my side, who cried out, "Vive l'artillerie terrible!"

4 p. m.—I have just been into the avenue of the grand army and found there a dense crowd of excited people, together with some three or four thousand insurgent soldiers and thirty pieces of artillery. They were undoubtedly expecting another attack from the Versailles troops. Twenty prisoners, troops of the line, were marched through the avenue while I was there. Many of the people cried out, "Vive la ligne!" but the soldiers made no response nor evinced any disposition to fraternize.

In my 404 I spoke of the suppression of postal facilities in Paris. It may now be said to be complete except so far as the interior of the city is concerned. M. Rampont, the director of the post, succeeded on the night of the 30th in removing his department and everything belonging to it, as well as all the employés, to Versailles. The government of the commune is very furious on the subject, as the interruption of postal facilities and all communication with the department is a great blow to Paris, and is creating much dissatisfaction. The commune is already at loggerheads and the greatest confusion reigns in its councils. Seventeen members have already resigned. I wrote you on Thursday last that the Journal Officiel of the Republic had taken the name of the "Journal Officiel de la Commune." The next day it resumed its former title, without giving any reason for the change either way. I propose to send this dispatch under cover to Mr. Moran, by the messenger of the British embassy to-morrow morning, that it may be forwarded to you by the open mail which leaves London on Tuesday next.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, April 3, 1871.

SIR: Your No. 389, relating to the protection of American property in Paris during its occupation by the Germans, is received and has been read with interest.

In it you invite my attention to correspondence that had previously taken place between Mr. Von Thile and Mr. Bancroft under instructions from this Department, which were issued in consequence of suggestions made by you.

It also appears from your letter that notwithstanding the assurances given by Mr. Von Thile in this correspondence, German soldiers were actually billeted on Americans during the short occupation of Paris, and that a correspondence had taken place in consequence between Count Bismarck and yourself.

I gather further from your dispatch that the actual disposition of the soldiers was made under the directions of the mayor of Paris, who appears to have endeavored to relieve his own countrymen at the expense of citizens of the United States who have temporarily expatriated themselves, and transferred their property to French protection to the estimated amount of from seven to ten millions of dollars.

It would thus appear that the act of billeting the soldiers on Americans was committed rather by the French authorities than by the Germans; and that before an answer was received to your representations to Count Bismarck the Germans had left Paris. It would also seem that the damage which they committed was trifling, and that no American has made complaint. The Department fully approves of the zeal and discretion with which you have watched over the interests of your countrymen in this matter. It is a subject of congratulation that the facts do not call for any further active steps.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: It is impossible to arrive at the truth in regard to the fight which took place on Sunday last between the insurgents and the Versailles troops. It was a singular sight to my family on that Sunday morning to watch from the upper window of my residence the progress of a regular battle under the walls of Paris, and to hear the roar of artillery, the rattling of musketry, and the peculiar sound of the mitrailleuses. The result was undoubtedly very unfavorable to the insurgents, but it did not discourage them, for they commenced immediately rallying their forces for another attack. Late in the afternoon they began their movement, which continued till late into the night, going out of the city in different directions. At half past six o'clock yesterday morning I was awakened by the cannon at Mont Valérien, which had opened on the rear guard of a large column of insurgents that was on its way to Versailles. The firing caused the guard to retreat into the city in indescribable confusion. What has become of that part of the column which passed beyond Mont Valérien is not known, although some of the insurgents say that yesterday afternoon it was marching victoriously on to Versailles. Two other columns of troops are also said to have passed out, and there was quite a serious fight in the vicinity of Chatillon, resulting in the retreat of the insurgents pell-mell. The day of yesterday was one of great excitement in the city. The national guards were roaming around everywhere, singly, in squads, in companies, and in regiments. In the afternoon a body of several hundred women formed at the Place de la Concorde and took up their line of march to Versailles, in poor imitation of those who marched upon the same place in the time of Louis the Sixteenth. They paraded up the Champs Elysées and through the avenue Montaigne. A portion of them passed over the Pont d'Alma, while the others took the route to the Point du Jour. Many of them wore the "bonnet rouge," and all were singing the Marseillaise. Whenever they met an omnibus they stopped it, caused the passengers to get out and took possession themselves. One old woman, sixty years of age, mounted on the top of an omnibus, displayed the red flag, and gave the word of command. How far they went and what became of them I do not know. It is very curious to read the different accounts which are given of yesterday and Sunday in the various red journals. Their violence knows no bounds. The insurgent official journal publishes a decree of the commune impeaching Thiers, Favre, Picard, Simon, and Pathuan, and also seizing and sequestrating their property. Insurrectionary journals are springing up like gourds in the night, and each tries to surpass the other in revolutionary fervor and violence. If this thing continue it is not unlikely that all the papers opposed to the commune will have to go under. Indeed, the "L'Action," the journal of Lissagaray, of this morning, openly demands the suspension, "sans phrase," of all the journals in Paris hostile to the commune. The insurrectionists, who had for one of their watchwords "a free press," have suppressed by force the "Figaro" and the "Gaulois," destroyed the issues of the "Constitutionnel," driven out of the city the "L'Électeur Libre," the "Bien Publique," the "Ami de France," and one or two other journals. A very significant note addressed by the commune to the director of the "Paris Journal," a paper of a very large circulation, appears this morning. I will give you the names of some of these new papers that have made their appearance since the insurrection of the 18th of March:

Le Rappel, L'Action, Le Père Duchêne, Le Vengeur, Le Mot d'Ordre, L'Affranchi, Le Cri du Peuple, La Révolution, La Montagne, L'Avant Garde, La Commune, La Sociale.

We have reports of great commotion in the councils of the commune. Assi, who was the head man in the comité central of the national guard, and elected a member of the commune, is now imprisoned at the prefecture of the police. Lullier, another member of the comité central, was arrested by his associates in the committee, and also cast into prison. He has since escaped, and publishes a letter in which he says the depot of the prefecture is transformed into a prison of state, where the most rigorous precautions are taken against all the prisoners. The official journal of the insurrectionists of yesterday makes the following announcement: "Citizen Cluseret is appointed delegate to the ministry of war, conjointly with the Citizen Endes. He will enter his duties immediately." As I write this dispatch at 3 o'clock this afternoon, to send to London to-night by General Starring, everything is quiet in the town as far as I can learn, yet a good deal of firing is heard in the direction of Mendon. Colonel Hoffman went to Versailles this morning. I need hardly add that the greatest uneasiness continues in the city among all classes of people. Matters cannot long remain in their present position. It is impossible for Paris to hold out against all France. The communal insurrection seems to have been suppressed in all the cities of France except Paris.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Paris, April 6, 1871. (Received April 20.)

SIR: I have not been to Versailles since Saturday. As I wrote you in my No. 410, Colonel Hoffman went thither on Tuesday last. I intended to have relieved him before this, but I am reluctant to leave Paris in these troublesome and somewhat perilous times. We still have here a large number of Americans, and while I hope that they may not be molested or have their property injured, yet no one knows what may happen from hour to hour. Under such circumstances I deem it my duty to remain in Paris as much as possible, going or sending to Versailles to transact official business with the government there.

In my last dispatch I gave you an account of the military operations up to the date thereof. There has been almost constant fighting ever since outside the walls of the city, and in the direction of Versailles. The results have been uniformly unfavorable to the insurgents, who have lost large numbers in killed and wounded, and a great many prisoners. It seems to be understood that all of their forces are to be brought into the city under the pretext of reorganization. The greatest discouragement exists among the insurrectionary population of the city, and the most desperate things are not only proposed but are being accomplished. The archbishop of Paris, the Monseigneur Darboy, was arrested the night before last and carried to prison, while his palace was plundered. One of the employés of the legation has just come from there and verifies the fact. The insurrectionary national guard is still holding possession of his palace. The Abbe Deguerny, the curé of the Madeline, was also arrested and sent to prison on Tuesday night; his effects were seized, and seals were put upon his papers. Four priests were also arrested during the same night and carried to Mazas. As you may well imagine, the greatest terror prevails among all these people who are now being hunted down. Their fate seems hard indeed. All of them remained here during the siege, suffering unheard of privations of cold and hunger, visiting the sick and wounded, and upholding the courage of the people of Paris. I am not certain as to what has become of the property of the members of the government, seized a few days since by order of the commune, but a gentleman informs me that the house of M. Thiers has certainly been robbed, and that he saw placed upon its walls "À vendre." I presume it is the same with the houses of all the other members of the government.

There is greater uneasiness in Paris this morning than I have ever witnessed. The most sinister rumors prevailed. The Journal Officiel of the insurrection publishes this morning a most savage decree of six articles. The first decrees that every person accused of complicity with the government of Versailles shall be imprisoned. The second article provides for the institution of a jury to try these parties. The third provides that the jury shall act within forty-eight hours. The fourth, that all those convicted will be held as hostages of the people of Paris. The fifth provides that the execution of any prisoner of war or partisan of the regular government of the commune of Paris, will be immediately followed by the execution of three of the hostages found guilty by the jury. The sixth provides that all prisoners of war shall be brought before the jury, which will decide whether to set them at liberty or to retain them as hostages. I send you herewith, as cut from the official journal of the insurgents, an address from the commune to the citizens of Paris, also one of its decrees, a report of General Cluseret, a note of Pascal Grousset, member de la commune, délégué aux relations extérieures, addressed to the representatives of the foreign powers; and further, a letter of General Bergeret to the executive commission of the commune. Rochefort's paper, the Mot d'Ordre, this morning, takes a very discouraging view of affairs. It says that the disasters which have befallen the insurgents are the results of the incredible folly which presides at all the military operations. He also attacks the commune with great bitterness for the secret deliberations in the silence of the night, and earnestly demands that the doings of that body shall immediately be made public.

In my last dispatch I said, if the state of things existing continued, it was not unlikely that all the papers opposed to the commune would go under. My prophecy has since become history, for every paper that has been pronounced in its opposition to the commune has been suppressed, and we now have nothing but the insurrectionary sheets which I mentioned the other day. There should have been added to that list two other journals, La Cloche and Le Châtiment. Many Americans have called at the legation to-day to procure passports, and to seek advice in relation to leaving the city. All the gates of the city are closed, and the railroads leaving the south side of the town are also closed. The Northern, the Orleans, and the Strasbourg roads are, however, open. Their depots are all held by the national guard, and Frenchmen, excepting women and children, are not permitted to depart. Foreigners have no trouble in getting away on showing their passports. I send my dispatch-bag over to London to-night, one day in advance of its usual time.

I am very much gratified to know that my official duties have been discharged in a manner satisfactory to the President and yourself. For the very kind and cordial manner in which you have been pleased to express that satisfaction, I beg to tender to you my sincere acknowledgments. The testimonial of approval of the conduct of Colonel Hoffman is well merited; and he desires that I should express to the President, as well as to yourself, his most grateful and profound thanks. I duly received the printed copy of the act of Congress, making an appropriation to meet the increased expenses incurred by the legation at Paris, on account of a state of war between Germany and France. As these expenses still continue, and as I presume you will not desire two accounts to be made, I shall, unless otherwise instructed, defer sending a statement until after I am relieved of the protection of the subjects of North German Confederation, and can furnish you an account which shall embrace the expenses incurred of every kind and description.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: It is one week ago to-day since actual fighting commenced between the Versailles troops and the insurgents. The latter still hold the forts of Vanvres and Issy, but they have no men outside the walls, except those who are in these two forts. There has been but little cessation of the fighting during the week. The successes have been invariably on the side of the government troops, and the commune forces are now strictly on the defensive. On Friday afternoon last the government troops attacked the insurgents at Neuilly and carried the barricade on this side the Pont de Neuilly. From that point and Mont Valérien they have ever since been shelling a battery of the insurgents at Port Maillot, and a large number of shells have fallen in that part of the city in which the Arc de Triomphe is situated, and in which locality a great many of the apartments are occupied by Americans. One shell fell in the avenue Joséphine, half a square distant from the legation.

and several have burst in the rue de Chaillot, between the legation and the Champs Elysées. On going to my house at five o'clock on Friday afternoon last I found that three shells had exploded in the immediate vicinity, one of them striking within fifty feet of my parlor window. Considering it no longer a safe place for my family, I lost no time in removing my wife and children to a less-exposed situation. Coming to the legation this morning, I saw two shells burst at the Arc de Triomphe. I do not know how long this business is to continue, but the communists are evidently expecting an attack, for they have great numbers of soldiers in all the streets running out from the Champs Elysées. It is estimated that the losses of the insurgents in the last week amount to more than seven thousand. There continues to be a great deal of dissatisfaction evinced in regard to the direction of their military affairs. General Bergeret, who commanded the army of Paris, is under arrest. The commune has adopted a decree suppressing the grade of general, on the ground that such a grade is incompatible with the democratic organization of the national guard. Cluseret now seems to be the main man, and the Journal Officiel of the insurgents of to-day contains three orders signed by him.

Mr. Hoffman returned from Versailles on Friday evening last, where he had been for several days looking after such matters as required attention at the legation there. He found much difficulty in going and returning. I shall probably send him out again to-morrow instead of going myself, as in the present state of things I think it much more important for me to remain here than to be at Versailles.

SIR: I regret to say that I can see nothing very encouraging in the present situation here. To be sure they are getting in a good many troops, and the morale of the Versailles army has greatly increased since the fighting began, but yet they do not seem to be ready to attack. Marshal MacMahon has taken command of the whole army. Large preparations are being made, and it certainly cannot be a long time before active operations will be commenced. It is my opinion that the insurgents are gaining strength every day. It is currently reported here to-day that the government troops were worsted yesterday at Neuilly. I fear it will be a long time and a bloody time before these terrible troubles in Paris are ended.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Paris, April 14, 1871. (Received April 27.)

SIR: I came in from Versailles late last night after having been there three days. Mr. Hoffman relieved me, and will remain there until I shall go out again. Upon my return here my impression is strengthened that the power of the insurgents is all the while increasing. In my No. 416 I stated it too strongly when I said the insurgents had no men outside the city except those in the forts. They have a large force in the direction of Neuilly and Courbevoie, and, indeed, they claim to have retaken Neuilly from the Versailles troops. Fighting is going on all the time. The city has more and more the appearance of a great camp. New barricades are being built, and cannon are being placed in new positions. The Versailles troops continue the bombardment of our quarter of the city, and the day before yesterday a shell exploded directly over the legation, and, falling, struck the lower portion of the building within twenty feet of where I am now writing. The Americans who are here are becoming more and more alarmed, and the legation is thronged by them from morning to night seeking passports and protection papers for their property. I fear I shall have to send my family away again, as a great many of the French people now consider a siege not improbable, and already the prices of living have advanced very much. It will be four weeks to-morrow since the insurrection broke out, and things have been going from bad to worse all the time. It is estimated that three hundred thousand people have left Paris in the last fortnight. All persons are either concealing or carrying away their capital. The sources of labor are dried up. There is neither trade, commerce, traffic, nor manufacture of any sort. All the gold and silver that has been found in the churches, and all the plate belonging to the government found in the different ministries, has been seized by the commune, to be converted into coin. The Catholic clergy continue to be hunted down. The priests are openly placarded as thieves, and the churches denounced as "haunts, where they have morally assassinated the masses, in dragging France under the heels of the scoundrels Bonaparte, Favre, and Trochu."

A most remarkable decree is just published in the official organ of the commune. It is no less than an order to demolish the world-renowned column Vendôme, in the Place Vendôme. It is denounced as a monument of barbarism, and a symbol of brute force and false glory, a permanent insult cast by the victors on the vanquished, and a perpetual attack on one of the great principles of the French republic: fraternity. Hence, the decree to raze it to the ground. A gentleman just in says that the firing from Mont Valerien has completely demolished the insurgent barricades at the Port Maillot, and to-day Mont Valerien is bombarding the Port de Ternes. The Arc de Triomphe has been struck twenty-seven times. The splendid hotel of the Turkish embassy, in the Place d'Etoile, has been very badly damaged by shells from Mont Valerien. The apartment of Mr. Pell, of New York, at No. 12 rue de Presbourg, has also been badly damaged. The building in which Mr. Hoffman has his apartment in avenue d'Eylau has been struck four times.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, April 18, 1871. (Received May 4.)

SIR: I have not been to Versailles since I came from there on Thursday last. Even if the state of my health had not prevented, I should have deemed it my duty to have remained here, as there is still a great deal to do in the way of protection to the persons and property of our countrymen as well as the Germans. The alarm among all classes of persons is daily increasing, and nearly every one is leaving, or preparing to leave, as soon as possible. There has been a great deal of difficulty within the last few days in regard to passports, the insurgent authorities having refused to recognize our passports unless issued or visé on the very day on which it is presented. The applications for passports and for certificates of the ownership of the property of Americans, and which we call "protection papers," have been very numerous in the last few days. The state of things existing here at this time produces strange results. By a decree of the commune, all Frenchmen between the ages of nineteen and forty are liable to do military duty, and hence no Frenchman is permitted to go out of the gates of Paris. There are a great many people who belong to Alsace and Lorraine between those ages, and within the last week no less than four hundred and fifty have applied to me for laissez-passer as citizens of the Empire of Germany. On exhibiting to me satisfactory evidence that before the war they were citizens of Alsace and that portion of Lorraine incorporated into the German Empire by the late treaty, I have not hesitated to give each one a special laissez-passer.

A case has been brought to my attention to-day of a Catholic priest, a native of Alsace, who has been arrested and cast into Mazas along with many of his order. I shall, to-morrow, make an officious application to the commune for his release as a German subject. Domiciliary visits, arrests, and perquisitions are becoming more and more numerous. All refractory national guards are seized and either cast into prison or put into the front rank in the attack. Two days ago a very respectable man living near the legation was torn from his family, sent to the front, and the next day slain in battle. The invasion of houses is no longer confined to those of official persons, or of persons particularly obnoxious on account of their relations to the empire. Many private residences have already been pillaged, and among them those of the Périere Brothers, and Charles Lafitte, the bankers. The house adjoining my own residence in the avenue de l'Impératrice was pillaged on Saturday night last, and even the personal effects of the conciérge were carried off. My own house was probably spared the same fate by my personal occupation of it. The invasion and violation of the Belgian legation on Sunday last, by a battalion of the national guards, is a fact of peculiar gravity. While the official organ of the commune denounces this act, and says that an investigation will be immediately ordered, and the accused parties sent before a council of war, the trouble is that the commune wields no sufficient authority to punish any outrage or suppress any violence.

There is no knowing what legation will be next invaded. The first indication for confiscation of private property on a magnificent scale appears in a decree of the commune this morning. It is a practical seizure of the work-shops of Paris, which are to be turned over to the various co-operative working societies. The farce is to be gone through with of a jury of arbitration to fix upon the amount of indemnity to be paid to the owners of property. Of course, such owners are not represented on the jury, and have no voice whatever in the matter. The commune has adopted a measure fraught with very serious consequences to all property-holders in Paris, and of course involving the interests of all Americans who are unfortunate enough to hold property here at this time. It is the levying of a new tax to go into the coffers of the commune. When the time comes around, if it ever do come, for the collection of this tax, there will be but few if any Americans here to determine for themselves what they will do in the premises. I shall tell all that the tax is without the semblance of legal authority, and advise them not to pay it. What will be the result in all this business, if the insurrection shall not be speedily put down, it is impossible to tell. There is no improvement in the situation since the date of my last dispatch. I can as yet see nothing that leads me to believe that the insurrection is to be speedily put down. All the talk that has been made that some arrangement was to be arrived at between M. Thiers and the commune amounts to nothing. All the concessions which it was signified would be made to the insurgents have been spit upon. It is one month to-day since this insurrection broke out, and here we are daily going from bad to worse. Day after day passes and nothing is done. MacMahon accomplishes no more than Vinoy. Paris continues to be left at the mercy of the commune, and now a siege is threatened, which, considering the actual situation, can only be contemplated with horror. The military situation is not much changed. At Asnieres yesterday the insurgents were badly beaten, but with that exception the fighting for the last few days has amounted to but little, although there has been a great deal of powder and ball wasted. Direct communication with London by the Northern Railroad is still open, and I hope to be able to forward this dispatch to London to-night.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Paris, April 20, 1871. (Received May 4.)

STR: In the way in which things go on in Paris, I am afraid that in writing about them so frequently I may be in danger of repeating myself. No one could have supposed when this insurrection broke out, on the 18th ultimo, that nearly five weeks would have rolled around without any prospect of its immediate suppression. I am certain that I never believed that it would fall to my lot to live, with my family, in a city of two millions of people in a state of insurrection for such a length of time as the present one has already lasted. I should be too happy if I could advise you that I could see any prospect of a termination of the terrible state of things existing here. Nothing comes to us from Versailles that can be relied on, to show that effective measures are soon to be taken to expel the insurgents from power and to re-establish the authority of the government in Paris. To be sure we hear rumors of attack and assault in great and overpowering force, and then other rumors of a siege; but day after day passes away without particular results further than heating still hotter the blood and inflaming still further the existing hatreds and animosities. * * * * *

Men in the assembly and out of the assembly are becoming impatient, yet can effect nothing. There is a great deal of fighting going on, always in the same places—that is, in the direction of Asnières, Neuilly, and Courbevoie. The same shelling of the city continues, and beneficial results are always wanting to the attacking forces. So far as we may be able to judge, and this thing has continued for nearly three weeks, but little has been accomplished, for the government troops have not yet reached the walls of the city. An attack in force may, however, take place at any day, of which you may be advised before this dispatch shall reach you.

An election took place here on Sunday last to fill vacancies in the commune, and although great efforts had been made to induce people to vote, there was a very general and significant abstention. Cluseret was a candidate in one of the arrondissements, and, out of 21,360 votes inscribed, he obtained only 1,968 votes; and yet the commune, in contempt of a law that has always been respected, which declares that no candidate be elected without receiving one-eighth of all the votes inscribed, has declared his election good. The suppression of the journals still continues. The official journal of the commune of yesterday morning announced that the following papers were suppressed: Le Bien Public, La Cloche, Le Soir, L'Avenir National. Two of these papers, however, have appeared to-day, in spite of the order of suppression, Le Bien Public and L'Avenir National.

It seems useless for me to speak of the condition of Paris at the present moment. Fortune, business, public and private credit, industry, labor, financial enterprise, are all buried in one common grave. It is everywhere devastation, desolation, ruin. The physiognomy of the city becomes more and more sad. All the upper part of the Champs Elysées, and all of that portion of the city surrounding the Arc of Triumph, continues to be deserted, in fear of the shells. In coming from my residence to the legation it seems like a city of the dead; not a carriage, and hardly a human being, in the streets. Immense barricades are still going up at the Place de la Concorde. The great manufactories and work-shops are closed. Those vast stores, where are to be found the wonders and marvels of Parisian industry, are no longer open. The cafés now close at ten o'clock in the evening; the gas is extinguished; and Paris, without its brilliantly-lighted cafés, with their thronging multitudes, is Paris no longer.

A dispatch-bag arrived from London this morning, bringing Washington dates to the 7th, and New York papers to the 8th instant. As I propose leaving for Versailles to-morrow morning I shall not have the honor of writing you further to go by the dispatch-bag which leaves for London to-morrow night.

SIR:

You are aware that Monseigneur Darboy, the archbishop of Paris, was seized some time since, by order of the commune, and thrust into prison to be held as a hostage. Such treatment of that most devout and excellent man could have but created a great sensation, particularly in the Catholic world. On Thursday night last I received a letter from Monseigneur Chigi, archbishop of Myre and nuncio apostolic of St. Liège, and also a communication from Mr. Louoner, chanoine of the diocese of Paris; Mr. Lagard, the vicar general of Paris; and Messrs. Bourset and Allain, chanoines and members of the Metropolitan Chapter of the church of Paris, all making a strong appeal to me, in the name of the right of nations, humanity, and sympathy, to interpose my good offices in behalf of the imprisoned archbishop. I have thought that I should have been only conforming to what I believed to be the policy of our Government, and carrying out what I conceived to be your wishes under the circumstances, by complying with the request of the gentlemen who have addressed me. I, therefore, early this morning put myself in communication with General Cluseret, who seems, at the present time, to be the directing man in affairs here. I told him that I applied to him not in my diplomatic capacity, but simply in the interest of good feeling and humanity, to see if it were not possible to have the archbishop relieved from arrest and confinement. He answered that it was not a matter within his jurisdiction, and however much he would like to see the archbishop released, he thought, in consideration of the state of affairs, it would be impossible. He said that he was not arrested for crime, but simply to be held as a hostage, as many others had been. Under the existing circumstances he thought it would be useless to take any steps in that direction. I, myself, thought the commune would not dare in the present excited state of public feeling in Paris to release the archbishop. I told General Cluseret, however, that I must see him to ascertain his real situation, the condition of his health, and whether he was in want of anything. He said there would be no objection to that, and he immediately went with me, in person, to see the prefecture of police; and upon his application I received from the prefect a permission to visit the archbishop freely at any time. In company with my private secretary, Mr. McKean, I then went to the Mazas prison, where I was admitted without difficulty, and being ushered into one of the vacant cells the archbishop was very soon brought in. I must say that I was deeply touched at the appearance of this venerable man. With his slender person, his form somewhat bent, his long beard, for he has not been shaved apparently since his confinement, his face haggard with ill-health, all could not have failed to have moved the most indifferent. I told him I had taken great pleasure, at the instance of his friends, in intervening on his behalf, and while I could not promise myself the satisfaction of seeing him released, I was very glad to be able to visit him to ascertain his wants, and to assuage the cruel position in which he found himself. He thanked me most heartily and cordially for the disposition I had manifested toward him. I was charmed by his cheerful spirit and his interesting conversation. He seemed to appreciate his critical situation, and to be prepared for the worst. He had no word of bitterness or reproach for his persecutors, but on the other hand remarked that the world judged them to be worse than they really were. He was patiently awaiting the logic of events and praying that Providence might find a solution to these terrible troubles without the further shedding of human blood. He is confined in a cell about 6 feet by 10, possibly a little larger, which has the ordinary furniture of the Mazas prison, a wooden chair, a small wooden table, and a prison bed. The cell is lighted by one small window. As a political prisoner he is permitted to have his food brought to him from outside of the prison, and in answer to my suggestion, that I should be glad to send him anything he might desire, or furnish him with any money he might want, he said that he was not in need at present. I was the first man he had seen from the outside since his imprisonment, and he had not been permitted to see the newspapers, or to have any intelligence of passing events. I shall make application to the prefect of police to be allowed to send him newspapers and other reading-matter, and shall also avail myself of the permission granted me to visit him, to the end that I may afford him any proper assistance in my power. I cannot conceal from myself, however, the great danger he is in, and I sincerely hope that I may be instrumental in saving him from the fate which seems to threaten him.

SIR: Though I stated in my dispatch, No. 433, upon whose application it was that I intervened on behalf of the archbishop of Paris, I think it better to send you a copy of the letter of his excellency Monseigneur Chigi, the papal nuncio accredited to the government of France, and also a copy of the letter of the vicar-general of Paris and his associates, both of which were addressed to me, showing the grounds upon which they based their request. I have just learned that the British embassy was appealed to in this matter, before any application was made to me, and that all intervention whatever was declined. This action, however, of the English legation, if it had been known to me, would have made no difference, for I should have considered myself perfectly justified in extending my good offices, officiously, in behalf of a man so eminent for his piety and so distinguished for his liberal sentiments and philanthropic views as the archbishop of Paris, now so cruelly persecuted.

MR. MINISTER AND DEAR COLLEAGUE: Permit me to request you to receive with kindness, in quite a confidential way, four ecclesiastic canons of the Metropolitan

Church in Paris, who come to implore your protection in behalf of the archbishop, incarcerated by the insurgents in Paris. Permit me to add my entreaties to those of the good canons, and to assure you of my deep gratitude for all you may be able to do, and to try, at least, to obtain that the life of Monseigneur Darboy be not in danger.

Be pleased, Mr. Minister, to accept the assurance of my high consideration and my gratitude.

FLAVIUS CHIGI,
Arch. de Mejren, Nonce Apostolique.

Mr. MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY: The sad events which are taking place in Paris have not failed to attract the attention of your excellency, and among other deplorable excesses which the civil war has caused in this unhappy city, the arrest of monseigneur the archbishop and the principal members of his clergy, will have been particularly remarked by the different representatives of powers friends to France.

Taking ground upon this friendship, and upon the good relations that exist between the Government of the United States of America and our country, we, the canons and members of the Metropolitan Church Chapter of Paris, such that could assemble, take the liberty to beg your excellency to be so kind as to interpose your good offices in a manner which you may think proper, in order to obtain as soon as possible the deliverance of our archbishop, and that the cause of humanity and civilization may cease to suffer in his person, doubly respectable, as well in his dignity as by his merits, one of the greatest infringements which could ever have been inflicted upon him.

Every political idea, however, being excluded, we place ourselves entirely upon the law of nations, and upon the sympathy that such unmerited treatment cannot fail to inspire, and we venture to hope that your excellency may favorably receive our request, and that you will give it such results as we may wish.

In this hope and confidence, we have the honor to be, Mr. Minister Plenipotentiary, your excellency's very humble and obedient servants.

SIR:

Before the Journal Officiel of the commune had reached the legation this morning, Mr. Malet, of the British embassy, called to see me in relation to a decree of the commune, which appeared in that paper of to-day, by which requisition was made of all the vacant apartments in Paris. As this was a matter of great importance to both English and American residents, who have furnished apartments in the city, we determined it was necessary to take immediate steps for the purpose of protecting such apartments from being occupied. We therefore addressed ourselves to M. Paschal Grousset, the délégué aux affaires étrangères.

He is a man of intelligence, education, and genteel personal appearance. He received us with genuine politeness, in the same room where I had been received by eight or ten different ministers of foreign affairs of the regular government. After explaining to him the object of our visit, he was very prompt to say that it was never intended that the decree should include the apartments of foreigners, though by inadvertence it was not so stated. He said he would have the correction made, and that orders should be given that the apartments of foreigners should not be molested; that if we should hear of any disturbance of such apartments, belonging either to the Americans or the English, and would inform him of the fact, he would take immediate measures to have the evil corrected. We thanked him for so promptly and so satisfactorily responding to our wishes, and took our leave. * * * From the foreign office I went in person to the prefecture of police, to obtain the discharge of several Germans, one of them a priest, incarcerated at Mazas. There I found a young man in charge, who very promptly complied with my request, and gave me written orders to have them set at liberty. Yesterday an American lady called at the legation to beg me to interest myself to procure the release from prison of two Sisters of Charity, (French.) This lady was herself a Sister of Charity, and a daughter of the late Governor Roman, of Louisiana. The two nuns in prison were her friends, and had been torn away from the convent by some members of the national guard, about three or four weeks ago. She, of course, felt the greatest uneasiness in regard to their fate. I told her that while I could interfere in no way officially, I would, as an act of friendship to her as an American, call the attention of the authorities to the case of her friends. I accordingly mentioned the matter to the man in charge of the prefecture, and without hesitation he gave me an order for their release also. This I took in person to the depot of prisoners at the conciergerie, and, after waiting about an hour to have some formalities gone through, I had the pleasure of seeing the two sisters safely outside the prison-walls. From the conciergerie, I went to Mazas, and there I found no difficulty in securing the release of the three German prisoners, including the priest. I availed myself of the occasion of again being in the prison, and called upon the archbishop of Paris, taking to him some newspapers and a bottle of old Madeira wine. I found him about the same as he was on Sunday, and manifesting the same cheerful spirit. I was sorry I could not communicate to him a favorable change in the situation. * * * * *

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 8th instant, No. 413, inclosing the statement of the case of Mr. Albert C. Fougen, who claims to be a citizen of the United States, in regard to the appropriation and destruction of his property in France by the Prussian forces.

In reply I have to inform you that the Court of Claims, adopting the language of my predecessor, Mr. Seward, has decided it to be the law and usage of nations that one who takes up a residence in a foreign place, and there suffers an injury to his property, by reason of belligerent acts committed against that place by another foreign nation, must abide the chances of the country in which he chooses to reside, and his only chance, if any, is against the government of that country, in which his own sovereign will not interest himself. Such has been the doctrine and practice of the United States and of the great powers of Europe, and this Government, therefore, cannot intervene in behalf of Mr. Fougen, or of any citizen of the United States, under the same circumstances.

SIR: There has been but very little change of situation in Paris since I had the honor of addressing you my last dispatch. The Versailles troops have been vigorously bombarding the forts of Issy and Vanves for the past two or three days, but they have not yet taken possession of either of them. Constant fighting has been going on at Asnieres and the surrounding villages since Wednesday, but I can hear of no results. The applications for passes by the Alsatians and Lorrainers continue to be made in large numbers. I have already given more than fifteen hundred. Yesterday I ascertained that the authorities of the commune had, from a day or two before, been requiring a visa from the prefecture of police for all the laissez-passeurs I had given, and a fee of two francs for each visa. I immediately sent to the prefect to make a remonstrance, and he very promptly agreed to waive the formality which requires the holder of a pass to appear at the prefecture and pay the fee, and to put the stamp of the prefect upon such blank laissez-passeurs as I might send him. In my No. 427 I spoke of the interview of Mr. Malet and myself with Mr. Paschal Grousset, in regard to the protection of the apartments of foreigners. The Journal Officiel of the commune yesterday contained a notice on this subject from Mr. Grousset, a copy of which I inclose herewith, and which you will perceive goes as far as any one could ask.

We are yet in the dark as to the design of the Versailles government, so far as regards the reduction of Paris—whether an attempt will be made to take it by assault or whether it will be besieged. It will be six weeks to-morrow since the insurrection broke out, and the prospect of its suppression seems as remote as ever.

I propose to go to Versailles to-morrow, and to return on Monday. While there, I shall endeavor to present my letter of credence to Mr. Thiers.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Paris, May 2, 1871. (Received May 16.)

SIR: Cluseret, having "strutted his brief hour on the stage," was suddenly withdrawn from public view on Sunday night last, having been arrested by order of the commune and thrust into the Conciergerie. When his arrest became known yesterday, it produced a great deal of excitement in the city. There are various surmises in regard to the causes of this extraordinary arrest. The Journal Officiel of the commune of this morning says it is on account of his incapacity and his negligence, which had compromised the possession of the fort of Issy. There is another report that the late "delegate to the war department" was concerned in a plot to overthrow the commune; another, that he had sold himself to the Versailles government; and yet another, that he was a mere agent of the Orleans faction. At any rate, he is in jail, and a report is current to-day that he is to be sent to a military tribunal. Mr. Cluseret has been the leading figure in the insurrection for the past three or four weeks, wielding an immense power, and I am surprised that, having control of the army as he has had, he should have permitted himself to be thus "taken off." This arrest, together with a decree which appears in the insurrectionary Journal Officiel of this morning, organizing a committee of public safety, to consist of five members named by the commune, with the fullest powers and responsible only to the commune, has created a greater feeling of terror in the whole community than anything I have seen yet. Cluseret is succeeded by Colonel Rossel, who is a graduate of the polytechnic school, and an engineer officer in the regular army. He was in the army of the Loire, and, I believe, was recommended for a brigadier general, but the appointment was not made; whereupon he joined his fortunes to those of the commune.

It was believed at Versailles, when I left there at 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon, that the fort of Issy was taken, but the papers of the commune this morning deny it, and claim that they yet hold it. There are indications of a more desperate energy than I have yet seen. If the fort of Issy shall fall into the possession of the government, the forts of Vanves and Montrouge must very soon thereafter follow suite. When that takes place, I think we may expect a breach soon to be made in the walls of the city, and an attempt be made to enter. In the madness which prevails here, I will not undertake any prediction of what will happen in the event of an attempt to take the city by assault. I found at Versailles yesterday that a more cheerful feeling prevailed in the military circles, and great confidence was expressed that in one week the government would be master in Paris. From what I see and know of the situation here, I must say I have great doubts on the subject.

I regret to say that I consider the life of the archbishop of Paris in the most imminent danger. The report that Prince Bismarck had determined to intervene to save the life of the archbishop, having unfortunately got out, caused great excitement. On Sunday last a party of the national guards made their way into the prison of Mazas, with the avowed purpose of shooting the archbishop. Most fortunately, a member of the commune made his appearance at the moment, and was able to prevent the purpose from being carried out. The regular keepers of the prison were very much alarmed, and removed the archbishop from the cell which he occupied to another in a different part of the prison. What was prevented on Sunday by the accidental presence of a member of the commune may happen any day. Having reason to believe that General Fabrice is charged by his government to do what he can to save the life of the archbishop, and charged as I am here with the protection of German interests, as well as in the interests of humanity, I have deemed it my duty to send him a confidential verbal message, by a member of my legation, advising him of the present critical position of the archbishop, to the end, if he have any instructions to intervene, that he may take such steps in the matter as he may deem proper.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Paris, May 5, 1871. (Received May 19.)

SIR: I shall send a dispatch-bag to London to-night, but shall have nothing of very great importance to communicate to you. Military movements under the walls of Paris have been more active for the past few days than at any time since the insurrection began, but I cannot see that the Versailles troops have made any great headway. After all the talk, the fort of Issy has not yet been taken, but I consider it impossible for it to hold out much longer. The bombardment of all of our portion of the city, from Mont Valerien and the fortifications at Courbevoie, was much heavier yesterday than it had been any day previous. Shells came down the Champs Elysées as far as the Palace of Industry. Of course I have no knowledge of the plans of the government troops, or what the expectation of the Versailles people is at the present moment, as to how soon they will be able to suppress the insurrection; but I must say now, as I have before said, that I see no immediate prospect of a speedy termination of this frightful contest. While the government, for six or seven weeks, has been concentrating its troops and gathering strength, the commune has been strengthening itself in a greater ratio. With an army of seventy or eighty thousand effective men, well armed and equipped, with an abundant supply of cannon of every caliber, and of mitrailleuses, with more ammunition than could be consumed in a year, with gun-boats upon the Seine, with the possession of all the forts on the south side of the city, it can well be imagined that it is no small job to take Paris at the present time, with its enceinte, and prepared, as it has now become, by its interior barricades and defenses, to resist at almost every step. And the pecuniary resources of the commune are unbounded, for it holds in its own grasp all the wealth of Paris. It only has to make its decrees, to be enforced by the national guard, to seize everything of value upon which hands can be laid. It not only lays under contribution every source of revenue, but it has now commenced an organized pillage. As I am writing, an Alsatian who has called upon me to ask my protection, as being a German subject, informs me that night before last some national guards, armed with the authority of the committee of public safety, invaded the magnificent hotel of Mr. Martin, (du Nord,) one of the richest manufacturers in France, in the rue de Paradis, and carried off everything they could find—furniture, plate, jewelry, decorations, &c., &c. The sole allegation against him was that having been a colonel in the national guards, he had left Paris and gone to Versailles. As time runs on, these outrages will increase in number, and without the warrant of any pretended authority whatever. Nothing can be more terrible than the present prospect in Paris, and the discouragement of all the better classes has become complete. I continue to have the greatest anxiety for the large interests of our countrymen here, as well as of those Germans who are under my protection, and I propose to remain to protect them as long as my services can be of any value. The little that is to be done at Versailles at the present time can be attended to by Mr. Hoffman as well as by myself, and, as the interests which I represent are still so much more important in Paris, I have deemed it my duty, disagreeable as it is, to remain here most of the time.

The subjects of Alsace and Lorraine continue to throng the legation from morning until night, seeking laissez-passeurs and protection. The number of persons to whom I have given passes now reaches twenty-five hundred. I wrote to Prince Bismarck of the action I had taken in this regard, and he has directed General Fabrice, in command of the German forces now stationed near Paris, to thank me for what I have already done, and to request me to continue to act in the same way.

I propose to go to Versailles to-morrow and to pass the Sabbath with my family near Rambouillet, and to return here again on Monday. Our last dates are, from Washington, April 21, and from New York, the day following.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Paris, May 11, 1871. (Received May 26.)

SIR: The crisis seems to be really approaching. You will have seen the announcement of the capture of the fort of Issy by the Versailles troops, and the report this evening is that the fort of Vanves has also fallen. The government, having apparently completed the preparations, is now attacking Paris with great fury. The new and powerful battery of seventy-two guns of the heaviest caliber at Montretout has been firing for the past few days on the enceinte, and particularly on the gate of Versailles. Large numbers of the government troops have crossed the Seine at Sevres, and, through the village of Boulogne-sur-Seine, advanced into the Bois de Boulogne. It is said that they were yesterday establishing breaching-batteries at a point not more than two or three hundred yards from the ramparts. When a breach shall be made in that direction, there will be little difficulty in coming inside of the walls and taking possession of Passy—in fact, of all that portion of the city in the neighborhood of the Arc of Triumph. The insurrectionary force are said to have been withdrawn from these positions, and the resistance that will be made by the insurgents will be in other parts of the city. I thought a week ago that the opposition would be greater than I am now satisfied it will be. The continued hammering away of the government troops, the surprise and capture of the redoubt Moulin Sacquet, the taking of Fort Issy, and the inevitable fall of the fort of Vanves, have created great demoralization in the city. Yesterday was a day of panic. The announcement of the capture of Fort Issy, and the extraordinary letter of Rossel, the delegate at the war department, giving his resignation, (a copy which I send herewith as a sort of historic document,) created a great commotion. The desperate wrangles in the commune, and the quarrel between that august body and the central committee, which were all well known to the public, added to the general excitement.

The members of the committee of public safety, as it was first organized, not having met public expectations, were suddenly discharged, and five other men of the most desperate character in the commune (one of them being a murderer) were appointed. Rossel, like his predecessors, Assi, Bergeret, and Cluseret, was arrested, and ordered to be sent to a military tribunal. It seems that he was put in charge for safe custody into the hands of one of the members of the commune, and it appears to-day that both the prisoner and his keeper have run away. Deleschuze, a notorious agitator, has been appointed to the war department in the place of Rossel, and if the Versailles troops do not come in, he may run a week before he finds a hospitable shelter within the walls of Mazas. Signs of demoralization and discouragement are everywhere visible. The national guard is being weakened every day, not only by its losses in actual combat and in prisoners, but by vast numbers of desertions. Almost every man who has the chance to do so with any degree of safety to himself is slipping out of the service, and instead of an army of sixty or eighty thousand, as claimed a week ago, I do not believe one-half that number can be counted on to-day. A good many think that, in the present feeling of discouragement, the government troops could enter and retake Paris without any serious resistance; but others, of an equal number, look upon a desperate contest and the shedding of a great deal of blood as inevitable. The worse things grow, the more desperate the commune becomes. One of its last acts is a decree for the immediate demolition of the house of Mr. Thiers. Pillage, under the name of "perquisitions," is the order of the day. All the churches are either closed or converted into club-houses. That immense edifice, the old and historic church of St. Eustache, has been the favorite place of resort for the revolutionary and turbulent population of the central part of the city. All the convents have been shut up, and all the priests and a large number of the Sisters of Charity have been imprisoned. All of the valuables belonging to the churches and to the convents have been stolen and carried off. The archbishop is still in prison, and his situation is becoming daily more and more dangerous. I am interesting myself officiously in endeavoring to have him exchanged for Blanqui, who is under sentence of death for contumacy for his part in the attempted insurrection of the 31st of October last. The commune has once agreed to make the exchange, which Mr. Thiers declined, but the archbishop, who I saw in prison yesterday, thinks he may now agree to it, in view of the increasing dangers to which he is exposed.

In addition to the letter of Rossel, I send you a copy of the proclamation of Mr. Thiers to the people of Paris, and also, as a curiosity, I send you some numbers of the insurrectionary journals published in the city. Of the papers I have been in the habit of sending you, all have been suppressed except the Siecle. Applications for *laissez-passer*s for the Alsatians and German Lorrainers continue to be made in great numbers. We have given two hundred and forty-three to-day, making the whole number three thousand four hundred and seventy-four, and "the cry is, still they come."

MAY 12, 1871.—Nothing new to-day of any importance. While the fighting continues very fiercely all around, we see no evidence of the Versailles troops coming into the city. The insurrectionary Journal Officiel of this morning contains a furious address to the people of Paris from the committee of public safety, charging treason and corruption in the ranks, the first fruit of which was the abandonment of Fort Issy. It says that the threads of the dark conspiracy have been discovered, and that the largest portion of the guilty have been arrested. It further says that while the crime of these men is frightful, their chastisement will be exemplary; that a court-martial is sitting in permanence, and that justice will be done. It is very probable that Cluseret is embraced among the "guilty."

The same journal contains a decree of the commune, suppressing six additional papers, making twenty-one in all that have been discontinued by the insurrectionary authority.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Paris, May 16, 1871. (Received June 1.)

SIR: I went to Versailles on Saturday last, to relieve Mr. Hoffman for two or three days, and returned on Monday evening. The situation there seems always to be the same. They are continually on the point of coming into Paris. It was so four weeks ago, and it was so last Monday. The day for the "supreme effort" evidently draws nigh, but I will have more to say on this subject in a later dispatch. In Paris I found there had been no particular change in things on my return. The work of the demolition of the house of Mr. Thiers in the Place St. Georges progresses. The hatred and rage of the commune against the chief of the executive power surpasses all bounds. The insurrectionist Journal Officiel of this morning has another decree in relation to the subject, providing that all the linen found in the house should be sent to the hospitals; that all the objects of art and valuable books should be sent to the Bibliotheque and National Museums; that the furniture should be sold at public auction, after being exposed in the sales-rooms, and that the products of the sale should go to the widows and orphans of the victims of the war, and the same destination should also be given to the proceeds of the sale of the materials of the house; and, lastly, that "upon the site of the hotel of the parricide should be established a public square." Mr. Thiers had lived in this house for nearly half a century, and it was there that he composed his great works and prepared the speeches which he had delivered at the French tribune, and there he had received the most celebrated political persons and savans of the age. There he had gathered the rarest works of art, books, and manuscripts that were to be found in all Europe. Such vandalism is without a parallel in the history of civilization. The national convention decreed the destruction of the house of Buzot, the Girondist, who had fled from Paris after the days of the 31st of May and 2d of June, when the convention placed him, among others, in accusation, but the destruction of the plain home of a deputy, not enriched by associations and historic souvenirs, was as nothing to the vandalism exhibited in the demolition of the house of the head of the French nation. As I write, 5.30 p. m., word comes to the legation that the "Column Vendome" has just fallen. Notice had been given from day to day that it was to fall at a stated hour, and immense crowds have been awaiting the moment of its overthrow. The Journal Officiel of the commune this morning announced that it would be thrown down precisely at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and as I drove along the boulevard, at the head of the Rue de la Paix at half past 2, the crowd of people collected in that place and in the Rue Castiglione was immense. Great numbers in this crowd were hoping that this splendid work of art would continue to resist all the appliances used to tear it down, until the arrival of the Versailles troops, but by far the greater number were waiting with intense anxiety for the moment when it might finally fall before a spirit of hatred and revenge which could see a triumph in the destruction of a work that had excited the wonder and admiration of the world. While the authorities of the commune had some time since protested that no Germans remained in prison, not a day passes but that it is made known to me that more or less of them are still incarcerated. The whole time of Mr. McKean, who acts as my private secretary, is taken up in visiting the prisons, and procuring the release of these persons. General Fabrice wrote me, a few days since, that four of the Sisters of Charity who were at the convent of Picpus, about which there has been so much scandal, were Germans, and that they had been arrested and imprisoned. He desired that I would have them immediately released. Mr. McKean addressed himself to the subject yesterday, and visited the delegate to the ministry of justice in relation to it. The delegate alleged that an examination disclosed that murders had been committed in the convent, and that those particular sisters, with others, were held until it could be ascertained how far they were involved. The delegate in person took Mr. McKean to the convent, and explained to him the horrors that had been there enacted. While there he saw many things that were suspicious, as explained to him, he seems incredulous in regard to the confinement of the insane women in the little boxes, about which so much has been said, and which has created such an intense feeling.

The commune has now commenced its "perquisitions" for arms and men, taking the city by arrondissements. The national guards, under arms, surround the arrondissements, and keep all persons from going in or coming out. They then make an entry into each house, and go into every apartment and every room. If a door is not opened, it is immediately forced by a locksmith who always accompanies the guard. All arms, of whatever nature, are seized and carried off. If a man is found, they demand of him "pourquoi vous n'êtes pas de la Garde Nationale?" If he does not prove that he is a foreigner, or that he does not owe service, by reason of age or infirmity, he is dragged away to some depot. There he is put into the uniform of a national guard, a musket placed in his hand, and then he is at once sent to the front.

The decrees and action of the commune are becoming more and more outrageous, and I might say ridiculous, every day. One of the last performances is a decree providing that every citizen shall be supplied with a "carte d'identité," giving his name, age, profession, domicile, &c. The manner of obtaining this card is prescribed, and any man who is not the bearer of one, is to be arrested and kept in arrest until he can regularly establish his identity. It is the duty of all national guards to require the exhibition of this card. This decree is in poor imitation of 1793, when, during the reign of terror, every person was required to have his "certificate of civism." The reason given by the commune for this decree is, that the government of Versailles is seeking to introduce its secret agents into Paris, charged with the mission of making an "appeal to treason." The decree has been very badly received by the population of Paris, and even the most violent of the commune journals criticise it severely. If it should be attempted to carry it into execution, it would tend to put an end to all circulation in the city, for every man would be liable to be called upon by some over-zealous national guard to show his papers at about every step.

The suppression of newspapers still goes on. Six or seven have been suppressed since my last dispatch. The Siecle, that old republican journal, which was the only one left of the papers which you had directed to be sent to the Department, is in the last list of those proscribed. A new paper appears this morning, under the title of Le Bulletin du Jour, and I think it is the Siecle under another name. I send you some numbers of this last.

Scarcely a day passes at our legation here without some singular incident. The man who commanded the whole of the national guard in Paris on the 18th of March, the day of the accomplishment of the insurrection, was Charles Lullier. He is a man of about thirty-two years of age, and was, up to within the last two or three years, a lieutenant in the French navy. He had been traveling in the United States, and only returned to France last October.

In the accomplishment of his purposes to release Germans from prison, Mr. McKean has had occasion to meet Mr. Delescluze, the new delegate at the ministry of war. He represents him as a most perfect type of the Jacobin and revolutionist of 1793. On visiting the war department, he found about forty officers awaiting their turn of admission to the presence of the delegate. He sent in his card, and was immediately admitted, finding Delescluze installed in the same room where we had some three or four weeks before seen Cluseret in all the pride of his power and authority. There sat Delescluze in the same chair.

The wranglings and dissensions continue in the commune. Twenty-two of the members have issued a manifesto, charging that the body has abdicated its power into the hands of a dictatorship, which is called the committee of public safety, and declared itself irresponsible, abandoning the situation to the committee. They consequently state that they will not again appear in the commune until a different state of affairs exists, but will go into the midst of their brothers in the national guard. There is no doubt that the committee of public safety has now absorbed about all the powers of the present insurrectionary government, and has become the authority of the commune greater than the commune itself. A new phase of outrage was developed yesterday. A German, who had a shop in the Rue St. Antoine, had gone from the city, leaving his goods and effects in the charge of an agent. The agent appeared at the legation to-day to ascertain if protection could be given to him. The national guard had been to the premises of which he had charge and forced an entrance. He immediately sought a member of the commune, to protest against this outrage, saying that the proprietor was a foreigner, and that his property was entitled to be respected. The answer was that the property of no man, either a Frenchman or a foreigner, who had left Paris, had any right to be respected, and would not be, but that it would be confiscated to the commune. Satisfying myself that the owner of the shop was a German, who had a right to claim my protection, I gave a paper certifying to that fact, and stating that the property, being that of foreigner, was entitled to be respected and protected; and further, I informed the agent verbally that he might tell all persons who proposed to interfere with the property, that if any damage were done I should deem it my duty to inform General Fabrice of the fact, and he undoubtedly would take all measures necessary in the case. I have no opportunity to send to London to-night, and shall therefore retain this dispatch to go by the bag which I shall send out on Friday night next.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris, May 19, 1871. (Received June 1.)

SIR: When I had the honor to address you my No. 437, under date of the 11th instant, I felt certain that before another week should roll around the Versailles troops would enter Paris. There was great demoralization in the city and among the national guard, and it seemed to me that if the government had attacked with any energy, its troops would certainly have been inside the walls before this time. Such, however, is not the case, yet the fighting for the past few days around the entire south side of the city has been very furious. Day by day passes and we see no troops of the line yet in Paris. The fort of Vanves was captured from the commune on Sunday last, and Montrouge must be at the end of its defense. Confusion increases in Paris; the commune is torn by intestine dissension, but yet the city is held, not so much, in my judgment, by the military strength of the insurrectionists as by the weakness of the attacking party. It seems impossible, however, for this condition of things to continue much longer. The insurrectionary authorities are more desperate than ever. In an official communication this morning, they say the committee of public safety is decided to blow up Paris and bury every one under its ruins rather than capitulate. Of course this is all wild talk, but it shows to what straits they feel themselves reduced.

I need not tell you how rejoiced I shall be when peace returns to this distracted and unhappy city, and when we shall have a more quiet state of affairs. The pressure upon the legation continues. As I am the only chief of a mission who remains in Paris, my good offices are sought for every hour of the day, not only by our own countrymen, but by people of other nationalities, who have an idea that I can be of some assistance to them. The Alsatians and German Lorrainers continue to come to seek my protection in increasing numbers. I reach the legation at quarter past 8 o'clock every morning, always to find a crowd of them assembled there. More than two hundred are now waiting in the street under my window, to receive their *laissez-passer*s. The whole number of passes issued by me now amounts to four thousand four hundred and fifty. As each case requires a special examination, to ascertain whether the party seeking protection is entitled to it, by virtue of his having become a German subject, you can well imagine the amount of labor that is involved. I have ten persons employed in this service, not members of the legation. When the treaty of peace shall have been definitely ratified at Versailles, I hope that Prince de Bismarck will send a diplomatic representative here to relieve me.

The committee of public safety publishes a decree this morning suppressing ten more papers, and forbidding the publication of any new journals during the war. Several of the newspapers suppressed this morning have been supporters of the commune. I believe that every paper published in Paris before the insurrection, excepting La Verité, has been suppressed. Since I commenced writing this dispatch, I have again visited the archbishop, to communicate to him that it was impossible to effect his exchange for Blanqui. I am sorry to say I found him very feeble. He has been confined to his pallet for the last week with a kind of pleurisy; is without appetite, and very much reduced in strength. He is yet cheerful, and apparently resigned for any fate that may await him.

I have just learned that the treaty with Germany was ratified by the national assembly at Versailles yesterday, almost unanimously.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Paris, May 22, 1871. (Received June 7.)

SIR: The day of the 22d of May will become an important era in the history of Paris and of France. It was nine weeks on Saturday last since the insurrection broke out, and those weeks have run wearily on in the expectation that every week would be the last. I returned to my lodgings last night at about 11 o'clock, and had heard nothing, and could see nothing, that showed any change in the situation. But it now appears that, at half-past 3 o'clock yesterday afternoon, the first division of the army of the reserve, commanded by General Vergé, entered the gate of St. Cloud, which is on what is called the "route of Versailles." A breach had been made at that point, but I am informed that it was not the expectation of the regular troops that they could enter at that time; but they pressed forward, and finding but little opposition, they were soon within the walls. The national guard retired very slowly, and such was the state of things existing, and so loose was the military organization of the commune, that it was not known until into the night that the Versailles troops had passed the enceinte. The commune was reposing in fancied security, and it was not until after midnight that they were advised as to the full extent of what had happened. Then was there "hurrying to and fro," the tocsin was sounded all over the city, the generale was beaten, orderlies dashed furiously in every direction, but all to no purpose. The national guard, becoming demoralized, began to retreat hastily before the advancing forces. The entrance into the city having been made at the Porte de St. Cloud, the consequence was that the commune troops that had been guarding the enceinte, and all the gates from that of St. Cloud clear round to the Porte des Iernes, found themselves taken in the reverse, and by 4 o'clock this morning they had abandoned all their positions and fled to the interior of the city. The gates of Auteuil, Passy, and La Muette being then left undefended, the troops of the line began pouring in through all of them. It was not until 6 o'clock this morning that I heard of what had taken place. My servant came to tell me that the troops were in, and that the tricolored flag floated on the top of the Arc de Triomphe. I hurried into the street and saw for myself the flag flying from the scaffolding supporting the machinery which had enabled the insurgents to draw up and plant upon the top of the arch five pieces of cannon. By this time, the head of the column advancing into the city and passing along the right bank of the Seine, by the Coms la Reine, was vigorously attacking the Place de la Concorde. At the same time another column crossing the avenue of the Champs Elysées, near the Arch, was marching in by the Avenue de Freidland and down the Rue Faubourg St. Honoré. At about 9 o'clock the insurgent batteries at Montmartie began shelling the Place d'Etoile, and soon many shells fell in the immediate neighborhood of the legation, but fortunately we received no damage. The fighting has continued all day about the Place de la Concorde, and it does not seem that the Versailles troops have gained much ground. At 3 o'clock this afternoon, accompanied by a friend, I took a ride along all those portions of the ramparts which have been bombarded by Mont Valerien, the great battery at Montretout, and the several breaching batteries. We passed around from the Porte de Dauphine, which is so near my residence to the Porte de St. Cloud. I was at my house for the first time for two weeks, and found it but very little injured. Two pieces of shell had entered, and besides the breaking of considerable glass, there was no material damage. Some houses in the vicinity received many shells, and several of them have been pillaged. My servants who lived in the cellar were enabled to keep out the brigand national guards, although they made one or two serious demonstrations.

In going from the Porte de Dauphine, which had not been very severely bombarded, to the Porte de St. Cloud, (more generally known as the Point du Jour,) we passed the gates of La Muette, Passy, and An-teuil. Breaches had been made at all of them, and the destruction of property inside the enceinte has been immense. Nothing could live under the terrible fire of Mont Valerien and Montretout. An English military man told me he thought the battery of Montretout was the most powerful battery the world had ever seen. Never have I seen such a "wreck of matter;" guns dismounted, their carriages torn to pieces, barricades leveled, and buildings entirely demolished. We saw along the line of the ramparts many dead bodies of the national guard, several of them in a state of decomposition. The firing was so dreadful that it had been impossible to get them away. Returning from the Point du Jour into the city, we saw additional troops coming in, and the streets of Passy were crowded with them. It is estimated that from eighty to one hundred thousand troops of the line will be in the city before to-morrow morning. In all our part of the city they have been received with unbounded joy by the few people remaining. The citizens are congratulating each other that they are at last delivered from the oppression and terror of the last two months.

As I write, at 10 o'clock at night, the fight seems to be going on as furious as ever at the Place de la Concorde. I shall continue this dispatch to-morrow, and shall hope to be able to send it over to London to-morrow night.

TUESDAY MORNING, May 23, 1871.—It seems difficult to get at anything reliable this morning. The fight continues, and always in the same neighborhood. The firing was terrific all last night. Shells from Montmartie were continually falling in our quarter, but it is extraordinary how little the damage has been. We can see from the top of the legation building that the red flag, that hated emblem of assassination and pillage, anarchy, and disorder, still flies from the Tuileries and from the ministry of the marine. The insurgents are evidently making a desperate resistance.

A gentleman has just come to the legation who proposes to leave at noon to-day for London. I therefore close this dispatch suddenly to send by him. I send also a telegraphic dispatch to be transmitted to you from London to-morrow.

No. 448.] PARIS, May 24, 1871. (Received June 7.)

SIR: My narration of the prodigious events which have been transpiring in Paris since Sunday last closed at noon of yesterday. As it was impossible to reach those parts of the city in which the fighting was going on, I only knew that the contest was raging with unparalleled fury in the central portion of it. At half past 5 or 6 o'clock of yesterday it was evident that an immense fire had broken out at the chancellerie of the legion of honor. Soon we saw the smoke arising in other parts of the city, showing but too plainly that the terrible threats of the commune of a general conflagration had commenced to be carried out. I was at the headquarters of Marshal McMahon, at Passy, at about 9 o'clock in the evening, for the purpose of soliciting the sending of troops at the earliest moment for the release of the Archbishop of Paris and other hostages in the prison of Mazas, and there I was told by an officer of the staff that the palace of the Tuileries was on fire. On my return I could discover nothing, and I hoped that he had been mistaken. At 1 o'clock this morning I was awakened by a friend, who told me that the palace was all in flames. I hurried to a position from which I had a full and complete view of the fire. It was a starlight night, calm and beautiful. An insurgent battery, which had been for twenty-four hours shelling our part of the town, was still sending its bombs into the immediate neighborhood of the legation every fifteen minutes. The roar of other cannon, the "crépitement" of the mitrailleuses and the sharp rattling of the chassepots fell upon the still of the night. The lurid flames rising from the burning palace lighted up half the heavens, and the whole scene was the most terrible I had ever witnessed. To the fire of the Tuileries were added other conflagrations, the ministry of finance, the buildings of the Rue Royal, and other fires which seemed just started. At one time it appeared to those of us who were watching the progress of the conflagration that the "Hospital des Invalides" was certainly on fire, but as the night wore on, daylight disclosed its gilded dome intact, and we discovered, to our great gratification, the fire was a short distance beyond in the same direction. At 5 o'clock this morning I sent a messenger to Versailles with a telegraphic dispatch for you in regard to what had taken place. Coming to the legation at 9 o'clock, I heard that the Versailles troops had captured the strong positions at the Place de la Concorde and the Place Vendome. I at once took my carriage and proceeded in that direction, passing down the Boulevard Haussman to the Place St Augustin, and the Caserne Pepiniere. The insurgents had occupied the Caserne, and were driven out after a fight of about two hours, but it was at the foot of the Boulevard Malesherbe, behind the Madeline, and at the junction of several streets, that the insurgents had strong barricades; in fact, the key of their position was there, for if the Versailles troops could once pass that point they could easily take the great barricades in the Rue Royale, the Rue de Rivoli, and the Place Vendome, in the reverse, and here the most desperate fighting took place for a period of nearly thirty-six hours. The neighborhood presented a most dreadful appearance this morning. The sidewalks of the splendid Boulevard Malesherbe were filled with horses, baggage-wagons, and artillery carriages. The houses had been more or less torn with shot and shell; the trees were all cut to pieces by the fire of the artillery and musketry, and their branches filled the street. A dead national guard was lying in an excavation for a cellar near by. In a small open space in the next street was the blood of two soldiers of the line, who had been summarily shot as deserters. Proceeding further, I reached the front of the church of the Madeline, at the head of the Rue Royale, and many of the buildings of that great thoroughfare were in flames, and others seemed literally to have been torn in pieces by the fire of the cannon and musketry. Going further up the Boulevard Capucines, I found many of the buildings completely riddled, and upon the sidewalk was a dead national guard, and in a side street, a short distance from there, yet another dead body of the insurgent guard, people passing by and looking on them with apparent satisfaction. I went to the Place Vendome, which had been evacuated during the night, and there for the first time saw the great column lying in the position in which it had fallen. The insurgents had not time to remove the bronze, which is now to be made use of in the speedy restoration of the column; the national assembly having decreed that it shall at once be restored. The Place de la Concorde was evacuated at the same time, the insurgents retreating in the direction of the Hotel de Ville and up the rue Lafayette. From the Place Vendome I went to the rue de Rivoli, and proceeded cautiously toward the Tuileries, under the arcade. The Tuileries building was still burning, and the flames were bursting out in a part of the building where they had not before reached. It seemed that it would be impossible to save the Louvre, but I hear, as I write, that its preservation is secured, with all its treasures of art and its historic interest. During the entire afternoon the fires have been raging in many directions, and from the legation the sound of battle can be distinctly heard, but it is almost impossible to procure any reliable intelligence in regard to what is taking place. Most certainly something more definite can be ascertained in the morning.

THURSDAY, May 25.—When I closed my dispatch last night it was fire and battle. It is the same this morning. There were frightful burnings all the night. The great Hotel de Ville, with all its traditions and souvenirs of history, exists no longer. The Cour des Comptes, the Court of Cassation, the Prefecture of Police, and the celebrated old prison of the Conciergerie, have shared the same fate. All has been the work of organized incendiarism, and the insurrectionists have done everything in their power to destroy Paris. If the entry of the troops had been delayed much longer, they would certainly have succeeded. The commune had already made "perquisitions" for all of the petroleum in the city, and prepared petroleum-boxes and other means of firing the place. Bands of men, women, and children were organized to do this diabolical work. During the past two days immense numbers of these persons have been detected in distributing these boxes, and in every case the most summary vengeance has been inflicted upon them, without regard to age, sex, or condition. An employé of this legation counted, this afternoon, on the Avenue de Autin, the dead bodies of eight children, the eldest not more than fourteen years of age, who had been seized while distributing their incendiary boxes, and shot on the spot. The state of feeling now existing in Paris is fearful beyond description. Passing events have filled the whole population opposed to the commune with horror and rage. Arrests are made by the wholesale, of the innocent as well as the guilty. Last night four Americans—two gentlemen and two ladies—innocent as yourself of all complicity with the insurrection, were seized, while dining at a restaurant, and marched through the streets to one of the military posts. They sent word to me as soon as possible of their arrest, and I lost no time in going to their relief. I addressed myself to General Donai, who, upon my statement, immediately ordered their release. He expressed much regret at what had happened; but said that, in the existing excited state of feeling, it was impossible to prevent the arrest of innocent persons; that if, unfortunately, the arrest of any other Americans occurred, they would be immediately released upon my application, unless charged with crime for which they could be justly and legally held. I went down in the city this afternoon to see for myself what was the progress of events. Very little has been done towards putting matters into shape in the parts of the city already captured from the insurgents. The barricades everywhere remain. The fire was still raging in the Rue Royale. The ministry of finance is completely consumed, with every record and paper—a loss that is utterly incalculable. The insurgents having been driven beyond the Place Bastille, I was able to go much farther than I went yesterday. I passed up the Rue de Rivoli by the smoking ruins of the Tuileries, and had the inexpressible pleasure of seeing for myself that the Louvre, with all its untold and incalculable treasures, had been preserved. As I continued up the street it seemed as if I were following in the track of an army. Reaching the Hotel de Ville, I found the neighborhood had all the appearance of an intrenched camp. Immense barricades were on every street leading into the square. But I am told that the insurgents abandoned it without a fight, finding themselves upon the point of being hemmed in. But before leaving, they applied the torch to that pile so interwoven with the history of Paris and of France, and the pride of all Frenchmen for centuries gone by. Now there was nothing but a mass of smoldering ruins. Two squares of magnificent buildings on the lower side of the Place de l'Hotel de Ville had also been destroyed. It was indeed a sad sight to behold. There was a regiment of the troops of the line on the quay, but scarcely another soul was to be seen in the entire neighborhood. Eight dead bodies of the insurgents, partially consumed by fire, lay on the ground right in front of what was the main entrance into the building, and presenting the most horrible appearance, and sad sights everywhere. At the Place de l'Opera, I saw some five hundred prisoners, men, women, and children, who were being driven to Versailles. There was a squad of cavalry marching in the front and in the rear of them, and foot soldiers marching on either side. I must say they were the most hideous and sinister-looking persons I ever saw in the whole course of my life. The sight of the prisoners excited the people to the highest pitch of indignation, and every opprobrious epithet was heaped upon them, and the escort alone prevented violence from being inflicted upon them on the spot. An officer told me this afternoon that the order was to shoot every man taken in arms against the government. I do not vouch for the truth of what he told me, but I do know that large numbers of the national guard and many others, caught in some criminal act, have been summarily executed. I have had great fears that the Prussian embassy might be burned. I learned to-day that suspicious persons were lurking about the premises, and I immediately addressed a note to Marshal McMahon advising him of my apprehensions, and asking him to detail a guard to protect the building. He answered me promptly that my request had been complied with. It is with no small degree of satisfaction that I am able to inform you that during all these horrible excesses in Paris for the past ten weeks no material damage has been done to the property of Americans, neither to the property of the Germans, with whose interests I still continue to be charged. Some few Americans have been arrested, but all were immediately released on my application. As I have written you before, the number of Germans and Alsatians whose release from prison I have obtained is quite large. Among the last persons to be released were eleven German nuns who had been seized at the convent of Picpus.

After being set at liberty they came to the legation in a body, to thank me for my efforts in their behalf. What I feared most was the robbery of our countrymen under the pretext of taxes. Many demands for the payment of taxes to the commune had been made upon Americans, but, as I have before advised you, I told all who consulted me on the subject not to pay, but take the chances. However, the machinery for collecting these taxes had just been got ready, and the day of the 25th instant was the time it was to be put into operation. Armed with mandates from the committee of public safety, the national guards would have gone everywhere, and demanded the payment of a certain sum as a tax upon all apartments, houses, business establishments, &c. If the amount was not paid by the proprietor, or, in his absence, his agent or concierge, the most valuable things would have been seized and carried off. You will see, therefore, that the entry of the Versailles troops on the 22d was just in time to prevent this organized pillage. The only newspaper I have been able to get since the entry of the troops is the Verite, two copies of which I send you, the last number appearing Wednesday morning, although dated to-day. No paper has appeared to-day, as far as I can learn, except a little sheet called the Constitution, which is out this evening. There is not an omnibus running in the whole city, and scarcely a cab can be found. No persons, except such as have a diplomatic character, or their bearers of dispatches, are permitted to leave Paris. I have not time now to speak more fully of the scenes of carnage, fire, and blood, of which Paris has been the theater for the last four days. They are without parallel in all its history. What took place on the days of July, 1830, when Charles the Tenth was overthrown; the days of February, 1848, when Louis Philippe was chased from the throne, and the subsequent days of the insurrection in June of the same year, was mere child's play as compared with the events of the present week. The fighting has been long, desperate, and persistent. The insurrectionists have fought at every step with the fury of despair. Even as I write, at the hour of midnight, the contest is not yet ended, for I hear the booming of the cannon beyond the "Place de la Bastille." The government troops have displayed great bravery, and have never for a moment recoiled before the formidable and deadly barricades of the insurgents. They have shown the spirit of the old French army.

FRIDAY NOON, May 26, 1871.—The fighting is still going on this forenoon in the remote parts of the city, and new fires have broken out. I have no news of the fate of the archbishop of Paris, but the general belief is that all the hostages have been shot. The Prussian embassy is all safe and intact. My messenger for London is waiting, and I must close this dispatch.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Versailles, May 26, 1871. (Received June 14.)

SIR: I do not know whether Mr. Washburne, who is at Paris, will be able to send a messenger to-day to London as usual. Very strict orders have been given to permit no one to pass the gates. I think it well therefore to inform you, that when I last heard from the legation, on the evening of the 24th, that part of the city in which it is situated was perfectly tranquil and safe. The office had been struck by a shell, but no one had been hurt. According to the last reports from Paris, the insurrection is now confined to Belleville and to Fort d'Ivey. Everywhere else it has been crushed, and in the strongholds referred to it can hold out but a few hours. The vandalism of the insurgents in destroying the public buildings they could not hold has never been equaled in history. Happily the Louvre and Bibliothèque Nationale, the most valuable of them all, have been saved. The Tuileries, the Hotel de Ville, and others of inferior historic interest, have perished.

Petroleum is now the madness of the hour. Quiet housekeepers are stopping up the vault openings in the pavement, on the ridiculous pretext that bands of women are roaming through the streets pouring petroleum into the vaults and then setting fire to it.

You will, no doubt, receive full information from Mr. Washburne of all that is passing in Paris as soon as the gates are open. It is expected that this will be in a day or two, and that early next week trains will be running to and from Paris as usual.

SIR: Lieutenant Colonel Count Waldersee, the new chargé d'affaires for the German Empire near the French government, arrived in Paris yesterday, and to-morrow will relieve me of the duties which I have discharged for the past eleven months, as connected with the protection of German subjects in France. He brought with him a letter from the Prince Bismarck, a copy of which I inclose herewith. I shall have the honor, at a subsequent time, of addressing you another and further communication upon this subject. I will only say that I feel great satisfaction in being relieved from the duties I have performed in this connection. I hope now to be able to leave for Carlsbad by the last of the present month.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that, in order to restore the regular diplomatic intercourse between the German Empire and French Republic, I have appointed Lieutenant Colonel Count Waldersee, the bearer of the present letter, chargé d'affaires at Paris preparatory to the nomination of a representative of His Majesty the Emperor.

His Majesty has commanded me to convey to your excellency the grateful acknowledgment for the zeal and kindness you have devoted to the interests of the German residents under circumstances of extraordinary difficulty, and with corresponding sacrifice of time and personal comfort. I beg to add the reiterated expression of the sense of obligation I shall ever preserve for the uniform promptness and courtesy I have experienced from you in a business connection of nearly a twelvemonths' duration.

VERSAILLES, MONTREUIL, 2 Rue de la Vielle Église, April 18, 1871.

SIR AND MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Permit me to request you confidentially to receive kindly the four ecclesiastical canons of the Metropolitan Church of Paris, who come to beg your protection in favor of their archbishop, imprisoned by the insurgents at Paris. Permit me to join my prayers to those of these good canons, and to assure you of my great gratitude for all that you think you can do to endeavor, at least, to obtain that the life of Monseigneur Darboy shall run no danger.

Receive, &c., &c.,

FLAVIUS CHIGI,
Archbishop of Myre, Apostolic Nuncio.

SIR: The sad events which are passing in Paris have not failed to attract the attention of your excellency. Among other deplorable excesses to which civil war has given birth in this unhappy city, the arrest of monseigneur the archbishop, and of the principal members of his clergy, has been particularly remarked by the different representatives of the powers friendly to France. Relying upon this friendship and on the good relations which exist between the governments of the United States of America and our country, we, canons and members of the Metropolitan Chapter of the church of Paris, who have been able to meet together, take the liberty to beg your excellency to have the goodness to interpose your good offices, in such manner as you shall judge best, to obtain the deliverance of our archbishop as soon as possible; that the cause of humanity and of civilization may cease to suffer in his person, doubly respectable by his dignity and his merits—one of the greatest injuries it has ever received.

No political object being connected with this step, and placing ourselves solely on the ground of the laws of nations, and of the sympathy which so undeserved a treatment cannot fail to inspire, we dare to hope that your excellency will receive our movement favorably, and that you will do in this connection all that we could desire.

In this hope and this confidence, we have the honor to be, &c., &c., &c.,

I cannot do better than to send you an account of what was done, which I have written to my Government. I send you, therefore, inclosed herewith, and confidentially, a copy of a dispatch I sent to Washington last night. After reading my dispatch I will thank you to inclose it to me, No. 7 rue de Mademoiselle, Versailles. I inclose herewith also a letter from the archbishop to the Abbé Lagarde. I shall hope to see you further in regard to the archbishop when I shall next be at Versailles.

Archbishop Darboy to Mr. Washburne.

I beg the minister of the United States to accept my thanks for the kind visit he has had the goodness to make me in my prison, and to send the inclosed letter to its destination by his secretary, who is going to Versailles.

The address of the person to whom it is written will be found through his excellency the apostolic nuncio, or the bishop of Versailles. If the person to whom the letter is addressed has already started for Paris, the secretary of the minister can destroy it, or bring it back on his return to Paris.

Confidential.]

VERSAILLES, MONTREUIL, April 25, 1871.

SIR AND DEAR COLLEAGUE: Truly I do not know how to thank you for all that you have had the kindness to do to aid the worthy archbishop of Paris. You have done more than I could have hoped, notwithstanding the confidence with which I was inspired, knowing the sentiments of humanity and of pity of your heart, and the generous nation you represent so worthily in France; and I am sure that the steps you will take with the men into whose hands lies the fate of Mr. Darboy, will not fail to produce the most favorable result which it is possible to hope for under present circumstances.

I have read with great interest, and with sentiments of profound gratitude towards yourself, sir, the despatches you have had the kindness to communicate to me in confidence and with reservation, and I hasten to send them back herewith, with all my thanks to the legation of the United States at Versailles, according to the direction in your honored letter of yesterday.

Colonel Hoffman has informed me that you will soon be at Versailles, and I have begged him to inform me of your arrival, that I may, without delay, call to express to you all my gratitude and my respect.

In the meantime, please accept, for the present, the renewed assurance of my sentiments of gratitude, and of the distinguished and affectionate consideration with which I am, &c.,

FLAVIUS CHIGI,

Archbishop of Myre, Apostolic Nuncio.

APRIL 28, 1871.

I beg his excellency the minister of the United States to receive the homage of my respect, and to have the goodness to send the inclosed letter to Versailles.

The address of Mr. LaGarde, in case the representative of his excellency does not know it, can be found either at the residence of the nuncio or at the Episcopal palace at Versailles.

I beg his excellency the minister of the United States to receive the homage of my respect, and to have the goodness to permit me to have recourse to his kindness to send the inclosed letter to Versailles.

I shall be very grateful to him for it.

Archbishop of Paris.

The address of Mr. La Garde is, without doubt, known to the representative of Mr. Washburne at Versailles.

In any case it can be had from the nuncio, or from the bishop of Versailles."

Memorandum of the Archbishop of Paris.

It is not known precisely what answer Mr. Thiers has given to the proposition made to him for the release of Blanqui, with a view to obtain in exchange the release of the archbishop of Paris, and of four or five persons held like him. The vicaire general Lagarde, who went to Versailles to attend to this matter, has sent here only vague and incomplete reports on the results of this step, but as he does not return, it is believed that all hope of success is not lost.

In default of precise information, it is conjectured that the government fears that it will appear to be treating with the commune, if it accepts the proposed exchange, and in addition, possibly regards the liberation of Blanqui as dangerous, in the midst of the present excitement. Now, parties who are interesting themselves either for Mr. Blanqui, or for the archbishop, desire earnestly that the following considerations should be submitted to Mr. Thiers, who will appreciate them in his wisdom and humanity, and it is believed they would have great weight if presented to Mr. Thiers by his excellency the minister of the United States.

The question is not between the commune and the government, but between the government and the parties above mentioned. The latter have arranged that the archbishop, and four or five other prisoners, to be designated by Mr. Thiers, shall be sent to Versailles, if they can have the assurance that Mr. Blanqui will receive his liberty. This assurance is to be guaranteed verbally by the minister of the United States, he being verbally authorized by Mr. Thiers. As to the liberation of Mr. Blanqui, instead of ordering it officially, would it not be possible to accomplish it by allowing him the facility to escape, with the understanding, of course, that he will not be retaken unless it be for the commission of some new offense? In this manner the government would have nothing whatever to do with the commune, some one, apart from the commune, would receive the assurance given by Mr. Washburne, and all would be arranged.

There could be no serious danger in liberating Mr. Blanqui, even in the present condition of things.

The resistance of Paris is a military resistance entirely, and the presence of Mr. Blanqui could add nothing to it.

The political and social ideas which are represented by the commune are not in themselves, nor in their application, those of Mr. Blanqui, and if he should associate himself with the commune it would not be a bond of union between the members which compose it, but rather a new element of discord.

At all events it does not appear that a settlement of the present conflict will be brought about through the political or social theories or policy of the commune, but only by the force of arms. It could therefore be no embarrassment if Mr. Blanqui were set at liberty, even though he should return to Paris. Whether he would do so or not is unknown.

If it were known precisely for what reasons Mr. Thiers hesitates to act favorably upon the proposition of exchange which has been submitted to him, it might be possible to attenuate their force, and to bring him perhaps to a better conclusion. Besides, he should not remain in ignorance that the life of the archbishop is seriously menaced. In saving him, Mr. Thiers, we believe, would give great satisfaction to the French clergy, and particularly to the episcopate.

Memo.—Written in the prison of Mazas, May 10, 1871.

E. B. W.

VERSAILLES, MONTREUIL, May 12, 1871.

SIR AND DEAR COLLEAGUE: Mr. McKean handed to me this morning the letter you did me the honor to address to me yesterday, as well as the copy of the memorandum written by the archbishop of Paris, and I also received only a few days ago, through the post office and much behind time, the other letter which you also had the kindness to write me on the 29th of April, to which were joined two letters of Mr. Darboy for the Abbé Lagarde, to whom I handed them immediately. This morning I sent confidentially to Mr. Thiers the memoir of the archbishop, and I have begged of him a confidential reply, that I may send it to you to be delivered to Mr. Darboy, through your kindness. If I should receive the reply, as has been promised me, by 3 o'clock, I shall hasten to transmit it to you, begging you to make it known to monseigneur the archbishop. In the mean time, it is well that you should know how matters stand.

Mr. Thiers, having received some time ago the letter brought by Abbé Lagarde, submitted, first to the council of the ministers, and then to the commission of the fifteen deputies whom he has associated with himself, the question of the exchange of Blanqui on one side and the archbishop and four or five ecclesiastics on the other, and all unanimously refused their consent to such an arrangement. After this, Mr. Thiers declared that, notwithstanding the desire he felt to see the archbishop at liberty, as well as the Abbé Duguerry, who was his personal friend, he could not take upon himself to carry out the exchange. He added that Mr. Blanqui was to be submitted to a new trial, and if he was condemned to death, he, as President, would have the power to spare his life; but as for setting him free, above all before he was tried, he could not do it; this would be beyond his power as chief of the executive power. This reply, addressed to Mr. Darboy more than two weeks ago, was drawn up, and Mr. Lagarde was requested to carry it to the archbishop in a sealed envelope as it was. But Mr. Lagarde refused, and still refuses, giving as the motive of his refusal that he cannot carry a reply in a sealed letter to a letter which he brought unsealed. Thus the letter of Mr. Thiers remains still at the ministry "des cultes," and they are unwilling to send it except by Mr. Lagarde, who, on his side, does not wish to take charge of it.

Mr. Thiers desires also to assure me that he has the conviction that neither the life of the archbishop of Paris, nor those of the other ecclesiastics who are at this moment in prison, are in danger.

For my part I do not share, I confess, the confidence of the President on this subject.

FOUR O'CLOCK.—I have just returned from the palace of the prefecture. Mr. Thiers read attentively the copy of the memoir of which I have spoken above, and he repeated, after mature reflection, the same observations which he made in his reply to the letter of Mr. Darboy. He decided not to set Blanqui at liberty, but apparently to spare his life if he should be condemned to death. This is all his powers permit him to do. Besides, it would never be possible for him to sanction an iniquity consisting in seizing hostages among distinguished people in order to set free scamps and culprits by lending himself to such plans of exchange, more or less covered up. He repeated the assurance that the life of the archbishop ran no danger whatever, and he ended by saying that in about two days the troops would be in Paris, and all danger would disappear.

This, my dear colleague, is the answer which I can give you, and regret with you that it is not more in accordance with the desire of the archbishop and with your charitable and generous design. In terminating, permit me to communicate to you, in accordance with the orders his eminence Cardinal Antonelli has transmitted to me, the sentiments of gratitude of the Holy Father the Pope, and of the cardinal, for all that you have done and all that you may do in favor of the archbishop, so unjustly tortured.

Accept, sir, also, with my sincere and affectionate thanks, the renewed assurance, &c., &c., &c.,

FLAVIUS CHIGI,
Archbishop of Myre, Apostolic Nuncio.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Mr. McKean, my private secretary, will call on you in relation to the archbishop. He will hand you a copy of a memorandum made by him on the subject of an exchange for Blanqui. I need not assure you that I shall be very glad to do anything that is proper in this matter—officially, of course—to facilitate any arrangement that might be made. Mr. McKean visited the archbishop with me yesterday, and can explain to you fully in regard to him.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURN.

Mr. Washburne to Mr. W. B. Norcott.

PARIS, May 11, 1871.

DEAR SIR: I sent to-day a copy of the memorandum of the archbishop of Paris, in regard to his being exchanged for Blanqui, to Monseigneur Cligi, and told him that I would gladly do anything which would be proper, but of course officiously. I think the archbishop put the question very fairly, and I hope his memorandum will be brought to the attention of Mr. Thiers. I can well understand the reasons the Versailles government might oppose to the proposition for an exchange, but it seems to me they might be got over in this case, where the life of such a man as the archbishop is in danger. The French government could lose nothing in placing Blanqui in liberty, and by so doing would probably save the life of the archbishop. I consider his life in the most imminent danger, and for that reason, and with a desire to assuage his sufferings in prison, I have been willing to lend all my good offices in the matter. In your visit to Versailles I hope you will be able to secure the consent of Mr. Thiers to the exchange. I believe the commune have agreed to release several prisoners, including M. Beaujon, besides the archbishop, in case Beaujon could be put in liberty. That might be an additional consideration with Mr. Thiers.

I am, &c.,

E. B. WASHBURNE.

His Excellency the MINISTER OF THE UNITED STATES in France:

SIR: I know what interest your excellency has shown in favor of Monseigneur Darboy, archbishop of Paris, and I know what gratitude the friends of the Catholic Church will feel toward you for it. Permit me, sir, in invoking this interest, to beg your excellency to take a step which will be, without doubt, of service to Monseigneur Darboy. The celebrities of the bar of Paris having left the capital, monseigneur has had the goodness to choose me as his counsel. I consequently asked of the Citizen Raoul Regault, procureur of the commune, the permission required to visit him at the prison of Mazas. I have had two consultations with monseigneur. These interviews enabled me to take certain steps having a character of public interest, and I had hoped that they might be renewed from time to time, when the commune of Paris suppressed all the permissions which had been accorded to visit the priest-prisoners, and authorized the Citizen Ferré, one of its members, to grant henceforth such authorizations as he should judge to be proper. Notwithstanding my earnest request to him, notwithstanding my character of counsel, which should have prevented a refusal—for a prisoner cannot be deprived, without barbarity, of advice of counsel—I have been able to obtain nothing from Mr. Ferré, who exhibits an unyielding severity. I have, therefore, the honor, appealing to my sincere devotion to monseigneur the archbishop, (and without this being suggested to me by any one,) to beg your excellency to consent to employ your great influence to obtain from Citizen Ferré the permission which he refuses me without giving any reason. I ask pardon of your excellency for importuning you in this manner, and I hope that you will excuse my indiscretion for the sake of the motive which dictates it.

I am, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

PLOU.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, November 29, 1870. (Received December 13.)

SIR: The day which the President selected for the national thanksgiving was also the day on which the Diet of North Germany convened for the last time. With the opening of the new year the North German Union will be merged in the United States of Germany.

I am able to inclose to you to-day a copy of the substance of the treaties effecting this union with Bavaria and Württemberg. The grand result is brought about by the liberal and orderly tendencies of the German people, by the patriotic wisdom of a part of its rulers and the apprehensions of the rest. The new organization bears the marks of its origin. The aristocratic party who desired an upper house of princes and nobles has found no hearing; and as yet the chief of the United States of Germany retains the name of President.

Should the South German dynasties desire that he should be called emperor the North would probably yield its assent; but thus far the change of name has not been made; the title of kaiser is not specially in favor. Regenerated Germany renounces all affinities with the Roman empire of the middle ages. When the deliberations on the new constitution are at an end, I will endeavor to report to you the final result of the complicated negotiations. At present I call your attention to the restrictions imposed on the President of Germany as to the declaration of war, which hereafter will require the previous consent of the German council.

In my former reports I have led you to expect for United Germany the establishment of the most liberal government on the continent of Europe, and all that I may have led you to expect seems likely to be realized. In one sense the new government is the child of America; but for our success in our civil war it would not have been established. Our victory in that strife sowed the seeds of the regeneration of Europe.

A great international result is the first consequence of the union of Germany. This people, though willing to free Russia from the restrictions on her rights as a sovereign, disapproved the abrupt manner in which the Czar took his redress. Count Bismarck proposes a conference at London for the settlement of the difficulty which has thus been raised, and the British ministry gladly accepts his friendly and conciliatory intervention. The Oriental question, as it has been called, assumes a larger importance, and now involves interests extending from Constantinople, or rather from Monte Negro, to the Japanese Seas. Heretofore it has been considered as a question of rivalry between Russia and Great Britain; two other powers now rise up in strength, Germany and the United States, both most deeply interested in the solution, and both looking at it with other eyes than those of Great Britain; both untouched by jealousy of Russia, both anxious for the spread of civilization in Asia, and both ready to welcome oppressed Christian nationalities to the recovery of freedom, culture, and prosperity.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, December 6, 1870.

SIR: Referring to the previous instructions of the Department and to your dispatches, as to "trade-marks convention," I again call your attention to the subject. In most, if not all, of the States of this Union, the protection of parties entitled to the exclusive use of trade-marks is afforded by the courts upon the principles of the unwritten common law, including of course what is known as equity law. Upon these principles the courts restrain, by injunction, the violation of a trade-mark in the way of preventive justice, and award damages by way of remedial justice. There are in some of them statutes in aid of the common law on this subject, but none, so far as known, restrictive of it. These principles are plastic and adapt themselves to the exigencies of justice as those exigencies develop themselves.

Under this administration of the unwritten law, all foreigners, not being public enemies, and whether residents of the United States or not, have always received the same protection as citizens. The right to such protection has been adjudged both by State and Federal tribunals. [So it has in England.] The act of Congress of July 8, 1870, (16 Stat., 210, et seq.,) provides for the registration of trade-marks and for their protection through the Federal courts. The remedies thus created are confined by section 77 to foreigners (if located or resident abroad) whose governments, by treaty or convention, afford similar privileges to citizens of the United States. Any person or firm (but not a foreign association) domiciled in the United States, are, as this Department is advised, entitled to its benefits irrespective of reciprocity toward citizens of the United States. The seventy-eighth section limits the effect of registration to thirty years, but it is careful at the close to declare that it shall not unfavorably affect the claim of any person to a trade-mark after the expiration of the term for which it was registered. I am not aware that at common law there is any limitation whatever to the time for which a right of property in a trade-mark may be maintained. Upon principle the right gathers strength with the lapse of years. With this exposition of the present laws of the United States, you will probably be in a position to advise the Department whether the property of citizens of the United States in trade-marks is protected in North Germany, or, if that is not the case, you will be able to judge what course to pursue in the execution of the instructions already given you in this respect.

I inclose a copy of the act of 1870, referred to above.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 29th of November, ultimo, No. 165, in regard to political affairs in Germany. I have perused the paper with much interest, and am persuaded that the facts presented in it which indicate a tendency in the German nationalities to assimilate their constitution and government to the liberal principles which have so well stood the test of our own experience, will excite profound satisfaction among the American people, and wherever such liberal principles are approved and cherished.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, December 17, 1870. (Received January 7, 1871.)

SIR: I yet owe to the Department an answer to two questions proposed to me in your No. 223, of August 23, 1870.

Napoleon had expected Prussia and Austria would exhaust themselves in the campaign of 1866 and leave him the umpire of Europe. He was taken by surprise by the swift success of Prussia. He still hoped to secure to himself acquisitions of territory as a condition to his assent to the peace. For this purpose the Emperor, from Vichy, sent to Mr. Benedetti, at Nicholsburgh, the project of a treaty which the ambassador communicated to Count Bismarck in a note bearing date the 5th of August, 1866. I inclose to you a photographic fac-simile of the project of treaty and of the note of Mr. Benedetti.* The Emperor demanded, first, a retrocession of the territory of Prussia held under the treaty of 1815 in excess of the line proposed in the treaty of 1814. Secondly, the Emperor demanded the cession of all that Hesse and Bavaria held on the left of the Rhine. Further, the Emperor demanded that Luxemburg should never again be included in the German Union, and that Prussia should give up its right to garrison the fortress of Luxemburg.

The consequences of this proposition were most momentous. First, Prussia and Austria hastened their peace, of which France was nominally the mediator; but, while it is usual for the mediating power to sign the treaty, the ambassador of France did not do so, which was a sign of discontent. Next, the anxiety of France to acquire the Bavarian palatinate and the territory of Hesse on the left bank of the Rhine, enabled Prussia to turn the southern states from enemies into allies, by an offensive and defensive alliance which has now ripened into a consolidated union. The next design of Napoleon was upon Luxemburg, a province which did not belong to Holland, but had the King of Holland for its sovereign. A war seemed unavoidable between the Emperor and Prussia. The strife was ended by the London conference in May, 1867. This is the time when Mr. Benedetti came forward with a new proposition of a treaty that France might receive an acquisition of territory not German but Belgian. Of this treaty I inclose a fac-simile.† As the treaty bears no date, the exact day on which it was taken to Count Bismarck cannot be stated. Here, then, is an answer to your first question: The time when Mr. Benedetti delivered to Count Bismarck the project of the treaty for the surrender of Belgium to France was during the agitation of the Luxemburg question, perhaps in April, 1867.

Your next question is why Count Bismarck did not publish to the world this project of a treaty at the time when it was delivered to him? He did not, indeed, publish the proposition of France, for it might have brought on a war, which he strove to avoid, and the treaty was published only when war had come. But the views of this government on the propositions were in another form made public. The Emperor of France, finding that his propositions met with no acceptance at Berlin, turned his thoughts to Austria, and brought about, in August, 1867, a meeting with the Emperor of Austria at Salzburg. The advantage proposed to

Prussia for betraying Belgium into the hands of France was the consent of France to coercing the southern states into the North German Union. In the circular of the 7th of September, 1867, Count Bismarck, referring to the meeting of the two Emperors, which he describes as certainly not dangerous to the peace of Germany, proclaims the intention of Prussia always firmly and in defiance of all other powers to maintain the rights of Germany to reform its constitution as an internal domestic right, which other states should not impair by intervention, or prevent by menace; but never, under any circumstances whatever, would North Germany coerce the southern German states, or any of them, to join the North German Union, being resolved to wait till they themselves should ask to be received. This state paper and the commentaries given to it by later circulars form some of the most important documents of these late wonderful years. These papers are marked in principle by moderation, and are expressed with a clearness and decision that left no room for misunderstanding. Count Bismarck first maintained that not a bit of German territory should be ceded; and when it was proposed that France should take Belgium, and North Germany South Germany, he rejected the offer and asserted with energy that no foreign power whatsoever, not even Austria, had any right to interfere with the union of North and South Germany; that it was a question for the German states to settle exclusively among themselves. In this lay the most perfect answer to the project offered in 1867 by Count Benedetti. I annex a memorandum found in the imperial archives and published in the "Journal Officiel," as well as an historical circular of Count Bismarck, dated July 29, 1870,* and the reply of Mr. Von Thile to Count Benedetti, dated the 10th of August, 1870.†

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, December 17, 1870. (Received January 7, 1871.)

SIR: Immediately on receiving your No. 264, respecting the interruption of communication between our minister at Paris and the Department, I explained to the secretary of state the opinion of the American Government, that the diplomatic right of a minister to communicate with his government is paramount to any right that may accrue to a belligerent. The case being a very simple one, it was easy at once to view it in all its aspects. The secretary of state here did not recede, and probably had not power to recede, from the position assumed by the besiegers of Paris. His answer was, first, that the opinion which our Government maintains had been presented by the representatives of eighteen several governments, and that the answer had been the same to them all, so that it was plain that the United States suffered only from a general measure, which was esteemed a necessity. Next, the secretary reminded me that the interruption, which existed at the time of our interview, sprung from those holding authority in Paris, the inference being that the one belligerent had proceeded in the matter as far as the other.

† See Foreign Relations, 1870, p. 223.

Since my first interview with Mr. Von Thile on the subject, the inclosure, No. 269, has been received. I have made inquiries among my colleagues and find that the Swiss Republic presented a paper which I have read, and which in tone and argument is very similar to that of the Department to Baron Gerolt. No other power has taken any further notice of the matter. As a practical question it will soon lose its interest; as a speculative question it is much discussed. There are not wanting those who think that the German view will be maintained. Every disposition has been shown to facilitate the intercourse of this legation with the legation at Paris, but that courtesy does not alter the main question.

COUNT: The diplomatic corps now at Paris request me to ask your excellency that they may be notified in the event of a bombardment, and allowed to leave the city. They would also like to be allowed once a week to dispatch a courier (mail)—exclusively diplomatic—accepting all the precautions which your excellency might think proper to take.

In transmitting this two-fold wish to your excellency, I beg you to accept the sentiments of high consideration with which I have the honor to be, &c.,

Count de Bismarck to Mr. Jules Favre.

FERRIERES, September 26, 1870.

MR. MINISTER: In reply to the note which I have this day had the honor to receive from your excellency, I regret to say that military considerations forbid me to make any communications with regard to the time and manner of the approaching assault upon the fortress of Paris.

The permission of correspondence from and with a besieged fortress is not usual according to the rules of warfare, and although we will willingly permit the transmission of open letters of diplomatic agents, I cannot share the opinion of those who regard the interior of the fortifications of Paris during a siege as a proper central point of diplomatic intercourse. This view of the case seems to be shared by the neutral governments whose agents have removed to Tours.

Circular of Mr. Von Thile.

BERLIN, September 26, 1870.

Since the French authorities have declined an armistice, and made Paris the theater of war, and since there is no recognized government in Paris, and the de facto government, as we learn, has been removed to Tours, the undersigned has the honor, most respectfully, to notify you that safety of communication with Paris exists only according to military events.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. — the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

PARIS, October 6, 1870.

COUNT: The undersigned, members of the diplomatic corps residing at Paris, had, on the 24th of September last, the honor to transmit to your excellency the expression of their desire that a courier bearing their official dispatches might, each week, on days to be appointed, pass the lines of the besieging army, and go to a locality whence the regular postal service was sure.

By a letter of the 3d of October, the minister of foreign affairs of France has just informed us that he has received from your excellency the reply "that a diplomatic courier could not pass the lines of the besieging troops save on condition that the dispatches be open and treat of no subject relating to the war."

We should have considered it our duty, as to the contents of our dispatches, scrupulously to conform to the obligations imposed, during a siege, upon diplomatic agents, by the rules and usages of international law. On the other hand, our position as diplomatic agents, and our duties toward our governments, do not permit us to accept the other condition, only to address open dispatches to them.

If this latter condition were to be adhered to, it would become impossible, to their great regret, for the diplomatic representatives of neutral states to maintain official relations with their respective governments.

Be pleased to accept, Comte, the assurances of our very high consideration.

VERSAILLES, October 10, 1871.

MONSEIGNEUR: I have had the honor to receive the letter bearing date of the 6th of October last, whereby the members of the diplomatic corps still residing at Paris have been pleased to inform me that it would become impossible for them to maintain official relations with their respective governments, if the condition of only being able to address to them open dispatches was to be adhered to.

When the continuation of the siege of Paris was rendered inevitable by the refusal of an armistice by the French government, the government of the King notified, of its own accord, by a circular note from the secretary of state, Mr. Van Thile, under date of the 26th of September last, a copy of which I have the honor to transmit to you, the agents of neutral powers accredited to Berlin, that freedom of communication with Paris only existed so far as military events permitted it. On the same day I received, at Ferrières, a communication from the minister of foreign affairs of the government of the national defense, which informed me of the desire expressed by the members of the diplomatic corps to be authorized to send dispatches to their governments by couriers leaving every week, and I did not hesitate acting in accordance with the rules established by international law, to make a reply dictated by the necessities of the military situation, a copy of which I likewise take the liberty of transmitting to your excellency. The present representatives of power have thought proper to establish the siege of their government in the midst of the fortifications of Paris, and to choose that city and its environs as the theater of war. If any members of the diplomatic corps, accredited to a former government, have decided to share with the government of the national defense the inconveniences which are inseparable from a residence in a besieged fortress, it is not the government of the King that is responsible therefor.

Notwithstanding our confidence that the gentlemen who signed the letter of the 6th of October would conform, in communications addressed to their governments, to the obligations which their presence in a city besieged according to the laws of war imposes on diplomatic agents, we must still consider the possibility that the importance of certain facts, in a military point of view, might escape them. It is moreover evident that they would be unable to furnish us the same guarantee for the messengers whom they should see fit to employ, and whom we should be obliged to allow to pass and repass through our lines.

A state of things has been created at Paris, in relation to international law, with which modern history shows no precise analogy. A government at war with a power which has not yet recognized it, has shut itself up in a besieged fortress, and is there surrounded by a portion of the diplomatic agents who were accredited near the government whose place has been taken by the government of the national defense. In the face of so irregular a situation, it will be difficult to establish, on the basis of the law of nations, rules which shall be incontrovertible in every point of view.

I think I may hope that your excellency will see the correctness of these observations, and will be pleased to appreciate the considerations which prevent me, to my great regret, from complying with the desire expressed in the letter of the 6th of October last. If, however, the signers shall not consider my remarks just, the governments which they have represented at Paris, and to which I shall hasten to communicate the correspondence exchanged with them, will give notice on their part, and will put themselves in communication with the government of the King to examine the questions of international law relating to the abnormal position which events and the measures of the government of the national defense have created at Paris.

Be pleased to accept, &c., &c..

BISMARCK.

Circular of Mr. Von Thile.

BERLIN, October 19, 1870.

I herewith most respectfully transmit to your excellency copies of—

1. The circular note which I addressed, in relation to the safety of communication with, from, and in Paris, on the 26th of last month, to the representatives of neutral states accredited to that court.
2. A joint note from members of the diplomatic corps at Paris, to the chancellor of the union, dated the 6th instant, in which it is requested that a weekly mail may be sent from Paris.
3. The reply to the same, addressed to the papal nuncio in Paris, together with the correspondence therein mentioned between Mr. Jules Favre and Count Bismarck.
4. The note by which the aforesaid documents are communicated to those governments whose representatives took part in the step mentioned, (sub. 2,) either directly or through the mediation of our diplomatic agents.

I take the liberty, most respectfully, to request your excellency to be pleased to present all these documents, as confidential information, to the government to which you have the honor to be accredited.

The inclosed duplicates of the annexes are intended for the archives of the legation.

[Extract.]

No. 177.]

UNITED STATES LEGATION,
Berlin, January 7, 1871. (Received January 30.)

SIR: The new year opens a new era; North Germany disappears and Germany rises into being. To the December address of the North German Diet, inviting the King of Prussia to accept the title of Emperor of Germany, offered him by the princes and free cities, the King wisely answered that he would wait for the decision of the people of South Germany, through their respective legislatures. The concurrence of all the legislatures, except Bavaria, has been given. The constitution of the United States of Germany went into effect on New Year's day. There was no ringing of bells, no salvo of artillery, no military parade, no proclamation, and the revolution which makes of United Germany the strongest power on the continent of Europe came in as still and noiselessly as the falling of dew on a summer's afternoon. The German Union has at this moment but four and twenty members, but no one doubts that Bavaria will join within a few days. The young commonwealth comes into being with every wish to maintain the most friendly relations with the United States of America. I am sorry to see that this disposition troubles British statesmen. As signs of the times, I inclose a letter from Earl Russell, of December 19, to the Times, in which he cavils at the Prussians for treating us "as blameless friends," and also an extract from the Times, of December 31, 1870. * * *

The relations between the new empire and Austro-Hungary involve questions of the highest political importance. On the 14th of last month Count Bismarck, through the North German minister at Vienna, announced to Count Beust the impending change in the most conciliatory manner, deduced its rightfulness from the peace of Prague, and opened the way for establishing the most friendly relations between the two powers. I annex Count Bismarck's dispatch to the German minister in Vienna, in German and in English. The answer of Count Beust was awaited with the greatest interest. Now, that it is published, it excites universal satisfaction that the Austrian chancellor, in his dispatch of December 26, to the Austrian minister at Berlin, putting aside all consideration of the peace of Prague, treats the union of Germany, under Prussian lead, as a fact of the first importance in the modern development of Europe.

He gives assurances of the sincerest wish of all influential circles in Austro-Hungary to cultivate the best and most friendly relations with the mighty state whose establishment approaches its completion. He joins the German government in the wish that Germany and Austro-Hungary may extend to one another the hand for the advancement of the welfare and prosperity of both countries. In this he sees a pledge for permanent harmony between the two empires, and for Europe a guarantee of permanent peace. The emperor, he adds, recalling the ennobling recollections which united his dynasty for centuries with the destinies of the German people, promises to cherish the warmest sympathies for the further development of that people, and expresses his unreserved wishes that its new form as a body-politic may give genuine securities for its own happiness and the welfare of the ancient imperial state with which it is in so many ways connected by tradition, language, manners, and laws.

The Pontus question is still talked about, but no one apprehends immediate war, which Russia and Turkey are both desirous to avoid. The Black Sea is the great interior sea of Europe, draining a far larger and more fertile part of its soil, and receiving larger European rivers than the Mediterranean. The only good issue to the present strife must be the declaration that that sea is one in which all the commercial powers of the world have an interest, and which, therefore, must be unreservedly free and open to all. Russia shows no sign whatever of yielding any longer its natural right to fortify its coast, and to maintain ships of war in the Black Sea. The insinuation of a connivance between Prince Gortchakoff and Count Bismarck is to be rejected; no such connivance existed.

I remain, &c.

GEO. BANCROFT.

[From the London Times of December 21, 1870.]

OUR MILITARY RESOURCES.

To the editor of the Times :

SIR : I share in your anxiety respecting our armed forces, and it seems to me that during the five or six weeks before Parliament meets the public mind could not be more usefully employed than in considering our deficiencies, and, when a conclusion is reached, in asking government to supply our wants by armaments neither superfluous nor inadequate.

We are, unfortunately, a mark for national animosity on many sides. During the South American revolution the United States checked the building and sailing of cruisers to intercept and plunder the trade of Spain and Portugal, according to their own views of their obligations. When remonstrated with for not doing more, they answered that they would allow no interference with their domestic measures. When one notorious cruiser escaped from Birkenhead, during the American civil war, and our government copied the answer of Mr. Secretary Adams, we were immediately told that our repression was designedly and willfully inadequate.

In the same spirit, when arms are, during the present war, imported into France from England, but in much larger quantities from the United States, in conformity in both instances with the law of nations, the Prussian ministers, ambassadors, officers, and soldiers, through whose country supplies of arms were carried to Russia during the Crimean war, and used by Russian soldiers to kill British troops engaged in a European cause—these same Prussians inveigh against us as enemies, and treat the Americans as blameless friends.

From these two instances I infer that the envy and hostility which have pursued every wealthy commercial nation in ancient and modern times are now dogging our steps, and will one of these days burst out into open aggression.

The facility with which Prince Gortchakoff and Count Bismarck threw off the trammels of treaties in their own cause, and upon their own testimony, shows but too clearly how easy it will be to find a pretext for attacking, first, an ally of England, such as Holland or Austria, and then England herself.

We have been subject since 1815 to occasional panics, often causeless and generally excessive. But if we have been affected in former days with unreasonable fear, that is no reason why we should now be buoyed up by extravagant hope—

“ Fear’s elder brother, not so sad ;

“ The merrier fool of the two, but quite as mad.”

Why should we suppose the British Channel impassable to the ships and boats of an enemy ? Is it impossible that a fleet may be required to relieve from danger our fellow-subjects in Jamaica while an expedition is preparing in the Texel for the invasion of England ? Could we send a part of our army to assist an ally while we have so small a force of regular troops and so few thousands of embodied militia ? Why not raise, by ballot if necessary, and embody one hundred thousand militia ? In six months they would be admirable troops. Captain Sherard Osborn holds that a fleet equipped in the Scheldt against us ought to inspire no apprehensions, and at the same time advises us to line our east and north coasts with ships of war. His practical advice proves that he does not feel the security he affects. Lord Derby warns us against “ an essentially retrograde step,” and at the same time assumes that we might possibly be called upon to repel an invasion of one hundred thousand men.

Even were I not an Englishman I should feel what many Germans, many Frenchmen, many citizens of the United States feel—admiration and reverence for a nation which, since 1641, has given her best blood in the cause of liberty ; and since 1688 has furnished a model, often improved and purified, of a state in the enjoyment of civil and religious freedom.

Being a member of that state I feel responsible, as one of the public, to Europe and to the world for its preservation. I compare it with the great overwhelming autocracy, or rather stratocracy, of Russia, where, as I read in your telegram of to-day, “ the Moscow town council having, in their congratulatory address on the Black Sea question, petitioned the Czar to add liberty of the press, tolerance of all religions, and other reforms to the blessings he has conferred upon his subjects, their address has been returned with a reprimand.” I see here what sort of government is prepared for the Turkish provinces now striving to obtain freedom from their own Sultan. I compare our condition again with the efforts which, since 1789, France has made in vain to combine liberty and order. I compare it with the state of Germany, and I ardently wish success to her new institutions, while I have some fear that her liberty may be stifled by a surplus of kings, princes, lords, and squires.

In the midst of these examples I wish to see England made impregnable, with the motto of our volunteers, defense, not defiance.

Your obedient servant,

RUSSELL.

[From the London Times of December 31, 1850. Extract from editorial.]

The collateral evils and dangers arising from the war must have convinced the most obstinate believers in a policy of isolation how universally the security of Europe is affected by a conflict between two of its greatest powers. The general sympathy of England with a just cause failed to conciliate the good will of the Prussian government or of the German army and nation. During the Crimean war arms and munitions of war had been freely exported from Prussia to Russia; and recently rifled cannon and ammunition have been furnished to the French in enormous quantities, not only by private American traders, but by the War Department at Washington. The North German government has expressly forbidden its consul at New York to interfere with the traffic in arms, and the relations of the confederation with the United States are friendly and even intimate; yet a comparatively insignificant exportation of arms from England to France has served as a pretext for repeated protests. In his first complaint on the subject Count Bernstorff, conscious of the legal weakness of his case, invented a new doctrine of benevolent neutrality which ought, as he contended, to have been observed by England. Lord Granville, in a dispatch equally courteous and conclusive, showed, with little difficulty, that as benevolence to one belligerent could only be exercised at the expense of the other, Count Bernstorff's proposed rule for the conduct of neutrals involved a contradiction in terms; yet the complaint was repeated in stronger language, although the new paradox was retracted; and it was difficult to avoid a suspicion that Count Bismarck had some political reason for displaying coldness to England. The conjecture seemed to be confirmed when, in the middle of November, the Russian government suddenly issued a circular audaciously repudiating a principal clause in the Paris treaty of 1856.

Count Bismarck to Herr von Schweinitz, the North German minister at Vienna.

VERSAILLES, December 14.

The treaties between the North German Confederacy and the South German states, concluded at Versailles with Bavaria and Hesse, and at Berlin with Württemberg, have been so far matured by recent transactions at Berlin as to admit of their being laid before the South German parliaments. Not only a regard for the Prague treaty of peace, in which Prussia and Austro-Hungary embodied their notions respecting the then anticipated development of German affairs, but also the wish to cultivate such relations with a friendly and powerful neighbor as shall be in harmony with our common past as well as with the sentiments and necessities of both peoples, causes me to acquaint the imperial and royal Austro-Hungarian government with the point of view from which the government of His Majesty the King looks upon the reorganization of Germany. In the Prague treaty of August 23, 1866, the supposition is expressed that the German governments south of the Main will form a confederacy which, independent in itself, would be connected by close national ties with the confederacy of the North German states. None of the contracting parties being by this treaty entitled or obliged to prescribe to the sovereign states of Southern Germany how to order their mutual relations, it rested exclusively with these states to fulfill the above supposition. The South German states have omitted realizing the ideas underlying the Prague treaty of peace. They have confined themselves to forming national relations with Northern Germany, and as a first introductory step renewed the Zollverein and the treaties providing for a mutual territorial guarantee. It was beyond human power to foresee that, under the mighty impetus given to German patriotism by an unexpected attack of the French, these arrangements would be completed by the constitutional treaties recently concluded, and by the establishment of a new German confederacy. Northern Germany had no call to hinder or foil a consummation which it had not indeed brought about, but which had its origin in the history and spirit of the nation. Nor does the Austro-Hungarian government, according to your reports, expect or demand that the stipulations of the Prague treaty of peace shall throw difficulties in the way of the prosperous development of the German states. The Austro-Hungarian government regards the pending reorganization of German affairs with the confident hope that all members of the new confederacy, and especially the King, our most gracious master, are animated by the desire to preserve and promote those friendly relations with the neighboring empire of Austro-Hungary which are equally recommended to both by their common interests and an active literary and commercial intercourse. The allied governments, on their part, confidently expect that their wishes in this respect are shared by the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. The imminent fulfillment of the German national aspirations and requirements will impart a steadiness and safety to the future development of Germany which all Europe, and more particularly our immediate neighbors will, I trust, see not only without apprehension, but also with satisfaction. The unfettered growth of material interests, which bind countries and nations together with so many ties, cannot fail to react beneficially upon our political relations. Germany and Austro-Hungary will, we are convinced, look upon each other with feelings of mutual good-will, and unite for the friendly promotion of each other's welfare and prosperity. As soon as the fundamental treaties of the new confederacy have been ratified by all parties, I shall enable you to communicate them officially to the chancellor of the Austro-Hungarian empire. I request you to read this communication to the chancellor, and to leave a copy of it with him.

I am, &c.,

BISMARCK.

[Translation.]

AUSTRIAN DISPATCH.

The much talked-of dispatch of the chancellor of the empire, Count Benst to Count Wimpffen, the Austrian ambassador at Berlin, (Vienna, December 26, 1870,) is as follows.

The royal Ambassador of Prussia has sent me the repeatedly promised communication of his government in relation to the unification of Germany. Inclosed your excellency will find a copy of the dispatch in question. I was able to inform your excellency in my dispatch of the 5th instant, immediately after the first indications of General von Schweinitz, regarding the expected declaration of the royal Prussian government, what general points we should consider as the leading ones, and as those by which our view was to be governed. Being now in possession of the document, I am able fully to confirm all that I said at that time. This is moreover the case with regard to a point in respect to which, apparently at least, our views do not perfectly coincide with those of the royal Prussian government. In my dispatch of the 5th instant, I could not avoid adverting to the desirableness, according to our view of the case, of avoiding as far as possible any discussion of the peace of Prague, in view of the present interchange of opinion with Prussia and with a view to the object which both parties are equally desirous of accomplishing.

The royal Prussian government thought proper in its communication of the 14th instant to touch upon this question, and although we willingly acknowledge the friendly disposition with which reference was made to the peace of Prague, we consider it better not to make use of the material which is thereby offered for a diffuse explanation, and to adhere to our opinion that it is to the interest of both parties to avoid a discussion of this kind. Indeed, we do not at this moment, consider it desirable for formal interpretations or material legitimate demands to be made a subject of the discussion. We would rather see in the unification of Germany under the leadership of Prussia, an act of historical significance, a fact of the highest importance in the modern development of Europe, and in accordance therewith, form our opinions concerning the relations which are to be founded and strengthened between the Austro-Hungarian monarchy and the new political creation on our borders. From this stand-point it can only afford me high satisfaction, while awaiting the further communications from the royal Prussian government which have been promised, now to state that the sincere wish prevails in all leading circles of Austro-Hungary to maintain the best and most friendly relations with the powerful state whose establishment is now to be completed. This wish is based upon the conviction that an impartial consideration and appreciation of present requirements will have the best and most salutary effect upon both countries, and will unite them in peace and in earnest co-operation for the tasks of the present and future.

In regard to this, the royal Prussian government has only anticipated the expression of our own sentiments, in alluding to our common past, and in expressing the hope that Germany and Austro-Hungary will regard each other with feelings of mutual good will, and that they will aid each other in the promotion of their common welfare and prosperity.

We think that we have every reason to feel confident that a wide field is to be opened at once for the realization of these pleasing expectations, a field in which a community of wishes and of action may become a pledge of permanent harmony for both countries, and a guarantee of lasting peace for Europe. The fact must fill us with great satisfaction, however, that these feeling of the people of Austro-Hungary find a sovereign protector and promoter in the person of His Majesty the Emperor and King, our most gracious master. His Majesty will view the sublime memories which connect his dynasty, in the glorious history of centuries, with the destinies of the German people, with the warmest sympathy for the further development of that nation, and with the sincere wish that it may find, in the new form of its political existence, the true guarantees of a happy future, both as regards its own welfare and that of the empire, which is so closely related to it by historical tradition, language, customs, and laws.

Your excellency will bring these remarks to the notice of the royal Prussian secretary of state, and will furnish him with a copy of the same, if he desires it.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Berlin, January 9, 1871. (Received January 31.)

SIR: Your instruction, No. 275, respecting the protection of trade marks has received attention.

The law on this subject for North Germany, henceforth good for all Germany, is contained in the penal code of the North German Union. (Strafgesetzbuch des norddeutschen Bundes), a copy of which I forwarded to you on the 3d of October last. Paragraph 287 of this code provides for the protection of trade-marks, in terms of which the following is a translation:

Whoever falsely marks goods or their wrappings with the name or firm (firma) of a native manufacturer, producer, or merchant, or knowingly introduces into the market such falsely-marked goods is punishable with a fine of from $50 to $1,000, or with imprisonment not to exceed six months. The same penalty accrues when the act is committed against subjects of a foreign state, in which a reciprocal procedure is guaranteed by published treaties, or by the laws.

The penalty is not thereby voided, that the name or firm (firma) is reproduced with such alterations as are perceptible only upon very close observation.

It thus appears that the legislation of both countries indicates a like disposition to extend the protection secured to its own citizens to those foreigners also whose governments reciprocate it.

A convention, however, seems necessary to give certainty and effectiveness to the reciprocal protection.

I shall therefore seize the earliest opportune moment to resume the negotiation of such a convention, which, but for the war, would have been already concluded.

A convention now to be concluded will secure to the citizens of the United States protection for the products of their skill throughout Germany.

SIR: Late on the 16th I received from you the following telegram:

WASHINGTON, January 16.

I have not suffered this government to remain ignorant of the faithful and self-sacrificing integrity with which Mr. Washburne discharges his duties as guardian of the Germans in Paris and in France. I obtained, yesterday, an interview with the Secretary of State. So far from knowing anything of any interruption of the correspondence of Mr. Washburne, he testified, on the part of the German government, the greatest readiness and disposition to forward it, and knew nothing of any delays on the German side. On the contrary, every wish exists on the part of this government to make Mr. Washburne's residence in Paris as comfortable as possible. It has also been established by Count Bismarck that any American in Paris may at any time, under proper authentication from Mr. Washburne, come out of Paris. For explanation of the interruption alluded to by you in the telegram, I am left to a conjecture, aided by what has appeared in the public journals. The French press in Paris complains bitterly that Mr. Washburne alone receives newspapers and communications from abroad, and the complaint, when analyzed, resolves itself into this, that the papers and communications which Mr. Washburne receives give no account of French victories. The same journals complain bitterly against the Government of the United States that it has not interposed effectively in favor of France. There have also been times when intercourse between Paris and Versailles by flags of truce has been capriciously interrupted by the government in Paris.

I will continue inquiry, and will not fail to make a proper representation to this government, should the grievance from which Mr. Washburne suffers be found to proceed from the German side; but I have no doubt that the difficulty has arisen in another quarter.

You may see in the papers a report of terms which Austria is said to propose, mediatorially, as conditions of peace between France and Germany. You may be perfectly certain that this rumor has no foundation in truth. It is a mere fiction of the stock exchange.

Bavaria still lingers outside of the German Federal Union, but no one doubts that within a very few days she will be the twenty-fifth of the United States of Germany.

SIR: I inclose to you to-day the original of a letter which I have received from Count Bismarck, replying to your note of November 21 to Baron Gerolt, and also a translation of the same. I have this day received from Mr. Washburne a letter dated January 16, and I am more and more convinced that no obstacle is opposed by the German government to delay the transmission of your correspondence with our minister at Paris.

[Translation.]

Mr. Bismarck to Mr. Bancroft.

VERSAILLES, January 16, 1871.

The undersigned, chancellor of the confederation, has received the note which the Secretary of State of the United States of America, on the 21st of November last, addressed to the envoy of the North German Confederation, Baron Gerolt, in reply to the communication made by the latter respecting the intercourse with their Government of the members of the diplomatic corps remaining in Paris. The Secretary of State claims for the representatives of all neutral powers in Paris the right of free written intercourse with their governments, on the ground that such intercourse is in itself one of the privileges of envoys, and that the communication of Baron Gerolt failed to convince the Government of the United States that the special circumstances in the case of Paris justified an exception.

As we have, in fact, forwarded Mr. Washburne's dispatches both ways, the question has a theoretical significance only. The undersigned has nevertheless made the note of the 21st of November the subject of careful consideration, and regrets that he has not been able to arrive at the same conclusion. The right of unhindered written intercourse between a government and its diplomatic representative, especially so far as concerns the government to which he is accredited, is in itself undisputed. But this right may come in conflict with rights which of themselves are also beyond dispute; as for instance in the case where a State, to guard against contagious disease, subjects travelers and papers to a quarantine. So, too, in war. The universal and imperative right of self-protection, of which war is itself the expression, may come in conflict with the diplomatic privileges, which, just because privileges, are, in doubtful case, subject not to an enlarging, but to a contracting interpretation. A precedent where a government has transformed its permanent seat into a strong fortress, and has in consequence been exposed, with the envoys accredited to it, to a long siege is certainly not to be found, so far as known, in modern history, nor can indeed it well occur, since Paris is, of modern capitals, the only fortress; and, in earlier times, when every city was fortified, and sieges of cities in which a government had its seat could occur more frequently, standing embassies were not yet established.

If the writers on public law concede to the diplomatic representatives of neutral states, rights as against a belligerent power, they do so only while, at the same time coupling therewith the right to regulate the correspondence of such persons with a besieged town, according to military exigencies. Vattel says:

“ Elle (la guerre) permet d'ôter à l'ennemi toutes ses ressources, d'empêcher qu'il ne puisse envoyer ses ministres pour solliciter des secours. Il est même des occasions où l'on peut refuser le passage aux ministres des nations neutres qui voudraient aller chez l'ennemi. On n'est point obligé de souffrir qu'ils lui portent peut-être des avis salutaires, qu'ils aillent concerter avec lui les moyens de l'assister, etc. Cela ne souffre nul doute par exemple, dans le cas d'une ville assiégée. Aucun droit ne peut autoriser le ministre d'une puissance neutre ni qui que ce soit à y entrer malgré l'assiégé, mais pour ne point offenser les souverains, il faut leur donner de bonnes raisons du refus que l'on fait de laisser passer leurs ministres, et ils doivent s'en contenter s'ils prétendent demeurer neutres.”

What is true of ministers will be all the more so of messengers and dispatches. Other authorities go still further. Merlin, cited with assent by Wheaton, makes the privileges of a minister, who in time of peace passes through the territory of a third state, subject to the consent of the latter to the transit. Without this permission, express or by acquiescence, the minister is to be regarded as an ordinary traveler. The military necessity of cutting off a besieged town from outside intelligence appears a sufficient ground for subjecting to control, in a military point of view, the correspondence of diplomatic persons remaining in the town in its transit through territory occupied by the besiegers, and temporarily subject to their war sovereignty. It is not perceived that these persons are thereby treated as enemies, nor that they are thereby prevented from continuing neutral, nor that wars are thereby indefinitely prolonged.

On the contrary, the end of a war is all the sooner to be expected the more strictly the isolation of the hostile capital is carried out. Its termination would be indefinitely distant if every one of the diplomatic persons in a besieged capital, and their number may be very considerable, could require that so often as he had to send a communication to his government, or expected one from it, the activity of the besiegers should be stayed.

The undersigned requests the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States, Mr. George Bancroft, to acquaint his Government with this communication, and takes occasion to renew to him the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, February 1, 1871. (Received February 28.)

SIR: The capitulation of Paris will, it is here universally believed, lead to the establishment of peace. The terms will include Metz. Germany is determined to rely for its security against future aggression from France on a safe military line of defense. If it obtains the boundary which it requires, peace between the two peoples can hardly be broken for a century. The minister from Switzerland tells me to-day that eighty thousand of the troops of Bourbaki have escaped from before the Germans into the neutral territory of Switzerland. This is the fourth French army that has been brought to ruin since the capture of the late Emperor at Sedan, and military power, and with it military influence, are now so completely crushed in France that the constituent assembly which is to be convened at Bordeaux will, in proceeding to form a new constitution, be entirely free from the control or influence of the army.

In that convention I cannot but hope that the late anti-republican usurpation will receive its proper rebuke, and that the more reasonable and better instructed statesmen of France may assist to found a republic on principles analogous to our own.

With regard to Germany, present appearances indicate that, after the close of this war, it will devote itself exclusively to the employments of peace. Compared with the great objects of this war, which involved the question of national existence, all conceivable causes for a future war will appear trivial and indifferent. This war has carried sorrow into almost every family, alike into the houses of that class from which the officers are chiefly taken, and those of the poor. Two hundred of the students of Königsberg University are serving for the most part in the ranks, and the other universities have contributed to the army in the same proportion, so that for the future no motive to war that is likely to occur can seem worthy of a repetition of equal sacrifices.

Indeed, people of every degree long for peace, and long for its continuance. I am, therefore, of the opinion that Germany in the coming years will devote its immense energies to the improvement of its laws, the establishment of its liberties, and the development of its great resources.

The relations between our own country and the new empire are happily those of reciprocal good will and amity. The heart of the German people at the beginning of the war turned with affectionate confidence toward America. This warmth of feeling was somewhat chilled by the exportations of the munitions of war from America to France, but the minister here has been just to our government, knowing well the condition of our laws and our treaty stipulations with Prussia in regard to traffic in contraband articles of war, established on our part by Franklin, John Adams, and Jefferson, in the days of Frederick the Great, and renewed by John Quincy Adams, and again by Henry Clay, during the reign of the father of the present King, and continued in force to the present day.

SIR: I have not failed to continue the inquiries made proper by your telegram of January 16, respecting the interruptions to the communication of Mr. Washburne with his Government. I receive the most unequivocal assertions here at each of the departments of the ministry of the willingness and desire for the prompt transmission of Mr. Washburne's pouch from London to Paris. I observed in the columns of a late French newspaper, published in Paris, the assertion as of a well-known fact, that Mr. Washburne received his dispatches, letters, and newspapers, &c., once a week. My own letters to him appear to have reached him regularly except on one single occasion. The note of Count Bismarck, of January 15, which I lately forwarded to you, states unequivocally that Mr. Washburne's intercourse with the Government is free and uninterrupted. I have heard of no delay but on one occasion; but the unvarying declarations of this government from all its departments preclude the idea that the delay was intentional on their part. The government here has been kept fully informed of the manner in which Mr. Washburne has discharged his duties as protector of the Germans, and has uniformly expressed to me its warm and grateful sense of his assiduousness and fidelity.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, February 6, 1871. (Received March 3.)

SIR: I have received your No. 281 of January 17, and its inclosures. I share your regret that this government should have revoked its declaration exempting private property on the high seas from seizure, but American navigation has very little to apprehend from that revocation, for this government is bound by the principle that free ships make free goods, so that French property on board American ships, unless contraband of war, will remain perfectly safe. As it regards contraband of war, this government is fully aware of the stipulations with regard to it made originally with the full approval of Frederick the Great by John Adams, Franklin, and Jefferson, on our part, renewed in 1799, in a treaty signed by John Quincy Adams, and indefinitely continued by the treaty negotiated by Henry Clay. I am, therefore, persuaded that everything will be carefully avoided which could give us ground of complaint. Indeed, it may be a question whether the revocation of the declaration does in any way affect the navigation of the United States, since the declaration neither revoked nor impaired the treaty obligations of the two countries. Meantime Paris has surrendered, and the protocol and convention of surrender, of which I inclose official copies, partake of the character of a political national act. All accounts that are received here tend to confirm the general opinion that this convention, made with the government of the national defense at Paris, will be followed by peace.

Pray give no credence to the conditions of peace reported in English newspapers, under the real or pretended authority of telegrams. They are in many respects purely fictitious. But so far as relates to a cession of territory, I inclose to you a map published by the German post-office department, and which, therefore, may be regarded in some measure as authentic and official. The part of Alsace and Lorraine of which it appears the cession will be required, is marked on the Swiss side with a line of blue, on the French side by a line of blue and red. The cession is one which it will be very hard, if not impossible, for the French to make. The Germans plead that, square mile for square mile, the territory to be ceded is exactly of the same extent as that which France, in 1859, required from Italy, so that, as to square miles, France would be of exactly the same contents as by the treaty of 1815. With regard to Metz, I hear it sometimes said that Luxemburg was the proper defense of Germany on that side against France; that so late as 1867, Germany, rather than engage in a war with France, consented to give up that fortress and retire from Luxemburg, surrendering a German territory, in old times a part of the empire, and since 1815 a part of the German Union, entirely to the King of Holland. I do not suffer myself to express any opinions on these questions, and hardly to form any. My object is simply to keep the Department accurately informed on questions as they arise.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

SIR: The expectation of immediate peace continues, though the moment of decision is awaited not without anxiety, and troops are still going forward that every contingency may be provided for. The progress of the negotiations will reach you by way of London sooner than I can report it, even by telegraph from Berlin. To understand the condition of France, it is only necessary to note the course of military events by which Gambetta hoped in the month of January to establish his dictatorship. General Roze with his army, supported by troops from Havre, was to drive the Germans from Rouen. General Faidherbe was to cut the connections of the Germans in the Northeast and East. Bourbaki and Garibaldi were, by menacing Belfort, to attract the forces under Prince Frederick Charles; and so the way was to be left open for General Chanzy from Maas to relieve Paris. But General Roze was beaten back with a loss of 12,000, taken prisoners; General Faidherbe, with a like loss of 11,000; Chanzy, 24,000; Bourbaki, 30,000, and more than 80,000 driven into Switzerland. In killed and wounded the loss of these armies, with those who fell in the sorties from Paris, amounted to 41,000; so that, apart from the losses of Garibaldi and the franc-tireurs, France suffered a loss of its active men in the field of about 200,000 outside of Paris, in the month of January alone. Add to this 150,000 troops that surrendered at the capitulation of Paris, without counting the national guard; and it appears that the effective force of France was in the month of January diminished by at least 350,000 men. The loss of the Germans to be set against this was about 10,000.

In this way the dictatorship of Gambetta came to an end, and France was driven to the necessity of making conditions of peace which almost seem like a capitulation. Your instructions to No. 293 (except 237) have been received.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 24, 1871.

SIR: I have received your No. 183 of the 21st ultimo, accompanied by the original of a letter from Count Bismarck replying to my note of November 21 to Baron Gerolt, and also a translation of the same. I am happy to think that the question discussed in my note, and in Count Bismarck's reply, is no longer one of practical application to any probable occurrences. It is therefore quite unnecessary to consider whether the approach of a hostile force, and its military preparations for the capture of a city which has been for ages the seat of government and the capital of the country, where the political head of that country is and has been established, where its minister of foreign affairs has his office and his archives, where the representatives of other powers have been and are resident, can so convert that city into a military fortress as to apply to it the rules of war applicable to fortresses as distinguished from other towns. Or whether such approach and military demonstrations of a hostile force impose upon the diplomatic representatives of other and neutral states the alternative of abandoning their posts and their duties, or of privation of the right of free and uninterrupted correspondence with their government, which public law, no less than international comity, accords in the interest of peace. I inclose herewith copies of a correspondence between Mr. Washburne and Count Bismarck on the subject of the transmission of Mr. Washburne's dispatches. You will observe that in this correspondence Count Bismarck, under date of January 15, admits that the delay to which the transmission of the correspondence of this Government with its minister in Paris was subjected depended upon the principle adopted by the general staff of the German army, allowing no sealed packages or letters to pass through their lines in either direction without a stoppage of several days, and he cautiously disclaims one act of immediate transmission being taken as a precedent. The President desires to make all proper allowance for the military exigencies which are represented to have led to the withholding and detaining of the official correspondence of the minister, and is gratified to receive the recognition in Count Bismarck's letter of 28th January to Mr. Washburne of the right of correspondence contended for in my note to Baron Gerolt of 21st November last, and his assurance that the delay to which it was subjected proceeded from causes which he could not remove.

Recent events, it is confidently hoped, have removed the probability of any recurrence of the interruption of free correspondence. And Count Bismarck's assurance to Mr. Washburne that "the delay occurring now and then in the transmission of your dispatch-bag is not occasioned by any doubt as to the right of your Government to correspond with you, but by obstacles it was out of my power to remove," confirms this Government in its confidence of an entire agreement between it and North Germany on the question of the right and the inviolability of correspondence between a government and its representative, and of the absence of any intentional interference with that right in the case of its minister to Paris. I send, herewith, a copy of a dispatch of this date to Mr. Washburne.

As Count Bismarck's recognition of the right for which I contended in my note to Baron Gerolt is subsequent to his letter to you of 15th

January, and admits what I felt it my duty to claim, there does not appear to be any necessity for continuing the discussion, unless the subject be again referred to by the German minister, in which case you are authorized to read to him this dispatch.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, February 27, 1871. (Received March 20.)

SIR: The telegraph will have brought you news of the preliminaries of peace between France and Germany, signed last Sunday evening, on the basis of the cession to Germany of Alsace without Belfort, and of German Lorraine, with Metz, together with an indemnity for war expenses of 5,000,000,000 francs.

The fortress of Belfort commands the pass south of the Vosgian mountains into central France. To a German power desirous of offensive war against France, its possession would be of the greatest value, since it would open the way at once to the richest parts of Burgundy. As a defensive position for Germany, it is of less importance. True, therefore, to the principle of demanding no territory except what is necessary for defensive purposes, Germany has very wisely restored Belfort to France. That city is essentially French, and has been so for ages. The fortress of Metz is retained by Germany, because the German military authorities insist upon it as essential for the line of defense, but the position was of so much importance to France, for its own protection, that its cession could hardly have been claimed had not Germany, four years ago, been compelled by France to give up the fortress of Luxemburg.

The pecuniary indemnity demanded will weigh very heavily on France, for the money is to be raised and paid in three years, and the war has given to the credit of France a shock from which it cannot soon recover. The council of the German Empire, which most nearly resembles our Senate, is now assembled in Berlin, collecting here a large body of the most distinguished statesmen of the empire. The time for the opening of the first diet of renovated Germany is fixed for the 16th of March. The Emperor is expected to return sooner. It is said of him that he feels very deeply the loss of so many brave officers and men in the war; that he will return to his capital as quietly as possible, and that instead of exultations for victory, one of his first acts will be to propose a public mourning of the whole land. When that is over, and when most of the army is recalled, there may be a triumphal march into Berlin, in which the Emperor will take part.

The Emperor has probably before now announced to the President his increased dignity and jurisdiction. If so, I shall hope very soon to receive the President's letter in reply.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

SIR: Before leaving Versailles the Emperor of Germany addressed a letter to the President of the United States, informing him of the new title which he had assumed on the occasion of the union of the Southern German States with the Northern. The German minister at Washington was also instructed to communicate to the President the cordial response of the German government to the words of sympathy in which the President announced to Congress the union of Germany. To this I can add that the state paper has attracted attention from one end of Europe to the other, and that I am constantly receiving evidences of the satisfaction which it has excited in every class of Germany, from extreme liberals to extreme conservatives. The new empire contains a little more than forty millions of people, who are almost exclusively of one nationality; even in the new provinces of Alsace and Lorraine 1,350,000 are Germans, and only about 300,000 are of French descent. In Posen, in the eastern part of the empire, a majority of the people are Polish; and about half a million of Jews are scattered through the country, but these all speak the German language and have for centuries been resident in Germany.

This unity of nationality already gives evidence that it will control the policy of the empire. It is held in memory that in centuries long gone by the German Emperor professed to be the successor of the Roman, and as such was constantly involved in foreign, especially Italian, wars, to the ruin of the country. No plans of future conquest are now cherished, but, instead of it, the culture and development of the homogeneous population are the great ends which are proposed. The unity of nationality shows itself already as a guarantee of a policy of peace. I have met no one who wants territory occupied by men of another race and language. Another guarantee of peace is the character of the army, composed as it is of the people, and, as with us, disinclined to any war except for self-defense. Still another guarantee is found in the federal constitution of the empire, the several governments having reserved to themselves the right of being consulted before war can be declared.

The President in his message to Congress expressed his confidence that the body which represents the people would be marked by a love of liberty, and it has proved so. The Grand Duchy of Baden is entitled to twelve representatives in the German Diet, and, though the majority of the people of Baden are Catholics, the national party has elected ten of the representatives, the ultramontanes only two. The victory of the liberal national party in Wurtemberg is still more remarkable. Three years ago it did not elect to the German customs parliament one single national member, while in the present election, out of seventeen to which Wurtemberg is entitled, all are national and liberal except two. Bavaria was looked upon by the ultramontanes as their stronghold, and in Bavaria, where the Catholics compared with the Protestants, are as five to two, the ultramontanes and the separatists combined are left in a decided minority. Thus South Germany comes into the German Parliament with all of its states on the side of union, and with a great majority for the development of the country on the principle of freedom. Yesterday the Parliament of Germany had its first sitting. The day began with divine service in the royal chapel, after which the speech of the Emperor was delivered in a large hall in the palace to the members of the two houses of Parliament, of whom nearly every one seemed to be present. It was addressed to them as the representatives of the German people, who have at last attained to consciousness of life and unity; and the object of the constitution was declared to be the protection of justice in Germany and the fostering of the welfare of the German people. Next to the recognition of the union of Germany as the result of the efforts of the nation, the most remarkable point in the speech is the pledge which it gives for the maintenance of peace, for respect for the rights of all other powers, whether strong or weak, and for emulation in the victories of peace. Before the day closed the Emperor, as King of Prussia, not as Emperor of Germany, raised Count Bismarck to the rank of prince.

SIR: This afternoon I delivered to the Emperor the President's letter of March 16 congratulating him on attaining the dignity which makes him the representative of German Union, and expressing the cordial good wishes of the United States for the most friendly relations with Germany. With reference to his new position he said: "I have neither sought for it, nor expected it, nor desired it. The movement that was manifest in the history of a long period of years could not be unobserved; but I had no thought that the end would be attained unless it might be in the time of my son or of my grandson."

With respect to the United States, the Emperor most cordially reciprocated the good feeling which the President had expressed; and as all the world gives him credit for being a man of his word, the President may be certain that the declaration was made with deliberation and sincerity. He expressed particularly his wish that the two nations might continue to cultivate mutually those good and friendly feelings which have been so apparent ever since Germany began to unite itself anew.

His expressions to me personally were as friendly as possible.

SIR: The session of the German Diet has thus far been marked by moderation and love of peace. The Pope, since the loss of his temporal dominions, feels himself ill at ease in the Vatican; and the suggestion was made by his friends here that he would seek refuge in Germany. To an informal inquiry the informal answer was given that the Pope would receive in Germany the protection and hospitality which the laws award, in the same degree as the late King of Naples; but that the exercise of his functions could take place on German soil only after the enactment of a law. The clerical party in the diet desire very much that the Emperor should claim for the Pope the restoration of his temporal power. In an address to the Emperor the diet expressed themselves, in a vote of 243 against 63, in general terms against any such measure, and against any intermeddling with foreign powers; and the Emperor, in his reply, assured them that they had rightly interpreted his speech at the opening of the session as declaring the policy of non-intervention.

In Bavaria a great division has arisen among the Catholics themselves. The Archbishop of Munich having required Döllinger to accept, within a limited time, the dogma of the Pope's infallibility, Döllinger replied, in an admirably written paper, by denying the dogma altogether. The great majority of the Catholic professors of Munich adhere to his exposition. He enjoys the confidence and protection of his King, so that there are materials there for a schism such as have not shown themselves in a Catholic kingdom since the time of Henry the Eighth of England.

The new acquisition in Alsace and Lorraine is promised a liberal administration and liberal institutions.

The people of Brunswick, which State, on the death of the present ruling prince, will fall to the King of Prussia, are taking measures, after the American principle, to preserve a government of their own for domestic legislation.

For Roumania the status quo is approved by this government, and the ministry is looked upon as the best that can at present be selected, and the reigning prince, who is inclined to abdicate, is advised to remain.

As to France, the German Empire is resolved to keep faith with the government with which it negotiated peace, and it seeks to stand aloof from all internal questions in France.

AMERICAN LEGATION,
Berlin, April 25, 1871. (Received May 9.)

SIR: I have heretofore informed the Department that the most remarkable antagonism now existing in Germany relates to the constitution of the first house of the German Parliament. That house, as at present constituted, is appointed by the executive authority of each one of the twenty-five States of Germany; its votes are given as in the old Congress of the United States, not by individuals as such, but by States. An aristocratic party desires to establish a first house that shall be more analogous to the British House of Lords. On the 19th of this month, Prince Bismarck, incidentally in a speech in the diet, declared himself entirely opposed to a house of lords, and spoke in the warmest terms of eulogy of the first house, as at present constituted, as being a most "happily devised senate." A hereditary house, he said, could not furnish an adequate counterpoise or protection against the dangers which might spring from universal suffrage in its fullest exercise of its powers; but the vote of a state he described as the resultant of all the forces contained in the state, the vote of the executive modified by the legislature and the responsible ministry of the individual state. "The sovereignty," he said, "does not belong to the Emperor, but to the totality of the united government;" and in this senate the wisdom, the intelligence of each one of the five and twenty governments, can make itself heard, can contribute its part toward the complete enlightenment of the whole body. "Therefore," said he, "I would beg of you not to touch the council of the union with an unfriendly hand. I see a sort of palladium for our future, a guarantee for the future of Germany, in this form of organization."

The speech of Prince Bismarck confirms the conclusion to which I had come from my own observations—that in the Empire of Germany a house of peers is no longer possible, and that the American idea that no legislative office should be hereditary has established itself too firmly to be overthrown.

With regard to the manner in which the members of the first house are chosen, the method that has been adopted is the best that can, as yet, be practiced. In many of the separate states of Germany, there exists a first house in which the hereditary aristocracy is strongly represented. We choose our Senators by the concurrent or the joint vote of the two houses of the legislature; in Germany, the two houses would be perpetually at variance in their selections, and a joint ballot of two houses, one of which represents in part at least a hereditary aristocracy, could not well be taken.

The popular branch in each state might elect a more liberal council; the other branch, most certainly, a less liberal one. Thus in a conflict between a first house, after the British fashion of a house of lords, and a senate after the pattern of the American Senate, the latter has won in Germany the definitive victory. The British system finds so feeble a support that the proposition for its adoption is not likely to revive.

I add, for your information and for the consolation of statesmen who sometimes do not see their way clearly through difficulties, that, in 1862, the present Emperor, being then King of Prussia, caused a paper for his formal abdication to be prepared, and he set his signature to it.

The interposition of his advisers prevented the consummation of the act by delivery.

AMERICAN LEGATION,

Berlin, May 6, 1871. (Received May 23.)

SIR: I inclose to you to-day a copy of the constitution of Germany, as reported to the diet, and as adopted without change.

A bill is now pending in the Parliament fixing the rate of payment to the members of the diet for their legislative services, and their traveling expenses in coming to and returning from the place of session. The pay proposed to be fixed is prospective; not to be received until a new Parliament is chosen. The per diem allowance is three thalers, or $2 16 of our money. The average length of the annual session has not been more than sixty days. The number of the members of the diet is three hundred and eighty-two; the pay of the members for the year would, therefore, amount to $49,507 20. The amount allowed for traveling expenses is the fare in a second-class carriage from the nearest station to Berlin and back again. I have taken some pains to get at the average which the members would receive, and I find it to be in our money, $6 12 each way; each member, therefore, would receive $12 24 for traveling expenses, and the whole amount would be $4,675 68.

German statesmen are already studying the constitution of our Supreme Court of the United States, and the wish is already heard that a like institution may find a place in Germany.

GERMAN DIET, FIRST LEGISLATIVE PERIOD, FIRST SESSION, 1871.

BERLIN, March 21, 1871.

In the name of His Majesty the Emperor, the undersigned, chancellor of the empire, has the honor to submit to the diet, for its action, the annexed plan of a law regarding the constitution of the German Empire as it has been adopted by the Federal Council.

V. BISMARCK.

To the DIET.

Law regarding the constitution of the German Empire.

We, William, by the grace of God German Emperor, King of Prussia, &c., do hereby order, in the name of the German Empire, with the consent of the federal council and the diet, as follows:

§ 1. Instead of the constitution of the Germanic Confederation adopted by the North German Union and the Grand Duchies of Baden and Hesse, (Bundesgesetzblatt für 1870, p. 627, et seq.) and instead of the treaties concluded with the kingdoms of Bavaria and Wurtemberg with regard to their adoption of this constitution, said treaties bearing date November 23 and 26, 1870, (Bundesgesetzblatt of the year 1871, p. 9, et seq., and of the year 1870, p. 654, et seq.) the following constitution for the German Empire is adopted:

SEC. 2. The provisions of article 80 of the constitution of the Germanic Confederation mentioned in section 1, (Bundesgesetzblatt of the year 1870, p. 647,) under III section 8 of the treaty with Bavaria, of November 23, 1870, (Bundesgesetzblatt of the year 1871, p. 21, seq.) in article 2, No. 6, of the treaty with Würtemberg, of November 25, 1870, (Bundesgesetzblatt of the year 1870, p. 656,) in relation to the adoption of the laws of the North German Union in these states, remain in force.

The laws therein referred to are laws of the Empire. Where reference is made in them to the North German Union, its constitution, territory, members or states, citizenship, constitutional organs, citizens, officers, flag, &c., the German Empire and its respective belongings are to be understood.

The case is the same with regard to such laws of the North German Union as shall hereafter be adopted in any of the aforesaid states.

The agreements in the protocol adopted at Versailles on the 15th of November, 1870, (Bundesgesetzblatt for 1870, p. 657,) in the final protocol of November 23, 1870, (Bundesgesetzblatt for 1871, p. 23, seq.), as well as those under IV of the treaty with Bavaria, of November 23, 1870, shall not be affected by the present law.

In witness, &c.

Done, &c.

CONSTITUTION OF THE GERMAN EMPIRE.

His Majesty the King of Prussia, in the name of the North German Union, His Majesty the King of Bavaria, His Majesty the King of Würtemberg, His Royal Highness the Grand Duke of Baden, and His Royal Highness the Grand Duke of Hesse, and by Rhine for those parts of the Grand Duchy of Hesse which are situated south of the Main, conclude an eternal alliance for the protection of the territory of the confederation, and of the laws of the same, as well as for the promotion of the welfare of the German people.

This confederation shall bear the name of the German Empire, and shall have the following constitution.

I.—TERRITORY.

ARTICLE 1. The territory of the confederation shall consist of the States of Prussia, with Lauenburg, Bavaria, Saxony, Würtemberg, Baden, Hesse, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Saxe-Weimar, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Oldenburg, Brunswick, Saxe-Meiningen, Saxe-Altenburg, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, Anhalt, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, Waldeck, Reuss of the elder branch, Reuss of the younger branch, Schaumburg-Lippe, Lippe, Lubeck, Bremen, and Hamburg.

II.—LEGISLATION OF THE EMPIRE.

ARTICLE 2. Within this territory the empire shall have the right of legislation according to the provisions of this constitution, and the laws of the Empire shall take precedence of those of each individual state. The laws of the Empire shall be rendered binding by imperial proclamation, such proclamation to be published in a journal devoted to the publication of the laws of the empire, (Reichsgesetzblatt.) If no other period shall be designated in the published law for it to take effect, it shall take effect on the fourteenth day after the day of its publication in the law-journal at Berlin.

ARTICLE 3. There is one citizenship for all Germany, and the citizens or subjects of each state of the federation shall be treated in every other state thereof as natives, and shall have the right of becoming permanent residents, of carrying on business, of filling public offices, and may acquire all civil rights on the same conditions as those born in the state, and shall also have the same usage as regards civil prosecutions and the protection of the laws.

No German shall be limited, in the exercise of this privilege, by the authorities of his native state, or by the authorities of any other state of the confederation.

The regulations governing the care of paupers, and their admission into the various parishes, are not affected by the principle enunciated in the first paragraph.

In like manner those treaties shall remain in force which have been concluded between the various states of the federation in relation to the custody of persons who are to be banished, the care of sick, and the burial of deceased citizens.

With regard to the rendering of military service to the various states, the necessary laws will be passed hereafter.

All Germans in foreign countries shall have equal claims upon the protection of the Empire.

ARTICLE 4. The following matters shall be under the supervision of the Empire and its legislature:

1. The privilege of carrying on trade in more than one place; domestic affairs and matters relating to the settlement of natives of one state in the territory of another;

the right of citizenship; the issuing and examination of passports; surveillance of foreigners and of manufactures, together with insurance business, so far as these matters are not already provided for by article 3 of this constitution, (in Bavaria, however, exclusive of domestic affairs and matters relating to the settlement of natives of one state in the territory of another;) and likewise matters relating to colonization and emigration to foreign countries.

2. Legislation concerning customs duties and commerce, and such imposts as are to be applied to the uses of the empire.

3. Regulation of weights and measures of the coinage, together with the emission of funded and unfunded paper money.

4. Banking regulations in general.

5. Patents for inventions.

6. The protection of literary property.

7. The organization of a general system or protection for German trade in foreign countries; of German navigation, and of the German flag on the high seas; likewise the organization of a general consular representation of the empire.

8. Railway matters, (subject in Bavaria to the provisions of article 46,) and the construction of means of communication by land and water for the purposes of home defense and of general commerce.

9. Rafting and navigation upon those waters which are common to several States, and the condition of such waters, as likewise river and other water dues.

10. Postal and telegraphic affairs; but in Bavaria and Hungary these shall be subject to the provisions of article 52.

11. Regulations concerning the execution of judicial sentences in civil matters, and the fulfillment of requisitions in general.

12. The authentication of public documents.

13. General legislation regarding the law of obligations, criminal law, commercial law, and the law of exchange; likewise judicial proceedings.

14. The imperial army and navy.

15. The surveillance of the medical and veterinary professions.

16. The press, trades' unions, &c.

ARTICLE 5. The legislative power of the empire shall be exercised by the federal council and the diet. A majority of the votes of both houses shall be necessary and sufficient for the passage of a law.

When a law is proposed in relation to the army or navy, or to the imposts specified in article 35, the vote of the presiding officer shall decide; in case of a difference of opinion in the federal council, if said vote shall be in favor of the retention of the existing arrangements.

I.—FEDERAL COUNCIL.

ARTICLE 6. The federal council shall consist of the representatives of the states of the confederation, among whom the votes shall be divided in such a manner that Prussia, including the former votes of Hanover, the electorate of Hesse, Holstein, Nassau, and Frankfurt shall have 17 votes; Bavaria, 6 votes; Saxony, 4 votes. Würtemberg, 4 votes; Baden, 3 votes; Hesse, 3 votes; Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 2 votes, Saxe-Weimar, 1 vote; Mecklenburg-Strelitz, 1 vote; Oldenburg, 1 vote; Brunswick, 2 votes; Saxe-Meiningen, 1 vote; Saxe-Altenburg, 1 vote; Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, 1 vote; Anhalt, 1 vote; Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, 1 vote; Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, 1 vote; Waldeck, 1 vote; Reuss, elder branch, 1 vote; Reuss, younger branch, 1 vote; Schaumburgh-Lippe, 1 vote; Lippe, 1 vote; Lubeck, 1 vote; Bremen, 1 vote; Hamburg, 1 vote; total 53 votes. Each member of the confederation shall appoint as many delegates to the federal council as it has votes; the total of the votes of each state shall, however, be cast by only one delegate.

ARTICLE 7. The federal council shall take action upon—

1. The measures to be proposed to the diet and the resolutions passed by the same.

2. The general provisions and regulations necessary for the execution of the laws of the empire, so far as no other provision is made by said laws.

3. The defects which may be discovered in the execution of the laws of the empire, or of the provisions and regulations heretofore mentioned. Each member of the confederation shall have the right to introduce motions, and it shall be the duty of the presiding officer to submit them for deliberation.

Legislative action shall take place by simple majority, with the exceptions of the provisions in articles 5, 37, and 78. Votes not represented or instructed shall not be counted. In the case of a tie, the vote of the presiding officer shall decide.

When legislative action upon a subject which does not affect, according to the provisions of this constitution, the whole Empire is taken, the votes of only those states of the confederation shall be counted which shall be interested in the matter in question.

ARTICLE 8. The federal council shall appoint from its own members permanent committees—

1. On the army and the fortifications.

2. On naval affairs.
3. On duties and taxes.
4. On commerce and trade.
5. On railroads, post offices, and telegraphs.
6. On the judiciary.
7. On accounts.

In each of these committees there shall be representatives of at least four states of the confederation, beside the presiding officer, and each state shall be entitled to only one vote in the same.

In the committee on the army and fortifications Bavaria shall have a permanent seat; the remaining members of it, as well as the members of the committee on naval affairs, shall be appointed by the Emperor; the members of the other committees shall be elected by the federal council. These committees shall be newly formed at each session of the federal council, i. e., each year, when the retiring members shall again be eligible.

Besides, there shall be appointed in the federal council a committee on foreign affairs, over which Bavaria shall preside, to be composed of the plenipotentiaries of the Kingdoms of Bavaria, Saxony, and Württemberg, and of two plenipotentiaries of the other states of the Empire, who shall be elected annually by the federal council. Clerks shall be placed at the disposal of the committees to perform the necessary work appertaining thereto.

ARTICLE 9. Each member of the federal council shall have the right to appear in the diet, and shall be heard there at any time when he shall so request, to represent the views of his government, even when the same shall not have been adopted by the majority of the council. Nobody shall be at the same time a member of the federal council and of the diet.

ARTICLE 10. The Emperor shall afford the customary diplomatic protection to the members of the federal council.

IV.—PRESIDIUM.

ARTICLE 11. The King of Prussia shall be the president of the confederation, and shall have the title of German Emperor. The Emperor shall represent the empire among nations, declare war, and conclude peace in the name of the same, enter into alliances and other conventions with foreign countries, accredit ambassadors, and receive them. For a declaration of war in the name of the empire, the consent of the federal council shall be required, except in case of an attack upon the territory of the confederation or its coasts.

So far as treaties with foreign countries refer to matters which, according to article 4, are to be regulated by the legislature of the empire, the consent of the federal council shall be required for their ratification, and the approval of the diet shall be necessary to render them valid.

ARTICLE 12. The Emperor shall have the right to convene the federal council and the diet, and to open, adjourn, and close them.

ARTICLE 13. The convocation of the federal council and the diet shall take place annually, and the federal council may be called together for the preparation of business without the diet; the latter, however, shall not be convoked without the federal council.

ARTICLE 14. The convocation of the federal council shall take place as soon as demanded by one-third of its members.

ARTICLE 15. The chancellor of the empire, who shall be appointed by the Emperor, shall preside in the federal council, and supervise the conduct of its business.

The chancellor of the empire shall have the right to delegate the power to represent him to any member of the federal council.

ARTICLE 16. The necessary bills shall be laid before the diet in the name of the Emperor, in accordance with the resolutions of the federal council, and they shall be represented in the diet by members of the federal council or by special commissioners appointed by said council.

ARTICLE 17. To the Emperor shall belong the right to prepare and publish the laws of the empire. The laws and regulations of the Emperor shall be published in the name of the empire, and require for their validity the signature of the chancellor of the empire, who thereby becomes responsible for their execution.

ARTICLE 18. The Emperor shall appoint the officers of the empire, require them to take the oath of allegiance, and dismiss them when necessary.

Officials appointed to an office of the empire from one of the states of the confederation shall enjoy the same rights to which they were entitled in their native states by their official position, provided no other legislative provision shall have been made previously to their entrance into the service of the empire.

ARTICLE 19. If states of the confederation shall not fulfill their constitutional duties, proceedings may be instituted against them by military execution. This execution shall be ordered by the federal council, and enforced by the Emperor.

V.—DIET.

ARTICLE 20. The members of the diet shall be elected by universal suffrage, and by direct secret ballot.

Until regulated by law, which is reserved by section 5 of the election law of May 31, 1869, (Bundesgesetzblatt, 1869, section 145,) 48 delegates shall be elected in Bavaria, 17 in Württemberg, 14 in Baden, 6 in Hesse, south of the river Main, and the total number of delegates shall be 382.

ARTICLE 21. Officials shall not require a leave of absence in order to enter the diet. When a member of the diet accepts a salaried office of the empire, or a salaried office in one of the states of the confederation, or accepts any office of the empire, or of a state, with which a high rank or salary is connected, he shall forfeit his seat and vote in the diet, but may recover his place in the same by a new election.

ARTICLE 22. The proceedings of the diet shall be public.

Truthful reports of the proceedings of the public sessions of the diet shall subject those making them to no responsibility.

ARTICLE 23. The diet shall have the right to propose laws within the jurisdiction of the empire, and to refer petitions addressed to it to the federal council or the chancellor of the empire.

ARTICLE 24. Each legislative period of the diet shall last three years. The diet may be dissolved by a resolution of the federal council, with the consent of the Emperor.

ARTICLE 25. In the case of a dissolution of the diet, new elections shall take place within a period of 60 days, and the diet shall reassemble within a period of 90 days after the dissolution.

ARTICLE 26. Unless by consent of the diet, an adjournment of that body shall not exceed the period of 30 days, and shall not be repeated during the same session, without such consent.

ARTICLE 27. The diet shall examine into the legality of the election of its members and decide thereon. It shall regulate the mode of transacting business, and its own discipline, by establishing rules therefor, and elect its president, vice-presidents, and secretaries.

ARTICLE 28. The diet shall pass laws by absolute majority. To render the passage of laws valid, the presence of the majority of the legal number of members shall be required.

When passing laws which do not affect the whole empire, according to the provisions of this constitution, the votes of only those members shall be counted who shall have been elected in those states of the confederation which the laws to be passed shall affect.

ARTICLE 29. The members of the diet shall be the representatives of the entire people, and shall not be subject to orders and instructions from their constituents.

ARTICLE 30. No member of the diet shall at any time suffer legal prosecution on account of his vote, or on account of utterances made while in the performance of his functions, or be held responsible outside of the diet for his actions.

ARTICLE 31. Without the consent of the diet, none of its members shall be tried or punished, during the session, for any offense committed, except when arrested in the act of committing the offense, or in the course of the following day.

The same rule shall apply in the case of arrests for debt.

At the request of the diet, all legal proceedings instituted against one of its members, and likewise imprisonment, shall be suspended during its session.

ARTICLE 32. The members of the diet shall not be allowed to draw any salary, or be compensated as such.

VI.—CUSTOMS AND COMMERCE.

ARTICLE 33. Germany shall form a customs and commercial union, having a common frontier for the collection of duties. Such territories as cannot, by reason of their situation, be suitably embraced within the said frontier, shall be excluded. It shall be lawful to introduce all articles of commerce of a state of the confederation into any other state of the confederation, without paying any duty thereon, except so far as such articles are subject to taxation therein.

ARTICLE 34. The Hanseatic towns, Bremen and Hamburg, shall remain free ports outside of the common boundary of the customs union, retaining for that purpose a district of their own, or of the surrounding territory, until they shall request to be admitted into the said union.

ARTICLE 35. The empire shall have the exclusive power to legislate concerning everything relating to the customs, the taxation of salt and tobacco manufactured or raised in the territory of the confederation; concerning the taxation of manufactured brandy and beer, and of sugar and sirup prepared from beets or other domestic productions. It shall have exclusive power to legislate concerning the mutual protection of taxes upon articles of consumption levied in the several states of the empire; against embezzlement; as well as concerning the measures which are required, in granting exemption from the payment of duties, for the security of the common customs frontier. In Bavaria, Württemberg, and Baden, the matter of imposing duties on domestic brandy and beer is reserved for the legislature of each country. The states of the confederation shall, however, endeavor to bring about uniform legislation regarding the taxation of these articles.

ARTICLE 36. The imposing of duties and excises on articles of consumption, and the collection of the same, (article 35,) is left to each state of the confederation within its own territory, so far as this has been done by each state heretofore.

The Emperor shall have the supervision of the institution of legal proceedings by officials of the empire, whom he shall designate as adjuncts to the custom or excise offices, and boards of directors of the several states, after hearing the committee of the Confederate Council on customs and revenues.

Notices given by these officials as to defects in the execution of the laws of the empire (article 35) shall be submitted to the confederate council for action.

ARTICLE 37. In taking action upon the rules and regulations for the execution of the laws of the empire, (article 35,) the vote of the presiding officer shall decide, whenever he shall pronounce for upholding the existing rule or regulation.

ARTICLE 38. The amounts accruing from customs and other revenues designated in article 35 of the latter, so far as they are subject to legislation by the diet, shall go to the treasury of the empire.

This amount is made up of the total receipts from the customs and other revenues, after deducting therefrom—

1. Tax compensations and reductions in conformity with existing laws or regulations.

2. Reimbursements for taxes unduly imposed.

3. The costs for collection and administration, viz :

- a. In the department of customs, the costs which are required for the protection and collection of customs on the frontiers and in the frontier districts.

- b. In the department of the duty on salt, the costs which are used for the pay of the officers charged with collecting and controlling these duties in the salt mines.

- c. In the department of duties on beet-sugar and tobacco, the compensation which is to be allowed, according to the resolutions of the confederate council, to the several state governments for the costs of the collection of these duties.

- d. Fifteen per cent. of the total receipts in the departments of the other duties.

The territories situated outside of the common customs frontier shall contribute to the expenses of the empire by paying an aversum, (a sum of acquittance.)

Bavaria, Württemberg, and Baden shall not share in the revenues from duties on liquors and beer, which go into the treasury of the empire, nor in the corresponding portion of the aforesaid aversum.

ARTICLE 39. The quarterly statements to be regularly made by the revenue officers of the federal states at the end of every quarter, and the final settlements (to be made at the end of the year, and after the closing of the account-books) of the receipts from customs, which have become due in the course of the quarter, or during the fiscal year, and the revenues of the treasury of the empire, according to article 38, shall be arranged by the boards of directors of the federal states, after a previous examination in general summaries in which every duty is to be shown separately; these summaries shall be transmitted to the federal committee on accounts.

The latter provisionally fixes, every three months, taking as a basis these summaries, the amount due to the treasury of the empire from the treasury of each state, and it shall inform the federal council and the federal States of this act; furthermore, it shall submit to the federal council, annually, the final statement of these amounts, with its remarks. The federal council shall act upon the fixing of these amounts.

ARTICLE 40. The terms of the customs-union treaty of July 8, 1867, remain in force, so far as they have not been altered by the provisions of this constitution, and as long as they are not altered in the manner designated in articles 7 and 78.

VII.—RAILWAYS.

ARTICLE 41. Railways, which are considered necessary for the defense of Germany or for purposes of general commerce, may be built for the account of the Empire by a law of the Empire, even in opposition to the will of those members of the confederation through whose territory the railroads run, without detracting from the rights of the sovereign of that country; or private persons may be charged with their construction and receive rights of expropriation. Every existing railway company is bound to permit new railroad lines to be connected with it, at the expense of these latter.

All laws granting existing railway companies the right of injunction against the building of parallel or competition lines are hereby abolished throughout the empire, without detriment to rights already acquired. Such right of injunction can henceforth not be granted in concessions to be given hereafter.

ARTICLE 42. The governments of the federal states bind themselves, in the interest of general commerce, to have the German railways managed as a uniform network, and for this purpose to have the lines constructed and equipped according to a uniform system.
